[402] Letter Burnham to Miliband, October 2007, 'Comprehensive Spending Review 2007: Settlement for the Conflict Prevention Pools and Stabilisation Aid Fund'.

- A new Stabilisation Aid Fund (SAF) would be established to "take on" funding for stabilisation and reconstruction activity in "'hot' conflict zones" from the Conflict Prevention Pool.
- New governance and programme management arrangements for the Conflict Prevention Pool and the SAF would be introduced to ensure that activity was based on a common strategy, and that expenditure was prioritised effectively against that strategy.

649. In December, the PCRU was renamed the Stabilisation Unit (SU), reflecting the emergence of the broader concept of stabilisation and the Unit's new role managing the SAF.[403]

Reflections on the allocation of funding

650. The table below shows the departmental settlements for the MOD, the FCO and DFID from 2002/03 to 2009/10 (under the 2002, 2004 and 2007 Comprehensive Spending Reviews).[404]

651. The Inquiry describes earlier in this Section how the MOD reclaimed the net additional costs of military operations (NACMO) from the Reserve under an established procedure.

652. All other departments sought to cover additional costs by reprioritising within their existing budgets and, if and when that proved insufficient, bidding to the Treasury to secure additional funding from the Reserve.

Differences in funding military operations and civilian activities

653. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Sir Mark Lyall-Grant described the different levels of funding available to departments:

> "… you have the MOD which can call on the Reserve for unforeseen military expenditure. You have DFID, who have a large amount of programme money, but can only spend it in certain ways constrained by the ODA Act [sic], and you have the Foreign Office that doesn't have any money."[405]

654. Sir Nicholas Macpherson, Director General in charge of Public Expenditure from 2001 to 2005 and then Permanent Secretary at the Treasury, told the Inquiry that, in time of conflict, it was not the role of the Treasury to try to limit military spending:

"… the Treasury may have a view on some areas of spending, but on the whole, when a war is in prospect, the narrow Treasury view that public spending is a bad thing tends to be put to one side … and you start signing the cheques."[406]

655. Lord Boateng, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury from May 2002 to May 2005, told the Inquiry that there was a distinction between the way the Treasury responded to military and non-military situations.[407] While the military did not have a "blank cheque":

"… when you have established that you need it, you are going to get [it] … Because, at the end of the day, the lives of Servicemen and women and the security of the state would be at risk if you got other people in the Treasury second-guessing and doing what we do normally, which is actually to ensure that, first and foremost, the public purse is protected."

656. The Inquiry asked Lord Boateng what the rationale had been for the allocation of funding between departments (non-military expenditure had been approximately one-eighth of military expenditure). Lord Boateng told the Inquiry that:

"… this balance arose partly as a result of the funding mechanism deployed, in the sense that the Ministry of Defence had an access to the Reserve that was on a different scale from the others [DFID and FCO].

"… did anyone sit down and say, 'Well, this is the sum of money that we have, this ought to be the balance?' No, I don't think they did. Should they have done? Maybe, but actually it is … very difficult to do.

"Is the way in which we fund post-conflict reconstruction work optimal? Then, no, I don't think it was. Did this mean that our effectiveness suffered? No, I don't believe it did, but I do believe that it led to considerable pressure on one of the two other departments, namely, the FCO, who are in a different position … from DFID because their resource base was so very different."[408]

[408] Public hearing, 14 July 2010, page 41.

657. Lord Boateng highlighted the need for the UK Government to examine how it funded the MOD, DFID and the FCO to work together in post-conflict situations:

> "… at the moment, we have a very, very dangerous imbalance, an imbalance made all the more difficult by the requirements of law in relation to DFID, that makes it very, very difficult to pool resources …"[409]

658. Mr John Dodds, Head of the Treasury Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team, told the Inquiry that, in his personal view, there was a "tension" between the way that military and non-military activities were funded, and that there was the potential for some "sub-optimal" decisions:

> "… the cost of a military solution to a conflict problem … was probably about ten times the cost of a non-military solution …
> "I think that … potentially the funding mechanisms that we had … tended to create incentives for more military intervention and less non-military intervention, but I don't think that's an issue … which is really relevant to Iraq. I think it is … a piece of broader reflection …"[410]

659. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Sir Mark Lyall-Grant suggested that there could be different approaches to allocating funding, such that:

> "… you wouldn't take decisions on the basis of how much you could afford, but Ministers would sit round the table, take the decisions that they think are the right decisions to take in a strategic environment, and then the funding would follow from that.
> "What happens at the moment is that the Ministers take the decisions, then the departments get together [to consider] 'How are we going to fund it?', and end up by saying 'Well, actually, we can't fund it'."[411]

Funding civilian activities

660. During his farewell call on Mr Straw in mid-February 2004, Sir Hilary Synnott, the departing Head of CPA(South), made a number of criticisms of the FCO's support for his office (see Section 10.1).

661. Mr Buck addressed those criticisms in a minute to Sir Michael Jay of 16 February.[412] He argued that the FCO had learned several lessons, including on funding civilian post-conflict operations. A "genuinely flexible" budget allocation similar to that provided for military operations would have saved the "huge amounts of time and energy required to wrangle over funding", and helped to "prevent the Treasury from playing one Government department off against another". The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group could have been controlled the budget.

662. Mr Neil Crompton, the Head of IPU, reflected on the availability of funding in his May 2005 valedictory minute to Mr John Sawers:

> "HMG (and the FCO) took a long time to wake up to the scale of the task we had taken on. Demands from No.10 and Ministers for action have always exceeded the resources available. The Treasury have played hard ball, exploiting different departments' own internal reasons for not wanting to make claims on the Reserve to kill off initiatives. No.10's unwillingness to intervene with HMT [the Treasury], except once, has compounded the problem, and undermined the morale of officials tasked with running an 'exemplary operation' without the resources to do so.
> "It is naive to expect the Treasury to behave differently. But Ministers (and the FCO) need to recognise that in a conflict we cannot afford the luxury of ensuring expenditure is subject 'to the same rigorous criteria as anywhere else', as we have occasionally been told."[413]

663. Mr Crompton recommended that, in future, the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group or equivalent should be allocated a budget to fund immediate priorities not covered by departments' core budgets or by funds such as the GCPP. That would avoid the need for "extended negotiations" with the Treasury.

664. In his response to Mr Crompton, Mr Sawers, FCO Political Director, agreed that the FCO needed to give a much higher priority to an issue when it "prevails over all others", in terms of both money and people.[414] The FCO had done that in the pre-conflict phase, but it had been less apparent in the post-conflict phase.

665. A June 2005 FCO Conflict Issues Group paper drawing together post-conflict lessons for the FCO concluded:

> "We need to make it clear to other government departments the true cost of what they are asking us to achieve. We can spend too much time trying to secure extra resources and fail to secure them in a timely manner. Policy without resources is usually futile. All OGDs [other government departments] need to be required to allocate resources to tasks which the Cabinet rules to be important."[415]

666. An FCO review of lessons to be learned from the UK's experience in Basra, produced in late 2008, concluded:

> "… The FCO was constantly scrambling after resources. Risk management should ensure that realistic estimates of resources are made at an early stage, including worst case scenarios; Ministers should clearly understand the need to identify and secure those resources before the UK takes on a similar commitment in future."[416]

667. FCO officials complained of a mismatch between the Government's expectations and the resources available to the FCO to meet them. While the MOD had funds for QIPs and DFID for longer-term strategic programmes, the FCO was "somehow expected" to take on elements of both "with neither the resources nor the means". The Foreign Affairs Committee had commented on more than one occasion that it was necessary and appropriate that costs incurred by the FCO in Iraq (and Afghanistan) that were additional to its mainstream diplomatic and consular roles should be funded from the Reserve. The review commented: "It is not clear whether the FCO itself formulated and presented a sufficiently strong case for extra funding to support additional work in the field."

668. On 25 March 2009, Mr Miliband chaired a meeting with "former and current key decision-makers on Iraq" to consider that review and identify the lessons for the FCO from Iraq.[417]

669. The meeting concluded that the civilian operation in Iraq had been slow to get started, and had been:

> "… hampered in the UK by a shortage of resources – particularly in comparison with the military effort – and an inability to extract what meagre resources were available from HMT [the Treasury] …"

670. Lord Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary from 2002 to 2006, described his experience of securing funds for operations in Iraq, and the lessons he had drawn from it, in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "I never felt I had sufficient resources to do anything I was doing in the Foreign Office … You are constantly – it was a constant battle throughout the five years I was there of allocating scarce resources to the priorities that mattered and, over the years we were dealing with Iraq, we were constantly spending more money and more resources on Iraq. Some of those we were getting – we got extra provision from the Treasury, often it was a question of reprioritising the resources within the Foreign Office.
> "At the worst, that meant closing posts in parts of the world which were less important in order that we could put people into Baghdad, Basra, Kabul and other places which were of growing importance."[418]

671. Lord Jay also told the Inquiry:

> "… when there is a crisis of the same magnitude as Iraq, which affects a number of different departments, then the Treasury needs to look, not at the budgets of individual departments, but at the overall need and to ensure that each department concerned in the operation gets the funds that it needs to carry it out … But it doesn't seem to me at all sensible to be thinking of giving large sums of money for a military operation, if you are not giving similar sums of money for the diplomatic support that that military operation needs, and those need to be looked at together, and I don't think they were, and I think they should be in the future."[419]

672. Mr Dodds told the Inquiry that bids from the FCO were assessed with the same rigour as bids from other departments:

> "… our starting position was that we would want the Foreign Office to … look for the potential to reprioritise … I think our perspective would be that that wasn't … their first response to this sort of situation. I think there was an expectation on the part of the Foreign Office that … the Reserve should provide them with new money …
> "But … the Foreign Office had a … significant budget … and a significant global footprint and I think it wasn't unreasonable to be looking to the Foreign Office … at least on a temporary basis, to move some resources … to support the activity on this high priority [Iraq].
> "Generally speaking, they were able to successfully reprioritise, but … their first reaction was to look for resources from the Reserve, but it was only after they were … pushed back that they … then were successful in reprioritising."[420]

673. Sir Suma Chakrabarti told the Inquiry that Iraq was DFID's largest bilateral programme in 2003/04 (when DFID spent £209m, of which £110m was spent on humanitarian relief and £99m on development activities), and DFID's 10th largest bilateral programme in 2004/05 (when DFID spent £49m, of which £21m was spent on humanitarian relief and £28m on development activities).[421]

674. The Inquiry asked Sir Suma whether DFID had considered seeking additional funding from the Treasury for Iraq.[422] He told the Inquiry:

> "We had discussions [with] the Treasury but it was quite obvious to us that they weren't going to give any more than they already had … They had put some money in upfront [in March 2003, for humanitarian assistance], but, after that, they said it is time to reprioritise."

[422] Public hearing, 22 January 2010, pages 38-40.

675. Sir Suma also told the Inquiry that Ministers had considered reallocating funding to Iraq from low-income countries, but had decided that that would not be consistent with DFID's mission to maximise its impact on poverty. Ministers had instead decided to reallocate funding to Iraq from DFID programmes in other middle-income countries:

> "… that meant closing some programmes … in Eastern Europe, Central Europe, and also Latin America … in order to help finance the Iraq programme."

676. The Inquiry describes earlier in this Section the creation of the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) in order to promote a more joined-up approach to funding peacekeeping and peace enforcement operations and conflict prevention programmes.

677. Sir Mark Lyall-Grant told the Inquiry that while he agreed that the principle behind the GCPP was a good one, decisions about how to spend relatively small sums of money had led to "huge disputes between Government departments", which had consumed significant amounts of senior officials' time.[423] He concluded that Pools (the GCPP and the ACPP) had "essentially collapsed" under the pressure of rising costs, and had been "a failed experiment".

678. Sir Peter Ricketts, FCO Permanent Under Secretary from 2006 to 2010, told the Inquiry:

> "I wouldn't have said that they are a failed experiment, but they are certainly under real stress because of rising costs, particularly of assessed contributions to the UN and other international organisations … That has required some difficult prioritisation decisions … But I think the Pools have been useful in bringing the three departments together and forcing us to make choices about what our top priorities are …"[424]

Scrutiny of UK expenditure in relation to Iraq

679. This section describes the Government's mechanisms for scrutinising UK expenditure, and how those mechanisms were engaged in relation to Iraq. The Inquiry has not conducted its own audit of any element of UK expenditure in relation to Iraq.

680. A number of bodies contribute to the scrutiny of government expenditure, including:

- The Public Accounts Committee (PAC). The main work of the PAC is the examination of the reports produced by the National Audit Office (NAO). The Committee typically examines 50 value for money reports each year, as well as reports on some departments' resource accounts.
- Departmental select committees. The core tasks of the select committees include examining and reporting on estimates, annual expenditure plans and accounts, and monitoring performance against targets in the Public Service Agreements.

[423] Public hearing, 20 January 2010, pages 36-37.
[424] Public hearing, 2 February 2010, pages 21-22.

- The NAO. The NAO audits the accounts of all government departments and agencies, and many other public bodies. The NAO also produces around 60 value for money studies each year on the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of public expenditure.
- Departments' own internal audit units.[425]

681. The estimates cycle is the process by which Parliament approves departments' resources and cash provision for the year. Departments submit Supply Estimates which set out how they plan to spend their funding and seek approval from Parliament for the necessary funds.

682. Because of the unpredictable nature of military operations, the MOD does not provide an estimate of NACMO to Parliament at the beginning of each financial year, as part of its Main Estimates.[426] Between 2002/03 and 2005/06, the MOD sought Parliament's approval for NACMO expenditure in February (towards the end of the financial year) as part of the Spring Supplementary Estimates.

683. The MOD Estimates are reported on by the House of Commons Defence Committee (HCDC).

684. In its report on the MOD's 2005/06 Spring Supplementary Estimates, the HCDC called for the MOD to provide estimated NACMO for "commenced operations" as part of its Main Estimates, if necessary with a large element for contingency.[427] The HCDC stated that, for the MOD:

> "… Parliamentary approval seems to be regarded as a rubber stamp. For this, Parliament must take some of the blame: for too long we have allowed Parliamentary approval of the Estimates to be taken for granted. MOD must recognise that the agreement of the Treasury is not a substitute for Parliamentary approval, and that providing information to the Treasury is not enough."

685. From 2006/07, in response to that criticism, the MOD presented initial estimated NACMO to Parliament in November as part of its Winter Supplementary Estimates, before seeking formal approval of expenditure as part of the Spring Supplementary Estimates the following February.[428]

[428] Tenth Report from the Defence Committee, Session 2006-2007, Cost of military operations: Spring Supplementary Estimate 2006-07, HC 379.

686. The HCDC welcomed the MOD's decision to provide earlier estimates of NACMO, but maintained its view that the MOD should include the cost of commenced operations in its Main Estimates at the beginning of the financial year.

687. The Inquiry is aware of two interventions by the PAC/NAO in relation to expenditure in Iraq.

688. The FCO's Financial Compliance Unit (FCU) visited Baghdad in April/May 2005 to review the Embassy's financial controls.[429] The FCU found no evidence of fraud, but did identify write-offs totalling approximately £13,000 relating to mobile phone bills, where either the phone had been lost and subsequently used or the individual user could not now be identified. In addition, Iraqi staff had incurred charges totalling more than £24,000 on personal calls from mobile phones. The FCU concluded that was unlikely to be recoverable, and should be paid for by the Embassy.

689. The FCO's phone service provider alerted the FCO at the end of June 2005 that they had concerns over the level of activity logged against one FCO satellite phone.[430] As a precaution, the service provider had barred the phone on 24 June. The FCO switched off all its active satellite phones in Iraq on 15 July, and terminated the associated line rental agreements.

690. Sir Michael Jay reported to the PAC on 15 February 2006 that the FCU was investigating a loss of £594,000 as a result of two satellite phones being stolen or misappropriated.[431] Sir Michael outlined some of the weaknesses in FCO systems that had already been identified, highlighting the failure of officials in London to challenge the bills which they received, and some of the improvements which had already been made.

691. At the request of the PAC, the NAO reported to it in July 2006 on the outcome of the FCU's investigation (in the context of the NAO's report on the FCO's 2005/06 Resource Accounts).[432] The FCU had found that the IPU had ordered 10 satellite phones in September 2003 for use in Iraq. The phones had been made ready for use before being dispatched. Weaknesses in the controls over the physical location, storage, billing and payment for the phones had led to the loss of two of the phones (together with another that had been rented previously) remaining undetected until June 2005. Despite extensive enquiries the FCU had not been able to establish who was responsible for the theft and subsequent misuse of the phones. The FCU had calculated the full extent of the loss at £594,370; the bill for one phone for June 2005 had been over £212,000.

692. The FCU's investigation had highlighted numerous failures in the FCO's internal control system, which had allowed the theft of the phones and their subsequent misuse to continue undetected for a period of some 18 months. The FCU had identified, and agreed with the NAO, actions to reduce the risk of another similar incident.

693. The NAO visited the DFID Iraq team in London in May 2007, to undertake a review of internal financial control procedures as part of its audit of DFID's 2006/07 Resource Accounts.[433] The NAO team was unable to visit Iraq due to the security situation.

694. The NAO concluded that, overall, DFID was operating good controls over transactions through the local (Iraqi) imprest and bank account, and that budgetary control, asset management and corporate governance controls were operating effectively. Projects had been properly approved, and there was evidence that project outputs and outcomes were being monitored.

695. Mr Martin Dinham, DFID Director Europe, Middle East and Americas, told the Inquiry:

> "… a National Audit Office investigation … said that the systems that we had in place were sensible, suitable, that all the various safeguards that they would have liked to have seen were there. So we got – remarkable in the circumstances – we got a very clean bill of health from the NAO, which … is completely independent of the system."[434]

696. The Inquiry is also aware of one major fraud perpetrated against a DFID programme.

697. DFID's Southern Iraq Employment and Services Programme (SIESP) was approved in July 2004, providing £10m for infrastructure services and £6m for employment generation.[435] A total of £0.5m was allocated for programme administration.

698. In May 2005, the DFID Office in Basra closed the employment generation component of the SIESP after an assessment identified "worrying issues". The Office asked DFID's Internal Audit Department (IAD) to visit Basra to review the SIESP and identify lessons for other programmes.

699. The IAD identified several flaws in the design of the component. It concluded that:

- A "key driver" of the SIESP had been "political (and consequent senior management) pressure in Whitehall and beyond to achieve visible results … In retrospect, these pressures appear unreasonable but at the time were generally irresistible." Warnings against proceeding with a programme of "such high fiduciary risk and intangible benefit" had not been heeded.

[435] Report DFID Internal Audit Department, 11 August 2005, 'Visit Report: Basra, Iraq 26th – 31st July 2005'.

- Implementation had been undermined by the lack of physical monitoring due to the security situation.
- Weaknesses in the DFID Office in Basra had contributed to the problems within the SIESP. The Office had been set up "hastily under pressure from UK and locally to show a DFID presence". It had proved very difficult to recruit staff for Iraq, leading to the appointment of staff with "little or no experience in managing programmes or staff".
- The DFID Office in Basra had established "good controls" over SIESP finances. The Office's decision to close the employment generation component immediately after its initial assessment had saved £3m (the amount remaining in the employment generation budget).

700. Of the £3m that had been spent, the IAD estimated that over £2m had been spent in a way "that did not meet [the SIESP's] objectives". The lack of physical monitoring made it difficult to be more precise.

701. In May 2006, DFID conducted an internal review in order to determine the extent of the loss from the SIESP employment component.[436] The review concluded that:

- £254,105 had been spent on projects where there was clear evidence of full or partial misuse of money, based on monitoring by DFID staff.
- £296,187 had been spent on projects where there was "no clear evidence of either good use or misuse of money (because there was no monitoring information on file) but where anecdotal evidence from interviews suggested that some percentage of the projects were not successfully completed".
- £1,021,223 had been spent on projects which DFID was "reasonably confident" had been successfully completed, based on information on file (in the form of photographs or visit reports) or anecdotal evidence.

702. Dr Nemat Shafik, DFID Permanent Secretary from March 2008, told the Inquiry:

> "We have a zero tolerance policy on corruption and we act on it immediately. The then Provincial Council was very unhappy with us as a result… But on that, we don't compromise.
> "[The SIESP] is … the only case that we are aware of, where we had a significant fraud, which, given the scale of the funds that we were disbursing, and given the context, is, I think, a pretty good track record.
> "In the case of the Iraq portfolio … we actually had a higher level of scrutiny than our normal portfolio because of the risks involved. So we would get monthly reporting on risks, security risk, staff risk, risks to our money …"[437]

US oversight of expenditure on reconstruction

In contrast to the UK Government, the US Government established new bodies to oversee US expenditure on reconstruction in Iraq.

When the US Congress appropriated £18.4bn for Iraq relief and reconstruction in November 2003, it also passed legislation to create a specialised Inspector General – the Inspector General of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA-IG) – to provide accountability for the use of those funds.[438]

The CPA-IG was re-designated as the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction (SIGIR), with a modified mandate, in October 2004.[439] SIGIR's mandate was, with respect to US relief and reconstruction plans, programmes, and operations in Iraq, to provide independent and objective:

- oversight and review through comprehensive audits, inspections and investigations;
- advice and recommendations on policies to promote economy, efficiency and effectiveness;
- prevention, detection and deterrence of fraud, waste and abuse; and
- information and analysis to Congress, the US Secretary of State, the US Secretary of Defense and the American people.[440]

SIGIR's jurisdiction extended to the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund (IRRF), the Iraq Security Forces Fund, and the Commanders' Emergency Response Program (CERPs), and assistance for the reconstruction of Iraq under the Economic Support Fund, the International Narcotics Control and Law Enforcement account or any other provision of law.

SIGIR published its final report in March 2013.[441] It recorded that:

- SIGIR had undertaken 220 audits and 170 inspections, which had led to 82 convictions and over US$191m in financial penalties.
- Those audits had questioned US$641m in costs and identified an additional US$974m in funds which could be put to better use – a combined potential financial benefit of US$1.61bn. As at September 2012, the savings to the US Government from renegotiated contracts, refunds and operational savings resulting from SIGIR's work were US$645m.
- At its peak in 2008, SIGIR had 35 auditors permanently stationed in Baghdad.
- SIGIR's budget was on average US$25m a year over its lifetime.

The report also recorded that SIGIR had developed innovative oversight practices:

- a focus on producing rapid "performance reviews" rather than slow-moving financial audits; and
- a focus on converting findings from audits and investigations into lessons for colleagues on the ground, consolidated in nine "lessons learned" reports.

The report offered a number of lessons for future stabilisation and reconstruction operations, including the need to provide a "robust in-country team of auditors, inspectors, and investigators from the operation's outset". Such a team would detect or deter fraud, waste and abuse, improving mission efficiency and effectiveness. The absence of a strong team early in the Iraq operation had allowed too much fraud, waste and abuse to occur.

SIGIR convened the Iraq Inspectors General Council in March 2004, to enhance collaboration and co-operation among the inspectors general of the agencies that oversaw Iraq reconstruction funds.[442] The Council met quarterly to exchange details about current and planned audits, identify opportunities for collaboration and minimise redundancies. Council members included: CENTCOM Inspector General; Department of Defense Office of Inspector General; Department of State Office of Inspector General; Government Accountability Office; USAID Office of Inspector General; and the US Army Audit Agency.

Analyses of expenditure

Total direct cost (by financial year)

704. The direct cost of the UK's intervention in Iraq was at least £9.2bn between the UK financial years 2002/03 and 2009/10. The table below provides a detailed breakdown by financial year.

705. That figure does not include expenditure by departments other than the MOD, the FCO, and DFID. Although other departments made important contributions to the UK effort, in particular in the post-conflict period, their expenditure was relatively small.

Cost of accommodation, security, medical services and life support

706. From 1 July 2004, responsibility for providing accommodation, security, medical services and life support (defined by the FCO as catering, laundry and cleaning) was provided by the FCO and charged to other departments and agencies under a Service Level Agreement (SLA).[449] Charges were based on the number of personnel each department and agency had in Iraq. The table below shows expenditure under the SLA.[450]

708. The Inquiry asked Lord Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary from 2002 to 2006, how he and the FCO Board reached a view of the balance between the value of the activities and the cost of achieving them.[452] Lord Jay told the Inquiry:

> "… there are always judgments that you have to make as to whether people are secure and how much you spend on that, but my judgment is that … if we had felt on the [FCO] Board in London that we were not able to afford the security for people, then we shouldn't have people on the ground."

709. Mr Jim Drummond, DFID Director Iraq, was briefed in advance of his appearance before the International Development Committee (IDC) on 16 November 2004 that DFID had, to date, spent approximately £16.9m on staff security in Iraq, including armed protection, armoured vehicles, hostile environment and emergency first aid training, and posting Security Managers in Iraq and the UK.[453] That security spending had supported project spending of £32.1m; security spending therefore comprised approximately one-third of total project spending.

710. The briefing stated:

> "Quantifying the costs and benefits associated with a reform programme is heavily subjective. So there is no specific point at which security costs make projects become unviable. However, given the very high costs of operating at present the programme is kept tightly focused on work that needs to be done now, and that has very high rates of return. For example, our economic work has been focused on assisting the Iraqi Government in agreeing an IMF programme, which is the first step in moving towards debt relief. Clearly with debts of US$120bn the economic benefits of this work outweigh the costs."

711. The NAO published its report 'DFID: Operating in insecure environments' in October 2008.[454]

712. The NAO reported that "in extreme circumstances", security and administrative costs could outweigh "actual projects costs". It offered as an example DFID's Technical Advisory Team Programme in Iraq. Of the total £7m allocation, £1.9m had been spent on consultancy work and more than £5m on security and related expenses.

713. The NAO reported that DFID did not systematically collate or analyse the extra costs of running its business in insecure environments. Significant security costs in Iraq and other countries were categorised by DFID as programme, rather than administrative, expenditure, making them more difficult to identify. Security costs incurred by DFID's implementing partners would also be categorised as programme expenditure.

714. The NAO recommended that "DFID needs better management information on its costs to inform its decisions and achieve value for money [in insecure environments]".

715. The Inquiry asked Mr Hilary Benn, the International Development Secretary from 2003 to 2007, if the high security costs in Iraq had undermined DFID's ability to deliver value for money, and whether the funds spent on Iraq could have been better used elsewhere.[455] He told the Inquiry:

> "No, because we had a particular responsibility … [and] our duty to fulfil that responsibility. Because what we were trying to do … was to assist Iraq to build something better for itself, and this was a very important objective. And it would have been wrong to say, 'Well, we will get up and walk away' …"

716. Mr Benn also told the Inquiry that DFID funding for Iraq had been reallocated from other middle-income countries, rather than from low-income countries.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses analysis and findings in relation to the evidence set out in Section 13.1, on the allocation of resources for military operations and civilian activities in Iraq.

2. This Section does not address how government departments used the resources available to them. Specifically:

- the provision of military equipment is considered in Sections 6.3 and 14;
- the UK's support for reconstruction is considered in Section 10; and
- the UK's support for Security Sector Reform is considered in Section 12.

Key findings

- The direct cost of the conflict in Iraq was at least £9.2bn (the equivalent of £11.83bn in 2016). In total, 89 percent of that was spent on military operations.
- The Government's decision to take part in military action against Iraq was not affected by consideration of the potential financial cost to the UK of the invasion or the post-conflict period.
- Ministers were not provided with estimates of military conflict and post-conflict costs, or with advice on their affordability, when decisions were taken on the scale of the UK's military contribution to a US-led invasion of Iraq, and on the UK's role in the post-conflict period. They should have been.
- There was no articulated need for additional financial resources for military operations in Iraq that was not met.
- The arrangements for funding military Urgent Operational Requirements (UORs) and other military costs worked as intended, and did not constrain the UK military's ability to conduct operations in Iraq.
- The controls imposed by the Treasury on the Ministry of Defence's (MOD's) budget in September 2003 did not constrain the UK military's ability to conduct operations in Iraq.
- The Government was slow to recognise that Iraq was an enduring operation, and to adapt its funding arrangements to support both military operations and civilian activities.
- The arrangements for securing funding for civilian activities could be slow and unpredictable. Some high-priority civilian activities were funded late or only in part.

Estimates of the cost of the UK's involvement in Iraq

3. It was the responsibility of departments in the first instance to:

- produce estimates of the costs of activities for which they were responsible;
- discuss those estimates with the Treasury; and
- make them available to Ministers and, if appropriate, Cabinet to inform their discussions.

4. The Treasury began considering the potential cost of UK involvement in Iraq in June 2002, and produced the first estimated figure for the cost of military action in Iraq (£2.5bn) in September 2002.

5. The MOD sent "some indicative breakdowns" of the cost of military action to the Treasury on 11 October[1] and "ball-park figures" for the cost of military action (up to £2bn) to Mr Blair on 15 October, to inform his decision on whether to offer a large scale land force to the US.[2]

6. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, sent a detailed estimate of contingency planning costs (£1.65bn) to Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in mid-December. A copy of the letter was sent to Mr Blair. That estimate covered the cost of preparing, deploying and retrieving a military force, but not of any war-fighting or post-conflict activities.

7. The MOD produced its first estimate of military post-conflict costs in February 2003, just one month before the invasion. It also increased its estimated figure for the cost of military action (to between £2.5bn and £3bn).

8. The Treasury produced detailed analyses of the implications of a conflict in Iraq for public expenditure in September and October 2002.

9. Treasury officials' advice to Mr Brown on military cost estimates and the implications for public expenditure was timely and accurate. It repeatedly highlighted the risk that the UK would have to maintain a significant military force in Iraq in the medium term and challenged the MOD's assertion that the UK could limit its financial liability for Iraq's post-conflict security and reconstruction.

10. The MOD should have produced detailed estimates of military conflict and post-conflict costs sooner, in order to inform consideration of options for the UK's engagement.

11. Both the Treasury (from September 2002) and the Department for International Development (DFID) (from January 2003) produced detailed and robust analyses of potential humanitarian assistance and reconstruction costs in Iraq. Both departments concluded that the costs could be substantial.

12. Treasury officials' advice to Mr Brown highlighted the risk that the UK might have to make a significant contribution to Iraq's reconstruction, as a key member of the Coalition and in particular in the absence of UN cover. The UK Government expected that UN cover would be necessary if other international partners were to provide significant contributions to the post-conflict effort.

13. In February 2003, Treasury officials provided Mr Brown with the first comprehensive estimate of military and civilian costs for the conflict and post-conflict period. The cost of a military campaign was estimated at £3.4bn over three years, with a further £1bn in the first year after a conflict for post-conflict military operations. The cost of a UK contribution to humanitarian assistance and reconstruction was estimated at up to £0.75bn in the first year after a conflict (representing 10 percent of the cost of the total international effort). The Treasury indicated that costs for military operations beyond 2004/05 and for humanitarian assistance and reconstruction beyond 2003/04 were unknown.

14. Treasury officials advised Mr Brown that their estimate reflected the "biggest commitment" that the UK could make in the post-conflict period – taking military responsibility for a geographical area of Iraq.[3] The costs of such a commitment would be substantial and could extend into the long term.

15. Given the uncertainties over the scale of the UK's military presence in post-conflict Iraq, and the inevitable uncertainties over the scale of any post-conflict humanitarian crisis and reconstruction challenge, the Treasury's February 2003 estimates were remarkably accurate.

16. Mr Paul Boateng, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury from 2002 to 2005, told the Inquiry that the Treasury's analyses of the impact of war on the UK's public finances were not conducted with the intention of "second-guessing" Ministers, but to enable the Treasury to contribute to planning and policy discussions.[4]

17. The Inquiry agrees that the Treasury's analyses should have contributed to planning and policy discussions.

18. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that, in his discussions with Cabinet colleagues in the months leading up to the invasion, he made it clear that the Treasury would not "interfere" by suggesting that cost should be a factor in choosing one military option over another:

> "That was not our job ... At every point, I made it clear that we would support whatever option the military decided upon with the Prime Minister and the Cabinet ..."[5]

The decision to take military action against Iraq

19. Section 6.5 addresses the Government's failure to establish a unified planning process across the four principal departments involved – the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), the MOD, DFID and the Treasury – or between military and civilian planners, in the pre-conflict period.

[5] Public hearing, 5 March 2010, pages 25-26.

20. In the absence of a Cabinet Minister with overall responsibility for Iraq, leadership on strategy rested with Mr Blair.

21. The version of the Ministerial Code that was current in 2003 stated that it was the responsibility of the initiating department to ensure that proposals involving expenditure or affecting general financial policy were discussed with the Treasury before being submitted to Cabinet or a Ministerial Committee. The result of the discussion together with an estimate of the cost should be included in the memorandum submitted to Cabinet or a Ministerial Committee.

Mr Brown's discussions with Ministers on the likely costs of the UK's involvement in Iraq

In the months before the invasion, Treasury officials produced a series of detailed analyses of the likely cost of intervention in Iraq, and the effect on public expenditure, for Mr Brown. In the context of that advice, Treasury officials urged Mr Brown to intervene in discussions on the scale of the UK's involvement in the military campaign and on the UK's role in a post-conflict Iraq.

Mr Brown had many meetings with Cabinet colleagues, including Mr Blair, in the run-up to the invasion. Those meetings were often one-to-one, and no record was taken. In the absence of those records, the Inquiry is unable to determine whether or in what way Mr Brown raised the issues highlighted by his officials.

22. The detailed estimates for military conflict and post-conflict costs produced by the MOD and the Treasury, and the analyses of the implications of a conflict in Iraq for public expenditure produced by the Treasury, were not sent to Mr Blair or to Ministers outside the originating departments.

23. Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, wrote to Mr Blair on 5 February, 14 February and 5 March 2003, highlighting the potential cost of a UK contribution to an international humanitarian assistance and reconstruction effort, and the potential cost of pursuing an exemplary approach to the provision of humanitarian assistance in the UK's Area of Responsibility (AOR) in southern Iraq. She also raised the issue in Cabinet on 27 February.

24. On 14 March, in response to Mr Blair's request that Mr Brown should draw up a funding plan for Iraq, the Treasury provided a paper setting out the potential cost of a UK contribution to an international humanitarian assistance and reconstruction effort.

25. Detailed estimates of military costs and the analyses of the implications of a conflict for public expenditure should have been available to Ministers on three occasions which shaped the UK's involvement in Iraq:

- In advance of Mr Blair's decision on 31 October 2002 that the UK should offer a large scale land force to the US for planning purposes.

Mr Blair had, over the previous month, expressed his concern to Mr Hoon over the additional costs associated with providing a large scale land force as part of a UK contribution to a US-led invasion of Iraq, and asked whether those costs had been discussed with the Treasury.

The MOD and the Treasury had, by the middle of October, developed broad estimates of the cost of providing a large scale land force. Mr Brown had also been provided with detailed analyses of the implications for public expenditure of a conflict in Iraq.

At the meeting where the decision to offer a large scale land force was taken, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff, stated his belief that providing a large military contribution to the campaign would mean that the UK would be under less pressure to make a large contribution to post-conflict reconstruction.

- In February and March 2003, when the Government considered whether to take on military responsibility for a geographical area of Iraq in the post-conflict period.

  The MOD and the Treasury had, by February, developed detailed estimates of the potential cost of such a commitment (although there remained a number of unknown factors).

  When the Government acceded in April to the US request that it assume leadership of a military AOR encompassing four provinces in southern Iraq, it did so without a robust analysis either of the strategic implications for the UK or of the military's capacity to support the UK's potential obligations in the region. A step of such magnitude should have been taken deliberately, having considered the wider strategic and resource implications and contingent liabilities.

  In the event, the UK was responsible for security in its AOR for six years, initially as an Occupying Power and, from June 2004, in support of the Iraqi Government.

- In advance of Cabinet's decision on 17 March 2003 to issue an ultimatum to Iraq and ask the House of Commons to endorse the use of military action against Iraq if necessary.

26. The extent to which cost should be a determining factor in reaching a policy decision is for Ministers to judge based on the circumstances of each particular case. But it is essential that those taking collective responsibility for a decision have the ability to make an informed judgement about the likely costs and risks.

27. Neither Cabinet nor any of the Ministerial meetings convened to discuss military options and the UK's role in a post-conflict Iraq were provided with detailed cost estimates for the various policy options for the UK's involvement in Iraq, and their implications for public expenditure.

28. Those meetings were therefore unable to reach informed judgements on the financial risk associated with those options.

29. The leading role played by No.10 in the decision to support US-led military action against Iraq may have contributed to that omission.

30. In relation to decisions of such gravity as invading another sovereign country, it is particularly important that the Prime Minister ensures that the Ministerial Code is met.

31. But Mr Brown, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, should have ensured that estimates of the likely overall cost of a UK intervention in Iraq, for military and civilian activities during the conflict and post-conflict period, and the wider implications for public expenditure were identified and available to Ministers and Cabinet.

Arrangements for funding military operations and civilian activities

32. The Government used the existing – separate – arrangements for funding military operations and civilian activities to fund the UK's involvement in Iraq.

33. Military operations were funded through well-established procedures which enabled the MOD to incur costs and then reclaim them from the Reserve. Those claims were (in line with the agreed procedures) subject to a relatively light level of scrutiny by the Treasury.

34. DFID and the FCO funded their activities in Iraq in the first instance by reprioritising within their existing departmental settlements and, if and when that proved insufficient, by bidding to the Treasury for additional funding from the Reserve. Those bids were closely scrutinised by the Treasury.

35. The Treasury pressed DFID and the FCO hard to reprioritise within their existing departmental settlements to fund new activities in Iraq, before agreeing to provide additional funding from the Reserve. An FCO official, writing in 2005, described the Treasury as playing "hard ball" and setting departments against one another in order to see off potential and actual claims to the Reserve.[6]

36. The MOD, DFID and the FCO also had access to a small, inter-departmental fund – initially the Global Conflict Prevention Pool (GCPP) – intended for conflict prevention activities. The GCPP had been established to encourage and support a more co-ordinated approach across Government.

37. DFID had a larger departmental settlement than the FCO, including a large allocation for funding programmes. Programme allocations could be used flexibly in response to emerging priorities. DFID therefore had more scope than the FCO to find funding for new programmes in Iraq.

[6] Minute Crompton to Sawers, 4 May 2005, 'Iraq: Reflections'.

38. Sir Suma Chakrabarti, DFID Permanent Secretary from 2002 to 2007, told the Inquiry that DFID's funding for Iraq was found by reallocating funding from DFID programmes in other middle-income countries, rather than from programmes in low-income countries.[7]

39. Sir Mark Lyall-Grant, FCO Policy Director from 2007 to 2009, summarised the situation in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "… you have the MOD which can call on the Reserve for unforeseen military expenditure. You have DFID, who have a large amount of programme money ... and you have the Foreign Office that doesn't have any money."[8]

40. The Treasury's priority throughout the period covered by the Inquiry was to avoid any suggestion that other departments should have access to the Reserve on the same basis as the MOD. In February 2007, a senior Treasury official advised Mr Stephen Timms, Chief Secretary to the Treasury from May 2006 to June 2007:

> "Arguably this [the different arrangements for funding military operations and civilian activities] can lead to perverse outcomes ... if it incentivises decision-makers to prefer military responses to civilian ones. But it is a useful safety net for us and not to be given up without careful thought."[9]

41. The arrangements for funding military operations (including Urgent Operational Requirements – UORs) worked as intended, and did not constrain the military's ability to conduct operations in Iraq.

42. All the MOD's claims on the Reserve in respect of UORs and other additional military costs were met.

43. There are no indications that Mr Brown, Mr Boateng or Treasury officials acted to delay or distort the provision of funding for UORs and other additional military costs.

44. There are no indications that DFID's activities in Iraq were constrained by a lack of resources. The constraints imposed by the disproportionate cost of providing security for civilian staff and contractors in Iraq are addressed in Section 15.

Funding for humanitarian assistance

Ms Short and Sir Suma Chakrabarti both told the Inquiry that DFID's ability to plan to deliver humanitarian assistance had been constrained by the Treasury's reluctance to provide additional funding from the Reserve.

By the end of January 2003, DFID officials had developed a detailed (but still draft) assessment of potential UK contributions for humanitarian relief and reconstruction in Iraq, under a number of scenarios.

Ms Short did not approach Mr Brown or the Treasury with a specific bid for additional resources until 21 March (although she was aware that Mr Brown was likely to support it). She did write to Mr Blair on 5 February, 14 February and 5 March, advising him of the cost of potential UK contributions for humanitarian relief and reconstruction (up to £440m a year), and seeking direction on the role of the UK in delivering the humanitarian response. She also raised the issue in Cabinet on 27 February.

Given the scale of UK resources that might have been required, it was reasonable to seek clear direction from Mr Blair on the UK's role in the humanitarian response. But that did not preclude an early bid to the Reserve. Indeed, a detailed bid may have focused the Government's attention on the need to define the UK's role more clearly.

By the end of March, DFID had earmarked £210m for humanitarian assistance in Iraq, comprising £90m from DFID's own resources and £120m that it had secured from the Reserve. In addition, the Treasury had agreed that the UK military could spend £30m on providing humanitarian assistance in the UK's Area of Operations.

The humanitarian crisis that had been feared did not materialise. By the beginning of May, DFID had reallocated the balance of the £210m allocated for humanitarian assistance that remained uncommitted – approximately £90m – to reconstruction.

45. Given its limited programme funds, the FCO found it particularly difficult to identify funding for new activities in Iraq. It was successful in making bids for funding from the Reserve to pay for security costs for personnel deployed to Iraq and diplomatic representation, but other bids were rejected in full or in part.

46. The FCO's difficulty in securing additional funding was due in part to the quality of its bids to the Reserve, and in part to the Treasury's perception that the FCO had not made sufficient effort to reprioritise from within its existing resources. The Inquiry has not assessed the accuracy of that perception.

47. In their efforts to secure funding, departments stretched the scope of the GCPP to accommodate activities as diverse as military equipment for the Iraqi Security Forces and the Basra Poetry Festival. But the Pool was small (only £7.5m for Iraq in 2003/04) and the process for securing funding was slow. Sir Mark Lyall-Grant told the Inquiry that decisions about how to spend relatively small sums of money had led to "huge disputes between Government departments" which had consumed significant amounts of senior officials' time.[10]

48. Departments found it particularly difficult to find funding for activities that emerged "in-year" or appeared to fall between the boundaries of departments' responsibilities (such as activities to promote political outreach or support the Iraqi media). A number of civilian activities that Ministers had identified as a high priority – including, in 2003, support for the Iraq Media Network and, in 2006, the first Better Basra Action Plan – were funded late, and only in part.

49. Departments recognised in mid-2003 that the arrangements for funding civilian activities were not working well. In September, the Treasury rejected a proposal from departments for a new pool for funding non-military activity in Iraq, on the grounds that it might lead to an increase in claims to the Reserve.

50. The UK's deployment into Helmand province, Afghanistan, in 2006 prompted departments, led by the FCO, to revisit the arrangements for funding civilian post-conflict activities. Initial proposals focused on enhancing or complementing the GCPP (on the assumption that the Treasury would not allow access to the Reserve for non-military activities).

51. At the same time, MOD claims on the Reserve for UORs increased significantly as security in Iraq deteriorated, expenditure on Afghanistan increased, and the Government provided new equipment for the Armed Forces.

52. The Treasury continued to agree the MOD's claims against the Reserve, but by April 2007 had concluded that the UOR programme had become a straightforward supplement to the MOD's Equipment Programme rather than a response to urgent and specific requirements in a theatre of operations.

53. In July 2007, the MOD and the Treasury agreed a new arrangement for funding UORs designed to shift the focus of the MOD's Equipment Programme towards current operations. The new arrangement was expected to be cost neutral for the MOD.

54. There were also changes to the arrangements for funding non-military activities. In July, the Treasury announced the creation of a new Stabilisation Fund (later renamed the Stabilisation Aid Fund – SAF) to fund immediate civilian support to military operations (activities which had previously been funded from the GCPP). The GCPP was combined with the Africa Conflict Prevention Pool to form the Conflict Pool. New governance arrangements sought to link more closely expenditure from the SAF and the Conflict Pool with UK strategy.

55. The changes to the arrangements for funding UORs did not affect operations in Iraq, which were by this time generating fewer demands for UORs.

[10] Public hearing, 20 January 2010, pages 36–37.

56. There are no indications that the new arrangements for funding civilian activities affected the civilian effort in Iraq, which was by that time reducing.

57. The Government continued to develop its arrangements for funding reconstruction and stabilisation operations.

58. The Inquiry has not evaluated in detail the effectiveness of the new arrangements that were introduced in 2007. They do exhibit some important and welcome features:

- a dedicated and substantial pool of resources for civilian activities in environments such as Iraq and Afghanistan; and
- a requirement that allocations should be based on an inter-departmental strategy.

59. The Government should have recognised earlier that Iraq was an enduring operation, and adapted its arrangements for funding the military operation and civilian activities accordingly in order to:

- ensure that the UOR programme retained its focus on addressing urgent and specific requirements in theatre; and
- address the difficulties in securing funding for civilian activities.

The imposition of Treasury controls on the MOD

In the light of the publicity surrounding the funding and management of the defence programme in 2003 and 2004, the Inquiry examined two related questions:

- whether the size of the MOD's core budget imposed constraints on operations in Iraq; and
- whether the imposition of controls on the MOD's management of its resources by the Treasury in September 2003 had an impact on operations in Iraq.

Several witnesses told the Inquiry that, in the MOD's view, the 1998 Strategic Defence Review, which signified a major shift towards expeditionary armed forces, had not been fully funded.

With respect to military operations in Iraq, there are no indications that there was an unmet, articulated need for additional financial resources. All the MOD's claims on the Reserve in respect of UORs and other additional military costs were met.

The Inquiry concludes in Section 14.2 that there were known military capability gaps in Iraq, and that the availability of funding was not a direct barrier to the identification and deployment of solutions to those gaps.

During September 2003, the MOD's additional cash requirement for 2003/04 rose from £490m to £1,152m. The MOD intended to meet that cash requirement by making a transfer from its non-cash budget. The Treasury took the view that that increase signalled a complete lack of budgetary control within the MOD, and on 26 September imposed controls on the MOD's management of its resources.

The size of the MOD's proposed transfer from its non-cash budget reflected a deliberate attempt by the MOD to exploit the opportunities offered by the Government's transition from cash accounting to Resource Accounting and Budgeting.

The increase in the size of the MOD's cash requirement during September reflected the inability of the MOD to produce reliable estimates of its cash requirement.

There are no indications that the controls imposed on the MOD by the Treasury in September 2003 constrained the military's ability to conduct operations in Iraq.

Resources and strategy

60. Section 9.8 describes the Government's repeated reassessments of its strategy for Iraq. Those strategies tended to focus on describing a desired end state, rather than how it would be reached.

61. None of those strategies considered the resources that the Government would need to commit to achieve those end states and (at a strategic level) how those resources should be allocated.

62. In the absence of a strong strategic framework, spending on military operations in Iraq was driven by a series of decisions on UK force levels and on the equipment that should be provided to the Armed Forces.

63. The Inquiry concludes in Section 9.8 that, from July 2005 onwards, decisions in relation to resources for Iraq were made under the influence of the demands of the UK effort in Afghanistan.

64. Allocations for civilian activities were driven by the FCO's and DFID's willingness and ability to reprioritise from within their departmental budgets and their ability to secure additional funding from the Reserve and the GCPP.

65. The direct cost to the UK Government of its intervention in Iraq between 2002/03 and 2009/10 was at least £9.2bn in cash terms (the equivalent of £11.83bn in 2016), comprising:

- £8.20bn (89 percent of the total direct cost) on military operations;
- £0.58bn (6 percent) on humanitarian and development assistance;
- £0.30bn (3 percent) on diplomatic representation; and
- £0.16bn (2 percent) from the inter-departmental pools.

66. There are no indications that the Government questioned the balance of funding between military operations and civilian activities, or considered what the most effective balance of effort might be to achieve the UK's strategic objectives.

67. Lord Boateng told the Inquiry that the imbalance in funding between military operations and civilian activities had arisen "partly as a result of the funding mechanism deployed, in the sense that the Ministry of Defence had an access to the Reserve that was on a different scale from the others [DFID and the FCO]".[11] He continued:

> "... did anyone sit down and say, 'Well, this is the sum of money that we have, this ought to be the balance?' No, I don't think they did. Should they have done? Maybe, but actually it is ... very difficult to do."

Lessons

68. The direction in the Ministerial Code that the estimate of a cost of a proposal should be included in the memorandum submitted to Cabinet or a Ministerial Committee applies equally to military operations. When evaluating military options it is appropriate to consider financial risk alongside other forms of risk. While governments will rarely wish to preclude options solely on the basis of cost, they must also recognise that, over time, cost may become an issue and make it difficult to sustain a military operation over the longer term.

69. Section 9.8 addresses the difficulties that the Government faced in converting successive UK strategies into action, in part because those strategies tended to focus on describing the desired end state rather than how it would be reached. On none of the occasions when UK strategy was reconsidered was a robust, costed plan for implementation produced.

70. Strategies and plans must define the resources required to deliver objectives, identify the budget(s) that will provide those resources, and confirm that those resources are available.

71. In developing strategies and plans for civilian/military operations, a government should address the impact of the different mechanisms used to fund military operations and civilian activities and the extent to which those mechanisms provide perverse incentives for military action by making it easier to secure funding for agreed military operations than for civilian activities.

72. A government should also address its explicit and implicit financial policy that, while there should be no constraint on the provision of funding for military operations, it is reasonable that for the same civilian/military operation, departments should find funding for new civilian activities from within their existing budgets, which are likely to be fully allocated to existing departmental priorities.

73. A government is likely to embark on major civilian/military operations such as Iraq only rarely.

74. A government should recognise that, in such operations, the civilian components (including diplomatic activity, reconstruction and Security Sector Reform) will be critical for strategic success, may be very substantial, and must be properly resourced.

75. One arrangement would be to create a budget for the civilian components of the operation, under the direction of a senior Minister with lead responsibility and in support of a coherent UK strategy. Once allocations were made from that budget to individual departments, the allocations would be managed within departments' legal and policy constraints. Such an arrangement should:

- ensure that UK strategy was resourced;
- promote joint working;
- minimise the potential for gaming;
- be able to respond to in-year priorities; and
- reduce the amount of time that Ministers and senior officials need to spend arguing about funding individual activities.

76. The Inquiry recognises that, since 2003, significant changes have been made to the UK's strategic and operational approach to reconstruction and stabilisation, including to the arrangements for funding such operations.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- three examples of a significant capability gap during operations in Iraq: protected mobility, Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR) and support helicopters; and
- the impact that deploying a medium scale force to Afghanistan in 2006 had on the provision of military equipment to Iraq.

2. This Section does not address:

- the process by which equipment was funded, which is addressed in Section 13.1;
- MOD operational policy or the specific circumstances in which individuals lost their lives in Iraq; and
- the MOD's procedure for supporting those killed or injured in Iraq, which is addressed in Section 16.3.

3. The Ministry of Defence (MOD) has agreed to declassify a large amount of material for this Section but there were places where that was not possible for national security reasons. In those few cases, the Inquiry has agreed with the MOD either to redact the material or replace it with a cipher. Where ciphers appear, they will be explained in a footnote.

Background

The procurement process

4. The MOD's financial planning framework for its core budget comprised two distinct elements:

- The Short Term Plan (STP); and
- The Defence Programme.[1]

5. The STP forecast spending on operational costs. Those were predominantly the responsibilities of the Front Line Commands (FLCs). The STP looked forward four years. Significant investment programmes, where a four-year planning horizon was too short, would be considered in the Defence Programme.

6. The Defence Programme provided a 10 year budget to balance capital spend priorities across equipment procurement, equipment support and non-equipment investments.

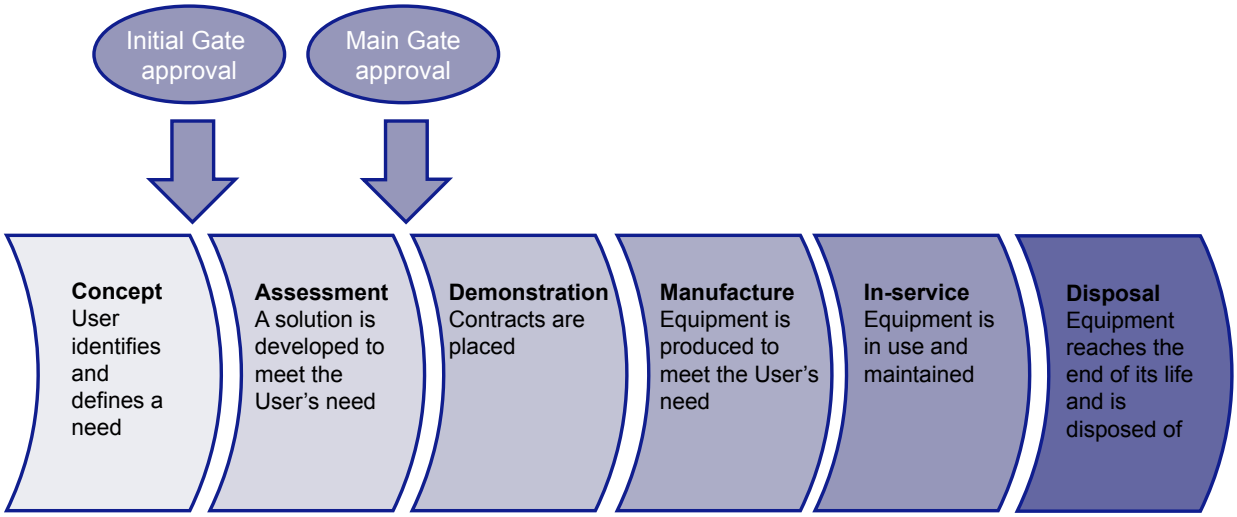
[1] Report Gray, October 2009, 'Review of Acquisition for the Secretary of State for Defence'.



7. The Defence Progamme comprised three strands:

- the procurement of new capability through the Equipment Procurement Plan (EPP) which looked forward 30 years;
- provision of equipment support through the Equipment Support Plan (ESP) which was planned over 10 years; and
- the Non-Equipment Investment Plan which planned for investment in non-military equipment, such as IT.

8. Collectively the EPP and the ESP were known as the Equipment Plan (EP).

9. Procuring equipment was achieved through the MOD's Smart Acquisition process, which was established in 1998 and sought to enable a high level of confidence that equipment projects would be delivered on time and within budget.[2] That process is illustrated in Figure 1.

10. Any projects exceeding £100m required explicit approval from the Investment Approvals Board (IAB) at two stages:

- Initial Gate – the approval for project initiation where the parameters for the Assessment Phase are set; and
- Main Gate – where the targets are set for the performance, time and cost of the Demonstration and Manufacture stages.[3]

Addressing equipment capability gaps

Three key requirements

When a capability gap in equipment is identified, there are three requirements that must be fulfilled to initiate the procurement process:

Statement of Requirement (SOR): A statement articulating a capability shortfall; it states what is required.

Urgent Statement of User Requirement (USUR): If the SOR cannot be met by an adjustment of existing assets, a USUR is raised which indicates that there is a capability gap that currently cannot be met. If the USUR is endorsed, it will be designated as either an Urgent Operational Requirement, or an Urgent Sustainability Requirement. It cannot be both.

Urgent Operational Requirement (UOR): A UOR seeks to address a capability gap by rapidly procuring new or additional equipment or the enhancement of, or essential modification to, existing equipment. That may involve bringing forward the planned procurement of equipment from the future Equipment Programme.

Urgent Sustainability Requirement (USR): A USR seeks to address a sustainability gap by rapidly acquiring additional in-service support.

11. During Operation TELIC in Iraq, Urgent Statements of User Requirements (USURs) for new equipment were forwarded to the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) who retained ownership of the USUR until it was signed off. The head of PJHQ was the Chief of Joint Operations (CJO).

12. Each edition of the Op TELIC Directive, issued by the Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS) to the CJO, stated:

- "Force Protection. You are responsible to me for the force protection of all assigned UK personnel and materiel in your JOA [Joint Operational Area] in order to ensure their security from the threats of, WMD, espionage, sabotage, subversion, terrorism and crime …"
- "UORs [Urgent Operational Requirements] … You are to identify as soon as possible any further capability shortfalls and user requirements for the support of ongoing operations; these should be submitted to DCDS (EC) [Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Equipment Capability)]."[4]

13. The responsibilities of the PJHQ and Front Line Commands (FLCs) for pursuing capability shortfalls through the UOR process were set out in a "Standing Instruction" issued in November 2004.[5]

[4] Letter CDS to CJO, 30 July 2003, 'Chief of the Defence Staff Directive to the Joint Commander for Operation TELIC (Edition 3)'.
[5] Minute Soar to UOR Stakeholder, 26 November 2004, 'Urgent Operational/Sustainability Requirements – Standing Instruction (Version 1)'.

14. To identify a new requirement the instruction stated:

"Once operations have commenced any subsequent shortfalls will usually be identified by in-theatre forces. Regardless of the phase of the operation, any capability shortfall is articulated through a Statement of Requirement (SOR)."

15. The instruction also stated:

"The SOR is reviewed by PJHQ/FLC/Jt Cmnd [Joint Command] Staffs who will then either close the gap through re-brigading of current assets or by raising an USUR [Urgent Statement of User Requirement]. The USUR is then staffed by PJHQ … If endorsed, the USUR is passed to the … Directorate of Equipment Capability (DEC) …"

Roles and responsibilities for addressing capability gaps

Equipment Capability Customer (ECC) was created by the 1998 Strategic Defence Review to bring together the teams specifying future military needs – known as the Directorates of Equipment Capability (DECs).[6] The ECC was headed by the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Equipment Capability) who reported to the Chief of Defence Staff (CDS) through the Vice Chief of Defence Staff.

The ECC was responsible for providing funded capability requirements to meet the current and future needs of the Armed Forces and ensure the equipment was delivered into service. The ECC was designated as "Customer One" in the process.

As well as the DECs, the ECC comprised:

- Directorate of Capabilities, Resources and Scrutiny (DCRS) providing internal scrutiny of programmes; and
- Joint Capabilities Board (JCB) to make balance of investment decisions across the Equipment Programme.

Front Line Commands (FLCs) were designated as the "User" of equipment and referred to as "Customer Two" in the process.

PJHQ assessed and reviewed requirements; SORs and USURs.

Directorates of Equipment Capability (DECs) were responsible for establishing a Capability Working Group to consider each USUR and, if required, for producing a business case seeking approval with advice from the Defence Procurement Agency (DPA) on the options and procurement strategy for meeting the requirement.

In 2003, equipment was provided and supported by two separate MOD organisations:

- Defence Procurement Agency (DPA) which procured the equipment for the Armed Forces; and
- Defence Logistics Organisation (DLO) which was responsible for providing and directing logistics support for in-service equipment.

[6] Report Gray, October 2009, 'Review of Acquisition for the Secretary of State for Defence'.

Within the DPA and the DLO were a number of Integrated Project Teams (IPTs) focused on delivering individual projects and programmes as directed by the DECs. The IPT was responsible for the equipment throughout its life.

The DPA and the DLO merged to form the Defence Equipment and Support Agency (DE&S) in April 2007.[7] The Head of the DE&S was the Chief of Defence Materiel.

16. A process diagram attached to the November 2004 Standing Instruction indicated that PJHQ had the lead responsibility for identification of a requirement, working with the Directorate of Equipment Capability (DEC), the FLCs and the relevant Integrated Project Team (IPT) in the Defence Procurement Agency (DPA) or Defence Logistics Organisation (DLO).

17. The instruction included an annex with a list of "UOR key stakeholders" and their roles and responsibilities.

18. The list began with the responsibilities of "Force Elements": the deployed units reporting to the in-theatre commander, which was the General Officer Commanding Multi-National Division (South-East) (GOC MND(SE)) during Op TELIC. The annex said that the Force Elements were responsible for raising SORs, along with any training and integration.

19. The role and responsibilities of FLCs included:

- "Conducts routine audits to identify potential USURs as part of the Equipment Capability Shortfall Register."
- "USUR originator."

20. The role and responsibilities of PJHQ included:

- "Reviews/endorses USURs and submits to DEC."
- "Agrees solutions to capability gaps proposed by DECs."

21. In response to a request from the Inquiry in 2011, the MOD provided further evidence on how the UOR process functioned in Iraq.[8] The MOD stated:

- "The fundamental elements of the UOR process remained broadly the same throughout operations in Iraq."
- Staff deployed in Iraq, and (in the build-up to the operation) staff in FLCs, were responsible for identifying capability gaps "which could not be met by existing holdings".

[7] Report Gray, October 2009, 'Review of Acquisition for the Secretary of State for Defence'.
[8] Paper [MOD], 8 June 2011, 'How the UOR Process Functioned During the Campaign in Iraq'.

- USURs were submitted to PJHQ for authorisation.
- In addition: "Staff in PJHQ could (and did) raise USURs themselves if they became of [sic] aware capability gaps."

22. The Inquiry submitted a further request to the MOD in 2015, seeking clarification on where the primary responsibility for identifying capability gaps lay during Op TELIC.

23. The MOD said that a draft USUR "would be originated by any user" and that "there appears to be no simple answer to the question where the primary responsibility for identifying capability gaps and raising USURs lay".[9] The MOD added:

> "Clearly the emphasis in the process was on the co-operation of the various commands and branches involved. But it appears that the onus for initial identification of requirements, at least once a campaign was in progress, lay with the theatre commander [GOC MND(SE)], while the responsibility for signing them off lay with PJHQ. Between those two stages the process of analysing the requirement and developing the solution was essentially a shared one."

24. The Acquisition Handbook in 2002 defined the role of Single Service Chiefs of Staff as to:

> "… provide overall strategic management of the individual services and their professional direction. This role supports ECC decisions on capability by providing advice and experience on the full range of factors contributing to military capability, including: concepts and doctrine, in-service equipment, sustainability, training, force structure, decision support and personnel. Single Service Chiefs are responsible for ensuring that the JCB [Joint Capabilities Board] and Capability Working Groups receive appropriate input on such matters to develop future capability."[10]

25. The Inquiry asked General Sir John Reith, CJO from August 2001 to May 2004, whether he had submitted any UORs while planning for the invasion of Iraq.[11] He replied:

> "I didn't submit UORs. The Single Services submit the UORs, because … they are required to deliver to the Chief of Joint Operations fully trained and equipped people. What I did was; we screened the UORs to ensure that they were necessary before the MOD approved them."

26. For the Commander in Chief Land Command, that included providing advice to the CJO on capability requirements for units deployed on operations.

27. General Sir Richard Dannatt, Commander in Chief Land Command from March 2005 to August 2006, told the Inquiry that, as "the second senior member of the Army", the Commander in Chief Land Command had "an important role to play on the Army Board". He had a role in influencing the Chief of the General Staff, but his primary role was to ensure "whatever troops are required … are made available, that the units are properly trained, manned and equipped to the greatest degree possible, and that's his primary responsibility".[12]

28. The USUR process only applied to new capability requirements. Where in-service support was needed to sustain existing equipment, an Urgent Sustainability Requirement (USR) was raised.

29. The Standing Instruction issued on 26 November 2004 stated that the Urgent Sustainability Requirement (USR) process was operated in parallel to the UOR process but by the DLO.[13] This was "to deliver urgently required stocks and spares to meet operational sustainability requirements". The "key points" about the process included:

- USRs followed "a similar staffing process as UORs".
- DLO procured, tracked and accounted for USR expenditure.
- There was no formal review because DEC, IPT and industry support was already in place for the required equipment.

The need for an expeditionary capability

30. The 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR) set out the UK's defence requirements in the period up to 2015.[14]

31. The importance of the SDR assumptions for equipment available to the forces deployed for the invasion of Iraq is addressed in Section 6.3.

32. The SDR explained that, "in the post Cold War world", there was a greater need for the Armed Forces to build an expeditionary capability because "we must be prepared to go to the crisis, rather than have the crisis come to us".

33. A supporting essay to the SDR listed the future military capabilities it considered "increasingly important", including:

- command, control, communications and computers, and Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR); and
- "the trend towards force projections operations, for which we may need to deploy very rapidly in order to be successful, places an increasing premium on transport or lift capabilities".[15]

[15] Ministry of Defence, The Strategic Defence Review: Supporting Essays, July 1998.

34. One of the outcomes of the Review was the creation of the Joint Helicopter Command (JHC). The JHC brought the Royal Navy's commando helicopters, the Army's attack and light utility helicopters, and the RAF's support helicopters under a single command, and was responsible for the peacetime management of the entire battlefield helicopter fleet, and for generating the required battlefield helicopter force package for operations.[16]

35. The SDR also provided some detail on the equipment required to support the new type of expeditionary operations that it envisaged. Those included:

- new strategic lift assets, both C17 heavy-lift aircraft and Roll-on Roll-off shipping;
- a new helicopter carrier;
- attack helicopters;
- additional support helicopters;
- an increase in the provision of ISTAR assets including Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs);
- a modernised air transport fleet; and
- the creation of two Joint Force Logistic Component Headquarters.

36. The SDR acknowledged that "major equipments take years to develop". While it identified no definitive timescales for its proposed changes, the MOD did publish a series of targets in December 1998 as part of their Public Service Agreement 1999-2002.[17] Those included establishing the Full Joint Rapid Reaction Forces Capability by October 2001 and the Joint Helicopter Command by April 2000.

37. The SDR emphasised the importance of investment in ISTAR assets "not only to maintain a qualitative edge in combat but to facilitate the often rapid-decision-making needed in complex political circumstances".[18]

38. The SDR stated that a range of advanced systems were planned or already entering service, including the airborne ground surveillance radar, Astor and a battlefield unmanned target acquisition vehicle, Phoenix.

39. In July 2002, the MOD published The Strategic Defence Review: A New Chapter – an update on the SDR's progress and a consideration of the "UK's defence posture and plans" in light of the 9/11 attacks.[19]

40. On the Armed Forces' ability to conduct multiple, simultaneous operations, the MOD wrote:

> "The capability of our forces is strained not just by the scale of operations, but by the number of simultaneous or near-simultaneous operations. Since the SDR we have assumed that we should plan to be able to undertake either a single major operation (of a similar scale and duration to our contribution to the Gulf War in 1990-91), or undertake a more extended overseas deployment on a lesser scale (as in the mid-1990s in Bosnia), while retaining the ability to mount a second substantial deployment – which might involve a combat brigade and appropriate naval and air forces – if this were made necessary by a second crisis. We would not, however, expect both deployments to involve war-fighting or to maintain them simultaneously for longer than 6 months."

41. The MOD had "analysed a set of plausible and realistic scenarios" to assess the demands potentially faced by the UK overseas. That work had taken account of lessons learned from operations, including in Afghanistan. The MOD recognised that the particular scenarios it had envisaged may not be "replicated precisely in real life", but they did allow the MOD to "draw general conclusions about the capabilities that may be particularly important".

42. In assessing capabilities for operations abroad, the MOD concluded that the SDR was "generally taking our Armed Forces in the right direction, but reinforced the growing importance" already attached to "network-centric capability". That concept had "emerged substantially in the 1991 Gulf Conflict" and "demonstrated how precision weapons and shared information technologies could be linked together to produce devastating military effects with unparalleled speed and accuracy".

43. Network-centric capability had three elements:

- sensors (to gather information);
- a network (to fuse, communicate and exploit the information); and
- strike assets to deliver military effect.

44. The MOD stated that it had already invested in a range of sensors, including airborne stand-off surveillance such as Nimrod MRA4, battlefield UAVs and communications (including BOWMAN).

Preparing for the post-conflict phase

45. The planning and procurement of equipment for the post-conflict phase (Phase IV) was constrained by the lack of an agreed concept of operations (CONOPS).

46. Wider planning for the post-conflict phase is addressed in Section 6.5.

47. The funding arrangements for the procurement of equipment are addressed in Section 13.1.

48. From 21 January 2003, Lord Bach, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State and Minister for Defence Procurement, was asked by Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, to take temporary responsibility for the progression of UORs. Lord Bach's role, and the weekly meetings he chaired with senior officials to consider progress, is addressed more extensively in Section 6.3.

49. On 7 February, Air Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Equipment Capability) (DCDS(EC)) from April 2002 to May 2003, advised Lord Bach that an agreement in principle had been reached with the Treasury to continue funding "small scale UORs" for operations following the combat phase:

> "We are starting to identify potential UORs for aftermath operations but will need a robust concept of operations if we are to secure Treasury agreement to fund such measures. Initial plans are being developed by PJHQ and are being taken forward by DCDS(C) staff, but must be seen in light of US plans and the wider Government context for which the FCO has the lead."[20]

50. In an update to Lord Bach on 28 February, Rear Admiral Charles Style, Capability Manager (Strategic Deployment), wrote that the MOD continued to "identify, prioritise and refine potential UORs" for Phase IV.[21]

51. RAdm Style wrote key enhancements that were "likely to be required" included:

- force protection against the asymmetric threat, particularly for elements of the air transport fleet; and
- long-term infrastructure enhancements.

52. On 14 March, RAdm Style reported to Lord Bach that the Treasury had accepted in principle that some additional resources from the Reserve[22] would be needed for Phase IV UORs.[23]

53. RAdm Style wrote that work was continuing to clarify and better define UOR requirements for Phase IV: 26 had been identified as high priority "regardless of the CONOPS" and a further 84 possible UORs had been identified by Front Line Commands but would remain "below the line" until the CONOPS had been developed further.

54. On 21 March, AM Stirrup reported to Lord Bach that PJHQ had endorsed USURs for 10 high-priority UORs for Phase IV, including maritime communications, aircraft protection and Explosive Ordnance Disposal (EOD) capabilities.[24]

[24] Minute DCDS(EC) to PS/Minister(DP), 21 March 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC UORs'.

55. The full list of UORs, including 48 measures deemed to be "below the line", was awaiting confirmation of the CONOPS, which would be submitted to the Chiefs of Staff the following week.

56. AM Stirrup provided an update to the Chiefs of Staff on 28 March.[25] He asked the Chiefs to note that 65 potential UORs had been identified, of which 33 were "likely to be needed in any aftermath scenario", the other 32 were on hold until the "way ahead" became clearer.

57. The potential UORs identified included requirements for force protection (such as Defensive Aids Suite for air transport and support helicopters), infrastructure enhancements, and ISTAR enhancements to aid drawdown.

58. Phase IV UORs were "being co-ordinated with the developing policy on recuperation".

59. AM Stirrup stated:

> "Despite the understandable lack of clarity over CONOPS for Phase IV, we are making every effort to get ahead of the game."

60. The MOD's preliminary discussions with the Treasury about Phase IV funding indicated that officials would "agree to some further access to the Reserve". It was unclear whether that would be sufficient to cover the 65 measures already identified or whether the criteria for access to the Reserve would encompass the full range of measures to be sought.

61. The MOD intended to make "a formal approach to the Treasury within the next week". Depending on the outcome, AM Stirrup wrote: " … we may have to prioritise Phase IV UORs further and/or to make adjustments to in-year priorities to accommodate remaining measures within the Defence budget."

62. AM Stirrup stated:

> "Unlike previous UOR tranches, we have no firm time by which Phase IV measures have to be effective if they are to qualify for consideration. We are, though, using a yardstick of six months as a guideline. Where measures have a longer lead time (for example Defensive Aids Suite on large aircraft), we will need to address them within the normal EP process."

[25] Minute DCDS(EC) to COSSEC, 28 March 2003, 'Iraq Contingency Planning – Urgent Operational Requirements for Phase 4'.

63. Lt Gen Reith sent an assessment of the threat in the UK's Area of Operations to Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, CDS, on 29 March.[26] In his covering minute, Lt Gen Reith wrote that predictions about the latter stages of Phases III and IV were "more difficult to ascertain" and they largely depended on "the progress of the Coalition campaign, forces assigned to security tasks, etc". He continued:

> "However, for the moment we are dealing with a spectrum of threats ranging from regular to terrorism. As we progress operations the regular forces threat will be eliminated and we will eventually be left with a residual terrorist threat, as is already the case in some areas we control, such as Umm Qasr."

64. The assessment stated that the threat, in addition to the indirect threats posed by surface to surface missiles, fell broadly into three categories:

- Conventional forces where Coalition Forces do not hold ground and RA [Iraqi Regular Army] forces are still deployed.
- "Asymmetric forces" including Fedayeen, Ba'ath Party officials and militia, "other regime officials", opportunists and criminals and the dissatisfied population.
- Foreign terrorists including Palestinian and "other committed Islamic groups" and the Iraq-based Iranian dissident group Mujahideen e Khalq (MEK) who were "known" to operate in the South of Iraq. There was "no physical evidence of these threats materialising as yet".

65. On 3 April, Lt Gen Reith produced a draft "operational concept" for Phase IV.[27] He wrote that Phase IV operations would begin in southern Iraq "within days" but that the backdrop to their implementation was "uncertain and changing". The baseline conditions from which they would operate were "far from clear" and "important issues", such as the level of military involvement, remained unresolved. While the paper detailed the military's potential tasks and capability, its focus was on force levels and it did not cover equipment.

66. The Inquiry has seen no evidence of any further comments on the draft.

67. The record of Lord Bach's meeting on 14 April stated:

> "Phase IV UORs remain a problem. Although CJO [Lt Gen Reith] has a draft in hand, we are still without a defined CONOPS. This limits our ability to plan for and procure such items."[28]

[28] Minute APS/Min(DP) to MA/DCDS(EC), 14 April 2003, 'Iraq: Op TELIC – UORs'.

68. It is not clear precisely when the draft was finalised, but Lt Gen Reith stated in a paper on 14 April that the operational concept had been agreed.[29] The development of the operational concept is addressed in Section 8.

69. Lt Gen Reith produced two papers on the roulement and recovery of UK forces.[30] On the operational requirement for UK land forces he wrote:

> "In broad terms a mix of capabilities will be needed at each 'strongpoint', providing the local commander with maximum flexibility. This will include the retention of some armour, armoured/mechanised infantry and artillery support, but would increasingly rely on operations 'amongst the people' on foot. The ability to 'find' and remove hostile elements is critical; ISTAR/HUMINT [human intelligence] will continue to be required. Reserves, in some cases with mobility provided by hels [helicopters], would be required to surge into rural areas … Force protection requirements are likely to increase as the UK occupies permanent bases. Additional companies may be needed to provide security, possibly provided by the TA."

70. For battlefield helicopters, Lt Gen Reith suggested that the main force should consist of:

- five Chinook;
- five Sea King or Puma; and
- five Lynx, with Sea King and Puma operating only at night, or some eight Chinook, but with "potential longer term ramifications for the fleet".

71. Lt Gen Reith suggested that Lynx could be used to provide aerial surveillance but that the deployment of Puma, Gazelle or an Islander aircraft would be "more sensible" although they could "only be provided at the expense of the capability currently deployed in Northern Ireland".

72. On equipment husbandry, Lt Gen Reith stated:

> "Time and cost prevent the procurement of further environment and protection UOR enhancements to equipment. This will require the majority of combat vehicles to remain in theatre."

73. On 15 April, Lt Gen Reith produced an SOR for South-East Iraq for the Chiefs of Staff.[31] In an annex there was an assessment of each of the provinces under the UK's Area of Responsibility (AOR), including a judgement on the levels of consent to the Coalition amongst the local population. That was used as an indicator of whether or not the Coalition faced any threat of attack.

[31] Minute Reith to PSO/CDS, 15 April 2003, 'The Statement of Requirement (SOR) for SE Iraq'.

74. Lt Gen Reith assessed that all provinces coming under the UK's AOR would be at least "relatively stable" with "medium-high" or "high" levels of consent to the Coalition amongst the local population.

75. In a separate annex, there was a table of UK force requirements which assessed that the helicopters required were three Chinook, three Lynx and three Puma or Sea King.

76. By 9 May, the MOD had approved 18 Phase IV measures at a cost of around £87m, and a further 12 were being processed.[32]

77. On 30 May, a list of all the equipment capability UORs approved for the pre-deployment and invasion phases were sent around the MOD with an analysis of how they did or did not address equipment capability gaps.[33] It sought to determine where UOR activity was focused, "both in terms of the capability delivered and also in terms of the relationship between UORs and the Equipment Programme".

78. The capability shortfalls addressed by UORs were:

- network-enabled capability 31 percent;
- force protection 19 percent;
- force projection 12 percent;
- counter-terrorism/Special Forces 7 percent;
- precision strike 3 percent; and
- other 27 percent.

79. The analysis stated that the fact that almost a third of the UORs were required to address shortfalls in network-enabled capability validated "the major balance of investment shift undertaken" in the 2003 Equipment Programme (EP03). That also applied, "albeit to a lesser extent", to the force protection and force projection enhancements.

Improvement in the MOD's procurement process during Op TELIC

80. In August 2004, Major General William Rollo, GOC MND(SE) July to December 2004, asked that "consideration be given to the establishment of an EC [Equipment Capability] staff within HQ MND(SE)".[34]

81. A short study was commissioned in September to determine the feasibility of Maj Gen Rollo's request.[35] The report stated that one of the main difficulties "was in the area of capability integration; this being the responsibility of the Chief of Joint Operations (CJO)".

82. The study was endorsed in December and lead elements of the EC Branch deployed to Iraq in January 2005.[36] The MND(SE) EC Branch was formally established in theatre on 24 February 2005, and was staffed by three staff officers.

83. The EC Branch produced an 'Initial Deployment Report' on 10 June 2005, considering its performance so far and making recommendations for its longer-term role.[37]

84. The report stated that the EC Branch initially performed "two discrete roles". The first was the provision of support to the UOR process, on behalf of MND(SE), by providing a central focus for UOR activity and taking the lead in the co-ordination of requirements, capturing activity and SOR staffing. The EC cell's mandate did not explicitly state that EC Branch could "engage authoritatively in UOR integration matters". That had been "identified as a key MND(SE) shortfall" in the report.

85. Although having no formal mandate to do so, the EC cell did engage in UOR integration activity, which had meant creating appropriate structures and procedures to support the effective integration of UOR capabilities. The cell established a "Capability Integration Working Group (CIWG) framework, formalised Capability Integration Plans (CIP), and ensuring that theatre capability issues were addressed across the Defence Lines of Development (DLOD)".[38] That work had "already proven instrumental in identifying a number of capability issues likely to have an adverse effect on theatre operations" and in identifying action to mitigate those issues. The report stated that the work would enable the EC cell to "deliver greater benefit than its current MND(SE) focused role would normally permit".

86. In the report, the cell recommended that "a broader remit, acting on behalf of CJO" would also enable the EC Branch to deliver greater benefit. The cell did not recommend any changes to EC Branch staffing levels, "due to the continued evolution of the Branch … and the awaited outcome of this report".

87. The report contained a number of lessons:

- The formation and deployment of the EC Branch was "too late to deliver maximum benefit to the operation". Maximum benefit of an EC Branch capability would be realised "if it is embedded within the force prior to or immediately after deployment in order to facilitate the staffing and subsequent integration of Urgent Operational Requirement".

- The EC Branch was "constrained in its operation due to the lack of an agreed and authoritative Directive". The report recommended that operational and EC chains should "develop and agree an appropriate Directive comprising TOR [Terms of Reference], roles and responsibilities and CONOPS".
- The Customer Two focus and procedures for the integration of UOR capabilities deployed directly to an operational theatre was "not clear". It cited the need to implement the Standing Instruction from 26 November 2004.

88. In his statement for the Inquiry, Air Chief Marshal Sir Glenn Torpy, CJO from July 2004 to March 2006, described the role of PJHQ as:

> "… to act as the interface between the in-theatre force and the MOD and Front Line Commands (FLC), particularly in ensuring that the in-theatre force is provided with the wherewithal to deliver its objectives. This required a constant dialogue at every level, between the MOD, PJHQ, FLC and in-theatre force."[39]

89. ACM Torpy wrote that he had "inherited a Joint force structure … that was appropriately sized to deliver the military objectives" he had been given; and that the in-theatre commanders, including the GOC MND (SE), were required to conduct a Force Level Review every six months to "validate their force requirements". Those reviews were "undertaken in consultation with the PJHQ" and "presented to the CDS (and the Chiefs of Staff) for endorsement". That "imposed an important level of discipline" and "provided the vehicle for force level increases if conditions in a particular component demanded additional capability".

90. On 10 October 2006, the extent to which capability gaps were being anticipated in UK theatres was raised by General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, Vice Chief of Defence Staff, following a meeting about helicopter availability in Afghanistan.[40]

91. On 27 October, Gen Granville-Chapman's Private Office wrote to Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, CJO, requesting a report on "how effective we currently are and how we might be more so" in predicting emerging capability requirements and reporting these back to the UK after "the recent debate on what capabilities are needed for operations" had "thrown the spotlight" on the issue.[41]

92. Gen Granville-Chapman had recently discussed potential improvements with Major General Richard Applegate, MOD Capability Manager (Battlespace Manoeuvre), who thought:

> "… we used to deploy people to theatres specifically to proactively keep current and future requirements under review; the added advantage of this was that they could also keep theatre informed of [sic] was being done for them at home, for example on UORs."

93. Lt Gen Houghton replied on 9 November, inviting Gen Granville-Chapman to note:

> "I intend to formalise the PJHQ procedures to deliver systematic and coherent progress in conjunction with the MOD sponsored Capabilities Working Group …
> "We still need to improve our processes for identifying the EC [Equipment Capability] dimension of emerging theatre CONOPS which lay in the domain of the early years of the EP [Equipment Programme] rather than in the UOR process."[42]

94. Lt Gen Houghton wrote that the EC cell's "primary purpose" was to identify all capability requirements. Future capability definition was determined between PJHQ, MND(SE), Multi-National Forces-Iraq (MNF-I) and the DECs.

95. Lt Gen Houghton stated: "In my judgement, EC definition and requirements management in Op TELIC is systematic, coherent and effective."

96. As a proposed improvement, Lt Gen Houghton stated:

> "Better interaction between MOD staff and theatres would enhance comprehension of the operating environment and keep theatre commanders abreast of progress."

97. In conclusion, Lt Gen Houghton stated:

> "… I am not so convinced that we are as good at matching up the EC dimension of emerging CONOPS in the slightly longer time-frame. We are looking at the issue, which is central to the future role of the PJHQ in influencing the early years of the EP, but beyond the time-frame which is appropriate for the UOR process."

98. In September 2007, the MOD's Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC) published an audit of force protection which highlighted the need for a better articulation of the risk to which the military would be exposed during operations.[43] The report is addressed in further detail later in this Section.

[43] Report DOC, September 2007, 'Directorate of Operational Capability Protection of the Deployed Force Operational Audit Report 1/07'.

99. In November 2007, the MOD produced a force protection policy which has remained under "constant review".[44] It is unclear from the evidence how many force protection policies preceded this version but the MOD has been unable to find any individual force protection policies before November 2007.

100. The MOD told the Inquiry that the version dated 21 May 2015 "defines risk ownership and governance more clearly than its predecessors".[45] The MOD said that this had been integrated into wider MOD risk management processes which had also been revised.

101. The MOD said that the Operational Commander (which for Iraq was the CJO), was accountable to CDS for understanding, quantifying and reducing risk to the force and mission respectively. That risk response may require changes to activities or capabilities.

102. On 31 August 2010, an analysis of the land operation in Iraq was published on behalf of the Chief of the General Staff by Brigadier Ben Barry.[46] It was known as "the Barry Report".

103. On specifying equipment requirements, the report stated:

> "It appears for much of this period the mechanism for formulating new capability requirements was sub-optimal. Where there was a strong coherent sponsor in the Army or MOD there was more chance of requirements being quickly identified and UORs succeeding. Difficulties experienced at the start of this period [2005] were overcome to a certain extent by fielding Equipment Capability staff to PJHQ and Basra. But it was not clear who owned the medium term vision for the capability requirements of the theatre and longer term thinking on equipment requirements was inhibited by the lack of campaign continuity."

104. The report said that, where UORs succeeded, "some of these were the result of 'pull' from theatre, others the result of 'push' from equipment staff in the MOD. This was the case with Mastiff, the requirement for which was formulated in London."

105. The report quoted evidence from Lt Gen Applegate:

> "We must recognise that UORs were/are generally reactive and until about 2009 when I managed to convince people to think in campaign terms, there was a tendency to think only six months ahead: some of the solutions could not be delivered in that timescale and were refused … our six-monthitis and lack of a campaign design limited sufficient forward thinking."

Protected mobility and the developing threat to UK troops

Initial deployment of Protected Patrol Vehicles (PPVs) in Iraq

106. The 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR) stated the British Army would comprise four different types of infantry battalions:

- 9 armoured infantry battalions;
- 6 mechanised battalions;
- 3 parachute battalions; and
- 22 light infantry battalions.[47]

107. The 1998 SDR stated that "deployable and mobile" forces, "but with sufficient protection and firepower for war-fighting" would be required for land operations.[48]

108. The Army had an agreed requirement for a family of vehicles to replace existing medium weight armoured vehicles, the Future Rapid Effect System (FRES) programme.

109. In May 2002, AM Stirrup told the House of Commons Defence Committee that FRES was designed to reflect the post-Cold War era.[49] It would focus "much more upon mobility, speed and precision than upon heaviness and armoured defence". It would be introduced "in the latter part" of that decade.

110. On 23 July 2007, an MOD note stated that FRES was designed to fill a capability gap by replacing the Saxon, Combat Vehicle Reconnaissance (Tracked) (CVR(T)) and FV430 wheeled and tracked vehicles.[50]

111. FRES comprised "five families":

- utility – wheeled armoured vehicles, principally to provide protected mobility;
- basic capability utility – vehicles that did not require the same capacity, protection or mobility as the utility family and could therefore be procured more cheaply;
- recce – tracked vehicles to replace the majority of the CVR(T) fleet;
- medium armour – a new capability for a tracked medium weight tank; and
- manoeuvre support – tracked vehicles for general armoured engineering tasks.

112. The programme was expected to deliver over 3,500 wheeled and tracked medium weight armoured vehicles (between 20 and 40 tonnes).

113. General Sir Richard Dannatt, Assistant Chief of the General Staff from 2001 to 2002, told the Inquiry that in 2001-2002 "as we were moving towards an expeditionary era" after the Cold War, the Army had identified a clear requirement for "vehicles that were small and light enough to go into aircraft to be flown to trouble spots, but heavy and capable enough to be useful and usable when they got there".[51] He said that formed the basis of the FRES programme, which had been approved in 2002.

114. Gen Dannatt described FRES as "a rapid programme"; an "urgent" short-to-medium term requirement that "needed to be filled quite quickly". In his view, "85 percent of the solution delivered quickly would have been the right answer". The intention was "to go to the market and see what was out there and procure it":

> "… our aspiration in 2002 was that FRES, the utility vehicle, would come into service from as early from 2007 and better if we could do it, and the money was there because we had made the money available."

115. On 26 June 2003, the DMB considered a "thinkpiece" paper from Mr Colin Balmer, MOD Finance Director, about what strategic guidance the DMB might offer on investment priorities for 2004's Equipment Programme (STP/EP04).[52] It said that the MOD faced some "difficult choices" in a year where its "financial freedom of manoeuvre" would be "limited". There would be "no new resources to distribute", despite a range of cost pressures and new risks emerging.

116. Mr Balmer suggested that some areas of the Equipment Programme represented "vital ground" and "should be protected". Those included network-enabled capability, deployable ISTAR, Combat ID, Nuclear, Biological and Chemical protection capabilities and logistics. He wrote that DMB "might also endorse the need to re-examine ISD and platform numbers against the DPAs with a view to establishing the effect of a deferral … or reductions". Amongst others, that review would specifically consider the FRES programme.

117. The Equipment Programme for 2003 had "continued a shift from quantity to quality" and was consequently "much better balanced" than it had been but "significant shortfalls" remained. It did, however, have "serious" issues of affordability resulting from "formally programmed excesses, unanticipated pressures and industrial factors". The current forecasts suggested that £4bn would need to be cut from the programme over 10 years to bring it in line with the allocated resource. The MOD also needed "to obtain a better understanding of the non-cash costs of ownership of the growing equipment programme, to ensure that it is affordable in resource terms".

118. Mr Balmer's paper was endorsed by DMB on 26 June, which said it should be used as a basis for STP/EP04, although any policy decisions would be considered more fully later in the planning round.[53]

119. At the time of the invasion of Iraq, the Protected Patrol Vehicles (PPVs) in service with the Army were Snatch and Tavern.

120. By 2002, Snatch was already at the end of its planned life In Service.

What is a Protected Patrol Vehicle (PPV)?

A Protected Patrol Vehicle (PPV) is a wheeled vehicle, that provides some ballistic protection to personnel inside.[54]

PPVs were initially designed to carry four people, although more recent models, such as the Mastiff, can carry 10 people. The PPV's purpose is to enable a combination of foot and vehicle-mounted patrols; generally, but not exclusively, within peace support/ counter-insurgency operations. That is distinct from heavier, Armoured Fighting Vehicles (AFVs), which are primarily designed for combat. A PPV must enable one (ideally two) top cover sentries to observe the environment when mobile. PPVs are expected to be able to operate on roads and tracks and need to be agile.

A PPV has to maintain freedom of manoeuvre and mobility to patrol in both urban and semi-rural environments. PPVs provide a less aggressive profile than AFVs, thereby enabling the patrol to be more engaged with local populations.

121. The Snatch Land Rover was designed for operations in Northern Ireland and entered service in 1992.[55] It was also deployed in limited numbers to Kosovo and Macedonia.

122. In March 2000, the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency provided advice to the Defence Procurement Agency (DPA) about the limited levels of protection afforded by the vehicle.[56] It stated:

> "The vehicle was also tested against the RPG 7 [Rocket Propelled Grenade 7] and improvised grenades, as would be expected it does not offer full protection from this type of device."

123. Lieutenant General Graeme Lamb, GOC MND(SE) from July 2003 to December 2003, told the Inquiry that "in Northern Ireland we didn't drive vehicles south of whichever line it was for 20 years because of the threat of massive IEDs [Improvised Explosive Devices] that were being placed in the road".[57]

124. The replacement of Snatch Land Rovers, and Tavern, was being addressed through Project DUCKBOARD, a programme pursing the provision of light protected mobility vehicles for counter-terrorist and public order operations in Northern Ireland from 2007-2008 onwards.[58]

125. A draft User Statement of Requirement (USUR) for Project DUCKBOARD produced on 7 January 2002 said:

> "The current NI [Northern Ireland] patrol vehicles are essential for troop deployment, patrolling urban and rural areas and for administrative tasks. They were procured to counter the threat from low and high velocity small arms, Improvised Explosive Devices (IED), anti-armour weapons, petrol bombs and general hand-held catapulted missiles. In order to afford the troops on the ground an acceptable level of protection, mobility and capacity to counter the threat two vehicles are currently in service, Tavern in the high risk areas and Snatch in the lower risk areas."[59]

126. The USUR noted that the End Service Date for Snatch was 2002 but it was anticipated that would need to be extended. It concluded that as vehicles arising out of Project DUCKBOARD entered service, Snatch and Tavern would be phased out of service.

Tactics, Techniques and Procedures (TTPs)

The features and capabilities of a vehicle, or any other platform, are only one element of protection.

The military rely on Tactics, Techniques and Procedures (TTPs) to avoid being located, identified or targeted. Devising successful TTPs is part of trying to make UK forces as safe as possible from the likelihood of attack.

Military platforms are provided with other features to act as an additional layer of protection in the event that the TTPs are not successful. This could mean armour being placed on the outside of a vehicle, electronic countermeasures, or it could be enhanced surveillance equipment. A solution cannot be applied universally but will depend on the nature of the threat.

DEPLOYING PPVS TO IRAQ

127. Despite the decision in the 1998 SDR to shift the focus towards a capability for expeditionary operations, no concept of operations for PPVs had been identified in mid-2003 and there were no definitive timescales for the provision of vehicles.

128. PPVs were not deployed during the invasion of Iraq and unarmoured Land Rovers were initially used for patrols.

129. The MOD Directorate [of] Equipment Capability (Special Projects) (DEC(SP)) hosted a PPV workshop on 16 July 2003.[60] It was attended by MOD teams and stakeholders, including representatives from Headquarters Land Forces.

130. A DEC(SP) representative "reiterated his belief that the capability gap was essentially three fold:

a. the enduring NI [Northern Ireland] type requirement;
b. the emerging wider requirement for light forces engaged on operations such as in the Balkans and in Iraq;
c. the enduring requirement for protected mobility for specialist users such as Royal Engineers Explosive Ordinance Disposal …"

131. A range of procurement options for a capability to meet the requirement were set out at the workshop, including options to extend the life of Snatch by 10 years, a commercial off-the-shelf purchase or the up-armouring of an in-service vehicle such as the Pinzgauer.

132. It was agreed at the meeting that a coherent statement of the concept of operations, threat assessment and payload requirement should be provided by the end of August. HQ Land would facilitate a trial of Snatch, and possibly Tavern, in Iraq.

133. There was limited intelligence on the conditions of southern Iraq before the invasion but there were warnings from the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) about the size, attitudes and capabilities of tribes in the area. That is addressed in Section 6.2.

134. A significant and increasing threat to UK forces in Iraq from Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs) was emerging as early as July 2003.

[60] Minutes, 17 July 2003, 'Protected Patrol Vehicle Workshop Wednesday 16 July 2003'.

What is an Improvised Explosive Device (IED)?

An IED is a bomb constructed and activated in ways other than through conventional military action. The types most commonly encountered in Iraq were:

Radio-Controlled IED (RCIED): This uses a radio signal to initiate detonation – a number of different commercial devices were used in Iraq such as doorbells, burglar alarms and radio-controlled cars.[61] Radio-controlled detonation meant that an explosion on a specific target could be initiated by an operator situated a safe distance away. Those were the most commonly used type of IED in Iraq between 2003 and mid-2005. UK electronic countermeasures were used to jam the detonation signal.

Command Wire IED (CWIED): This uses a wire to transmit the signal to detonate.[62] It is a retrograde form of technology and had the disadvantage of requiring a wire dug into the ground, or concealment through other means, but they became more common in Iraq from 2006 onwards as they were immune to any form of electronic countermeasure.

Explosively Formed Projectile (EFP): A directional charge designed to defeat armour by using the energy of the explosive to create a projectile that travels at between one and three kilometres per second towards its target.[63] EFPs were commonly used as charges for IEDs in Iraq from mid-2004 onwards.

Passive Infrared IED (PIR IED): An evolution from RCIEDs where passive infrared beams are used remotely to detonate IEDs. The first of those attacks in MND(SE) was in May 2005 and indicated an attempt to circumvent the UK's electronic countermeasures.

135. On 2 July 2003, the JIC issued an Assessment about potential flashpoints in Iraq over the next two to three years.[64] It focused on "potential negative outcomes rather than positive ones".

136. The JIC judged that extremist groups currently posed a direct threat to Coalition Forces, but:

> "For now, the activities of these groups are largely unco-ordinated. However, it is likely that the links between groups will become stronger."

137. The Assessment stated that there had been no sign of an organised campaign of violence against Coalition Forces by Shia groups "so far". There had, however, been reports that the two main armed Shia groups (the Badr Corps and the followers of Muqtada al-Sadr) had "recently been trying to acquire large quantities of weapons". The JIC stated that there were indications that they were "preparing for intra-Shia conflict (as opposed to anti-Coalition activity)". That would add to instability and it was "probable" that Coalition Forces would "be caught up in violence".

138. The JIC also stated that:

- Lebanese Hizballah had "a small but threatening presence in Iraq".
- "… although Iran would prefer to influence developments in Iraq by taking advantage of the political process", it would "retain the option of causing trouble for the Coalition".

139. On 7 July, a Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) paper, circulated at a working level within the MOD, stated that Radio-Controlled IEDs (RCIEDs) and their components had been found in the UK Area of Operations since early April.[65] The paper did not speculate on the origin of the material.

140. On 30 July, Lt Gen Reith informed the Chiefs of Staff that there was "an increasing use of more sophisticated IEDs, and attacks against Iraqi police and locals employed by the Coalition".[66] There was a discussion about whether the UK should support the US in developing RCIED countermeasures and Lieutenant General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Commitments), was directed to "assess the scope of the issue".

141. It was reported at the next Chiefs of Staff meeting on 6 August that Lt Gen Fry's paper had been postponed "pending further consultation".[67] In the actions recorded from the meeting, it stated that the paper would be discussed on 13 August.

142. The minutes also recorded that the US Combined Joint Task Force 7 (CJTF-7) was to establish an IED intelligence cell to provide an "immediate in theatre threat analysis of IEDs".

143. A DIS paper produced on 31 July recorded that RCIEDs had been used in the UK Area of Operations around Basra on 14 and 28 July:

> "The former Iraqi regime had a proven advanced IED capability including RC methods … Latterly there have been many (double figures) attacks against Coalition Forces believed to have involved RCIEDs, as well as significant finds of RC-related hardware …
> "There are a large number of former regime and ex-military personnel skilled in constructing and deploying IEDs who remain at large within Iraq and their involvement in RCIED incidents would raise the level of threat. There is also the potential for foreign groups opposed to the Coalition presence to appear within Iraq and become engaged in attacks. If organisations such as Hizballah (that has an extremely potent and proven RCIED capability) were to do this, then the RC threat would increase very significantly."[68]

144. A PJHQ operational summary from 4 August recorded:

> "The use of IEDs against Coalition Forces is increasing and there remains no shortage of raw materials across Iraq from which to draw upon."[69]

145. On 7 August, Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces, told the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation that: "Improvised Explosive Devices posed an increasing threat."[70]

146. In August 2003, the security situation in Baghdad continued to deteriorate. A bomb exploded outside the UN headquarters on 19 August, killing 22 UN staff and visitors. Further attacks included a bomb outside the Jordanian Embassy and several unsuccessful attempts to shoot down Coalition aircraft.

147. The implications of those attacks are addressed in Section 9.2.

148. On 27 August, the Chiefs of Staff were briefed that Maj Gen Lamb was reviewing manpower and equipment requirements.[71] The Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) was "constrained by force protection" and:

> "Although they had ordered armoured vehicles and were reviewing security until this was in place, they were confined to the barracks. Unless a plan drawn up by experts, managed by technically qualified personnel, was put immediately into action, then the consent of the people in the MND(SE) AO [Area of Operations] could be irrevocably lost with all the consequences of strategic failure."

149. Air Chief Marshal Sir Anthony Bagnall, Vice Chief of the Defence Staff, invited Major General Robin Brims, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations, to "remind theatre that the question of force protection needed to be looked at in the broadest way, taking into account not only local expediencies but also strategic implications", especially when taking decisions about helmets and body armour.

150. Maj Gen Brims pointed out that "the British Army did not have any wheeled vehicles with sufficient armour against the threat". ACM Bagnall invited Air Vice Marshal Clive Loader, Assistant Chief of Defence Staff (Operations), to investigate the issue. Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, Chief of the Air Staff, pointed out that "what was important was knowing what may be required in advance so that any enhancements could be put in place quickly".

151. On 1 September, MND(SE) produced a Forces and Resources Review to examine the resources required in MND(SE), for both short-term and enduring operations.[72]

[71] Minutes, 27 August 2003, Chiefs of Staff meeting.
[72] Paper MND(SE), 1 September 2003, 'HQ MND(SE) Forces and Resources Review'.

152. The Review noted that CPA(South) had "yet to extend its influence" beyond Basra City. The arrival of Sir Hilary Synnott as Head of Coalition Provisional Authority (South) was the "first recent sign of this state of affairs improving; but without the people, protected mobility, communications and life support Sir Hilary will not have the means at his disposal to implement the changes he requires". It said that Governorate Teams were also "under resourced" and "barely exist" outside Basra.

153. In the short term, 16 vehicles were recommended (four Land Rovers and 12 white fleet 4x4s[73]) to support the staff in Governorate Teams. There was an additional requirement for six "stripped down Land Rovers to provide top cover escorts" for CPA(South) staff operating inside Basra City, including for consultants.

154. The Review stated that the enduring requirement for greater surveillance capability was "urgent". The existing force protection measures limited the ability to "observe a situation from the ground".

155. The Review articulated the requirement for light protected mobility:

> "The threat posed to CF [Coalition Forces] within Basra City from IED, RPG and small arms attacks is currently being countered by the use of stripped-down Land Rovers with top cover sentries. This necessarily carries a risk to the top cover vehicles from attack, particularly from IEDs. Force protection will be improved by the provision of up-armoured 4x4 vehicles that meet the broad definitions below. Replacing the full complement of this in the UK Bde [brigade] would require of the order of 420 vehicles. The minimum quantity to provide essential protected movement in Basra and Maysan is 228. Any lower number will be put to good use in accordance with priorities. The requirement is for:
> - An agile wheeled vehicle capable of swift acceleration and speed in excess of 60 mph.
> - A high degree of protection against small arms fire and blast devices.
> - A cupola to allow top cover protection to deter attackers, particularly those deploying anti-armour weapons and small arms.
> - … [G]rills to give windows protection against thrown objects, both to enhance routine protection and to enable its use in public order situations where a Warrior [AFV] may be too threatening or unable to manoeuvre in small streets."

156. The Review also "strongly recommended" that at least one battlegroup in each UK brigade be equipped with four companies[74] of Warrior as it was the "only infantry vehicle with protection against RPG".

[73] A white fleet 4x4 is an unarmoured Army vehicle.
[74] A military company is a type of military unit that consists of between 80 and 250 soldiers.

157. Maj Gen Brims provided a written update to the Chiefs of Staff on the Forces and Resources Review on 2 September.[75] He wrote:

> "The deployment of protected mobility is key to improving the FP [force protection] available to soldiers and to enabling the posture of the force to be changed to meet emerging threats. The initial assessment is that a minimum of 228 vehicles will be required – further detailed work is still needed to identify the most appropriate platform from those that have been identified as being available and it may be that an 'in-service' quick fix is required using NI [Northern Ireland] and pool assets."

158. The Review was discussed by the Chiefs of Staff on 3 September.[76] General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), directed that the request for additional Snatch vehicles should be met by drawing from the Northern Ireland reserve battalions in the first instance.

159. On 4 September, Mr Hoon's Private Office sent a letter to No.10 setting out the outcome of the Forces and Resources Review.[77] It stated that roughly 1,200 servicemen and women were being deployed; an "early increase of 12 percent to the UK forces currently in theatre". The extra personnel would be supported by the "deployment of a quantity of armoured patrol vehicles, some of which will be drawn from Northern Ireland". That would have "a limited, but manageable effect" on the UK's ability to "conduct current operations in support of the PSNI [Police Service of Northern Ireland]".

160. On 5 September, a further meeting of the PPV Working Group was held "to develop a list of issues and associated options to meet the perceived requirement for the future deployment of PPV in support of Op TELIC".[78]

161. The record of the meeting stated that the "initial verbal request" was for 228 vehicles for delivery to Iraq within two weeks, as per the Forces and Resources Review. All representatives present at the meeting agreed that was an "unrealistic" timetable. A DEC(SP) representative set out a phased approach to meeting the requirement, the final phase being that enough vehicles were provided for two brigades.

162. Whilst there was currently no SOR, information provided from theatre indicated a requirement "closely aligned to those for the Tavern/Snatch vehicles currently in use in Northern Ireland". A footnote stated:

> "Due to the limited Tavern fleet and the expected high cost of procuring similar vehicles, the PPV protection requirement must be realistic in order to permit a timely and cost effective solution to the UOR."

163. To meet the immediate requirement of 228 vehicles, the merits of deploying either Snatch or Tavern were debated including on the grounds of protection, mobility, capacity and sustainability. The need for climate modifications and communications adaptations was also considered.

164. The Group concluded that Snatch was the preferred option because there were Integrated Logistic Support issues and reliability concerns with Tavern. It acknowledged that the "protection levels afforded by Snatch may not meet the requirement to counter the local threat".

165. Other solutions considered were:

- fitting the in-service Wolf (a Land Rover variant) or Pinzgauer with appliqué armour – discounted because of the scarcity of suitable vehicles;
- refurbishing the Armoured Patrol Vehicle (APV)1.5 awaiting disposal – discounted because of the poor mechanical condition of the fleet and the "political implications" of utilising equipment marked for disposal;
- refurbishing Snatch – discounted as an immediate response because of the timescales and level of technical risk but considered a possible long-term solution to Project DUCKBOARD; and
- procuring new vehicles – discounted as an immediate response because of the timescales but considered a valid solution in the medium-to-long term.

166. The Group recommended that:

- the deployment of Snatch be taken forward to meet the timescale for the provision of 228 vehicles for Iraq in four weeks; and
- a new vehicle purchase, with protection levels similar to or better than Snatch, be considered to meet the requirement of enough vehicles for two brigades within four to six months.

167. 180 Snatch Land Rovers were dispatched from Northern Ireland to Iraq on 11 September.[79]

168. An operational analysis for Project DUCKBOARD was produced at the end of September, making a number of recommendations for further analysis to examine the requirements for a "Rest Of [the] World" PPV capability.[80] That is covered in the Vector operational analysis later in this Section.

169. Lt Gen Lamb told the Inquiry that there was a need for "a less aggressive means to transport people around" but "the need to armour it was self-evident".[81] Lt Gen Lamb said he "was acutely aware that … Snatch was not designed [for 21st century urban warfare]" and "so one was stuck with a difficult set of circumstances".

170. Lt Gen Lamb added:

> "Yet … what have you got available at short order? Well … better have a Snatch than a Land Rover."

171. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff (CGS) from February 2003 to August 2006, told the Inquiry:

> "Snatch Land Rovers were deployed to Iraq because they were available or could be made available as we drew down from Northern Ireland, and without them it would have been completely soft-skinned Land Rovers. That's where the state of the equipment inventory was at that point.
> "The Snatch Land Rover was only designed to give protection from low velocity rounds and shrapnel and it wasn't set out to do anything else, but it was better than a completely unprotected vehicle."[82]

The appearance of Explosively Formed Projectiles (EFPs) and the UK's response

172. A JIC Assessment on 3 September judged that the security environment would "remain poor" and "probably worsen over the next year".[83] The JIC stated that the "most frequent attacks" had been against Coalition Forces and "increasingly" were from small IEDs. Those using them had "shown growing competence, determination and sophistication". The JIC assessed that IED attacks would become more effective.

173. The JIC judged that Shia consent was "fragile and eroding". The guidance of "senior Iraqi Shia clerics" had been "to give the Coalition a year", but the recent attacks were "likely to have shortened this timeline substantially". If acquiescence turned to hostility, that "would have the most serious consequences for the security situation, particularly in southern Iraq". If the Coalition was "perceived to be impotent", the Shia would "take law and order into their own hands". Reporting indicated that supporters of the Muqtada al-Sadr were "acquiring weapons" and "planning attacks on Coalition targets".

174. In addition, the JIC judged that Iran and Hizballah were:

> "… probably inciting violent anti-Coalition protests and other disruptive activity. Their incitement probably falls short of directly ordering attacks on Coalition Forces. But after the death of Ayatollah al-Hakim [the leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq], Iran will be reconsidering its approach."

[83] JIC Assessment, 3 September 2003, 'Iraq: Threats to Security'.

175. In September, the DIS produced a review of the major threats from IEDs in Iraq, intended "to provide analysis and outlook on current terrorist activities".[84] The review emphasised Iraq's "long history of state sponsored manufacture of complex IEDs, as in the case of the failed 1993 'Bush Bomb'", and stated that the regime had used an "IED strategy" as a means of extending domestic and foreign policy. During the conflict there had been significant finds of radio-controlled hardware and:

> "All indications show that the Iraqi regime planned to continue to adapt its well tested pre-conflict IED strategy and production methods in a guerrilla conflict after the regime capitulated …"

176. The review stated that RCIEDs accounted for around 50 percent of all IED incidents.

177. On 25 September, the JIC reported that attacks against Coalition Forces in the South were at the "lowest level since June" but it also judged that Shia militias were emerging in the South.[85] The tactics of armed groups in Iraq continued to evolve, "including the increased use of more sophisticated IEDs and more elaborate attacks".

178. A JIC Assessment on 15 October stated that the South remained "relatively calm", although some former regime elements were aiming to "foment greater unrest".[86] The JIC noted that reporting that indicated "the return of a specific bomb maker to Basra" was of "particular concern".

179. On 5 November, the JIC reported that the situation in the South remained "relatively calm" but there had been a spate of IED attacks in Basra province in mid-October including one using a sophisticated remote control device.[87] The JIC also stated that IEDs were the "single most common form of attack" in Iraq, that they were "becoming more sophisticated", and that stand-off attacks using remote control were "becoming more common".

180. On 18 November, Mr David Williams, MOD Director Directorate Capabilities, Resources and Scrutiny (DCRS), wrote to Mr John Dodds, Head of the Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team in the Treasury, seeking advice on how to take forward new force protection measures within the agreed UOR "ceiling" of £550m.[88] Mr Williams flagged a new requirement for £73m to fund an electronic countermeasures (ECM) project, Project L*.[89] Mr Williams' letter also sought funding for aerial surveillance, which is addressed later in this Section with regards to ISTAR provision.

181. Mr Williams wrote that the deterioration in Iraq's security had led "to an increase in demand for force protection measures, including armoured (Land Rover type) patrol vehicles and specialist counter-terrorist equipment". He said that, although the MOD had looked at utilising Northern Ireland's resources to meet the requirement, there was a need to ensure that the equipment was "appropriate to the threat in Iraq". He added: "Some development effort is likely to be required."

182. Mr Williams outlined the requirement in an attached annex:

> "The most serious threat facing UK personnel in Iraq (military and civilian) is that from Radio-Controlled (RC) IEDs. It took PIRA [the Provisional IRA] some years to develop RCIEDs and associated tactics successfully. By contrast, as a result of state-sponsored activity, FRL (Former Regime Loyalists) forces, already well equipped and experienced, were able to mount attacks of similar technical sophistication in Baghdad, Basra and elsewhere in Iraq without a pause after the fall of the Ba'athist Regime … A further trend is evident in theatre: terrorist attacks (and tactics and equipment) may be trialled in the US area, but it does not take them long to appear in the UK area."

183. The annex referred to evidence that between 11 July and 31 October 2003 there were 28 IEDs detected in MND(SE); of those, nine employed remote detonation. It stated that one UK serviceman had been killed[90] and there were "various degrees of injury to UK personnel".

184. In the US-controlled areas, IED attacks were occurring at a rate of around 10 per day, with 80 percent of those being radio-controlled.

185. Mr Williams explained that, whilst some existing ECM equipment was effective against threats in Iraq, the most significant threats were new and therefore required a new response. He stated that only about 25 percent of UK vehicles would need to be fitted with equipment on the basis that vehicles moved in groups for mutual protection. He cautioned that, "owing to the high level of its security classification, and the restricted industrial base, there are limits to the manufacture rate" and stated that the first new equipment would arrive in Iraq in December 2003.

186. On 6 January 2004, a briefing note sent to Mr Hoon and Gen Walker stated that the Treasury had "recently agreed" to fund the £73m for Project L*.[91]

187. The question of how that funding could be met was part of wider, ongoing discussions with the Treasury which are referred to later in this Section and set out in Section 13.1.

188. On 16 January, the UOR business case to modify existing Snatch vehicles for deployment in Iraq was approved.[92] The case for the "desertisation" of vehicles was at a cost of £2.2m, with a completion date of May 2004. The modified version of Snatch became known as the "Snatch 1.5" variant.

189. The business case stated:

- While the requirement had originally been for 228 vehicles, only 208 Snatch were available "without an unmanageable impact" on Northern Ireland operations.
- "Recent attacks have highlighted the need for protected mobility capable of providing protection from small arms and IEDs."
- Snatch was not designed for expeditionary operations and modifications to its communications and air conditioning were required for operations in Iraq.
- The modifications were "a short-term solution to meet immediate needs".
- DEC(SP) was reviewing options to provide a more durable medium-term solution, funded from the core equipment programme, "for introduction not before late 2004/2005".
- The other protective vehicles in use, Challenger 2, Warrior, CVR(T) and Saxon, were "not available in sufficient numbers, nor are they appropriate to the majority of tasks due to profile and size".

190. Lieutenant General Andrew Ridgway, Chief of Defence Intelligence (CDI), briefed the Chiefs of Staff on the IED threat on 21 January.[93] He stated:

> "Although it was assessed that the transfer of terrorist technology from North to South Iraq meant MND(SE) could expect an increased threat from IEDs, there was still no evidence of a co-ordinated campaign."

191. In his post-tour report on 30 January, Maj Gen Lamb recorded:

> "There is consistent level of attack at five/six weekly and it is anticipated that this threat will grow."[94]

192. On 8 February, Major General Andrew Figgures, the Senior British Military Representative in Iraq and Deputy Commanding General Multi-National Force-Iraq, reported to Gen Walker and Lt Gen Reith about an attack on one of the Snatch vehicles deployed to Baghdad:

> "Although we were fortunate in this case it raises a number of wider issues of the application of our national doctrine and equipment in this theatre. The Snatch vehicle > undoubtedly saved the lives of the crew by absorbing the majority of the blast … I doubt, however, that it would have withstood the effects of a […] (which is the usual weapon of choice) if it had been rigged up to the remote initiator. This observation and the fact that the C*[95] was fitted in both vehicles and operational indicates that we are still some way short of providing adequate levels of protection for the principal threat in Iraq. In terms of drills, the habit developed in Northern Ireland of deploying top cover to counter direct attack on the vehicle may actually be exposing our soldiers to greater danger from IEDs – a threat not seen in Northern Ireland."[96]

193. Although the rate of attacks against Coalition Forces had levelled off, February 2004 was the worst month for casualties since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime.[97]

194. From March 2004 onwards the deteriorating security situation in Iraq took a serious turn for the worse. That is addressed in Section 9.2.

195. Maj Gen Stewart told the Inquiry that the violence started to increase in "February/March" 2004.[98]

196. Maj Gen Stewart explained that 50 percent of his force was assisting Security Sector Reform (SSR) during this time. He said that SSR continued in April (although it reduced to 25 percent of his force's time) but that "one or two of the major incidents we had was people … actually moving from location to location to try and help the SSR".

PROJECT DUCKBOARD EVOLVES

197. On 3 February 2004, Gen Jackson wrote to Mr Hoon about the impact of maintaining the current and forecast level of military commitment:

> "… in meeting essential short term operational demands we must take care not to prejudice our ability to meet longer term rebalancing goals … Measures in the EP threaten our ability to meet our strategic objectives in the longer term, particularly with regard to introducing a medium weight intervention capability centred on FRES."[99]

198. On 26 February, the DMB agreed a large number of service enhancements and savings measures as part of a Spending Review.[100] That was in response to the imposition of new controls introduced by the Treasury (addressed in Section 13.1).

199. The DMB considered a paper by Mr Trevor Woolley, MOD Finance Director, which detailed all the measures.[101] In relation to PPVs, he referred to Project DUCKBOARD as

200. Mr Woolley wrote that, whilst DUCKBOARD had originally been designed to replace Snatch in Northern Ireland, UK casualties on operations in Macedonia and experiences from operations in Afghanistan and Iraq had "confirmed the requirement for a global family of vehicles offering similar protection levels". To supplement the Snatch vehicles that had been deployed from Northern Ireland to Iraq, he recommended re-profiling the funding of the programme by:

- bringing forward a battlegroup worth of 80 vehicles from 2007-2012 to 2004-2007 (£38.5m over three years); but
- cutting the remaining PPV capability to support a medium scale PPV capability of 222 vehicles that had been profiled between 2007-2014 (£76.2m over seven years).

The overall budget was reduced by 49 percent.

201. On 31 March, the Defence Science and Technology Laboratory (DSTL) produced an operational analysis for a "Rest of [the] World PPV (ROW)" which would later become known as the "Vector" vehicle.[102]

202. DSTL stated that, subsequent to an earlier operational analysis produced in September 2003, Project DUCKBOARD had changed and the emphasis had "shifted from a Snatch replacement in the medium term (ISD [In Service Date] 2007) to providing a PPV (ROW) in the near term (ISD 2005) with an eight year in service life". That would "provide an interim capability between the Snatch OSD [Out of Service Date]" and FRES.

203. It was clear from the operational analysis that DSTL intended to highlight that additional work needed to be done. Its stated aim was simply to summarise its progress to date. Further work was needed because:

- Vector's capacity, mobility and protection Key User Requirements (KURs) were "still only in draft form"; they had not been articulated as part of Project DUCKBOARD's operational analysis.
- The "coherent statement of CONOPS, threat assessment and payload requirement" that had been tasked to "the user community" in the July 2003 workshop had not been developed in time for the DUCKBOARD operational analysis. While further work had been done, and some assumptions about Vector's role had been made, more needed to be done to develop the user requirement.

[102] Report DSTL, 31 March 2004, 'VECTOR Operational Analysis'.

- The user's understanding of how the PPV ROW would be deployed was still developing which meant that the estimated fleet numbers should be re-examined.
- Costs would need to be revised in accordance with all the above factors.

204. The operational analysis acknowledged that PJHQ and 19 Mechanised Brigade had indicated IEDs were "a considerable threat in Iraq" and stated:

> "… Vector is likely to face a broad range of threats. These will range from stones and bricks to RPG and large IEDs. Previous analysis has shown that it is not technically feasible to armour a Vector equivalent to defeat […] and […] blast weapons without it becoming some form of AFV. Therefore it will always be overmatched by these threats. However, if these are the common threats that are to be faced in theatre then a vehicle commensurate with that threat is likely to be deployed e.g. Warrior."

205. Based on the current CONOPS, Vector would "therefore be used in lower threat environments".

206. On 14 April, Main Gate approval was sought for the development and manufacture of 312 Snatch vehicles to "Snatch 2" standard, 208 of which would be for Iraq.[103] That was to "meet immediate operational needs" and would replace the 208 Snatch 1.5 variant vehicles that had previously been dispatched from Northern Ireland. There was an ISD of between December 2004 and February 2005 for 80 of the vehicles.

207. The total procurement cost of the 312 vehicles was £13.01m and would be funded from the Project DUCKBOARD budget. The case stated that the enhancement measures agreed in the 2004 Spending Review was recognition that the requirement for light protected mobility was "expected to grow in future".

208. The aim of the upgrade was defined as:

> "To provide a capability that will afford the user sufficient protection and mobility for framework operations to be conducted in a semi-permissive environment, in both the NI theatre and in support of expeditionary operations worldwide over FYs 04/05 & 05/06."

209. The business case had been produced to satisfy the immediate requirement; the current Snatch fleet was over 10 years old, was in "heavy operational use" and suffered from "chassis corrosion problems". The Specialist Utility Vehicles IPT (Integrated Project Team) had stated that it would "become increasingly difficult to sustain after 18 months on Op TELIC without a substantial upgrade or replacement programme" and "some form of project to maintain the current operational PPV capability" would be "essential in FY 04/05".

[103] Paper DEC(SP), 14 April 2004, 'Business Case URD 1090 SNATCH 2 Protected Patrol Vehicle'.

210. The business case said that it was supported by current operational analysis but a "fully developed justification, in the context of a balance of investment" would be undertaken in support of an "overall Project DUCKBOARD" submission in September 2004, where the requirement for "Snatch 2 in the worldwide role" would also be established. The urgency of the current requirement meant that the balance of investment analysis would not be complete before funds had to be committed. Evidence would be provided in the DUCKBOARD submission to demonstrate that investing in Snatch 2 "early" remained "the most cost effective solution".

211. Four options were considered in the business case:

- do nothing;
- minor refresh;
- major refresh (Snatch 2) – fitting the old protected "pod" on a new base vehicle with upgrades to communications and ECM; or
- a commercial-off-the-shelf solution.

212. The preferred option was the "major refresh". That would not provide additional physical protection; the relevant KUR said that Snatch 2 should have a protection level that was "equivalent to current Snatch".

213. An off-the-shelf purchase was discounted on the grounds of cost and timing.

214. Considering publicity, the business case stated: "There will be considerable interest in Snatch 2 as a result of recent deaths and injuries."

215. In response to a US request for additional UK forces during US operations in Fallujah (see Section 9.2), including an armoured or mechanised battlegroup to provide a theatre-wide reserve, Gen Walker agreed Lt Gen Reith's request to return Warrior vehicles to Iraq on 28 April, to provide a battlegroup reserve for MND(SE).[104]

216. On 11 May, Major General David Richards, Assistant Chief of the General Staff (ACGS), received advice about the impact of Op TELIC's expansion and reinforcement on Headquarters Northern Ireland.[105] A request had been made for 297 Snatch vehicles: 77 vehicles were needed immediately, and an additional 220 over the next three to four months. A request for 350 sets of ECM equipment had also been made.

217. The advice highlighted concerns about the operational implications for Northern Ireland of redeploying Snatch to Iraq, particularly over the marching season. At most, 225 vehicles could eventually be released, but that would fall short of the Op TELIC requirement by 72 vehicles. It was suggested that PJHQ be directed to conduct a full review of their current holdings and future requirement to assess the impact of a shortfall.

218. On 10 June, that concern was reiterated to Maj Gen Richards by Lieutenant General Philip Trousdell, GOC Northern Ireland.[106] He wrote:

> "… it appears that what other theatres think they require is some form of protected mobility. What I require is a protected mobility vehicle which has the size and agility to perform an integral part in riot control … My perception is, therefore, that the requests for support are not being delivered in a coherent manner and this has been particularly true of Snatch, a vehicle that has rapidly become a placebo for many operations."

219. Lt Gen Trousdell warned:

> "… drip feeding the protected mobility requirement from Northern Ireland is not viable in the medium to long term … Too often have we received requests for specific equipment or specific personnel without a clearly defined effect."

220. Maj Gen Richards sent the minute to Lt Gen Fry, commenting:

> "We also need to address the longer term issue as we cannot continue to solve the problem on an ad hoc basis. Given our duty of care responsibilities, should we not look at the issue of protected mobility again and establish a longer term policy that can meet enduring commitments other than NI?"[107]

221. On 11 June, Maj Gen Applegate upgraded the Snatch 2 business case to an "Operational Emergency".[108] It would be taken forward using UOR processes to bring the anticipated ISD from December 2004 to "as early as possible".

222. Maj Gen Applegate wrote that the MOD was "engaged in contingency planning for Op TELIC surge forces". As a result, Mr Hoon and the Chiefs of Staff had "directed" that these forces must be equipped to the same standard as those already in theatre. The industrial timelines precluded any Snatch 2 deployment meeting the "current contingency timetable" which meant that the Snatch 1.5 fleet had been increased by 150 vehicles.

223. On 12 June, a separate USUR was raised by the Royal Engineers, for a "suitable vehicle" that could be used by Explosive Ordnance Disposal (EOD) teams because their existing vehicle, the Snatch Land Rover, provided "inadequate protection".[109]

The Royal Engineers argued that Snatch vehicles placed EOD teams at "unacceptable levels of risk" and reduced "operational capacity, capability, flexibility and effectiveness". They recommended the purchase of an off-the-shelf solution – the Sisu operated by the Swedish Army.

224. The requirement for EOD teams was later identified as a "Type C" requirement and is addressed later in this Section.

225. Lord Bach visited Basra from 27 to 28 April and reported an "almost universally positive" message on equipment.[110] On Project L* his visit report stated:

> "Lord Bach understands that the delivery of vital ECM equipment procured under this UOR is subject to delay. He would welcome advice on this and what is being done to improve matters."

226. On 21 May, an MOD official replied that the L* capability would be fully operational by January 2005 as its outstanding components would start to be delivered in July 2004.[111] The components already delivered would meet 90 to 95 percent of the threats encountered "thus far" in Iraq.

227. The official wrote: "The delays in the delivery of the full L* capability are largely due to the lack of clear threat and technical intelligence from the operational theatre."

228. On 28 June, the UK suffered its first fatality from a roadside IED when Fusilier Gordon Gentle was killed whilst performing top cover duties for a Snatch vehicle in Basra.[112] Two officers who were inside the vehicle survived the blast but suffered serious injuries.

229. The PJHQ operational summary of the incident recorded:

> "The sad death of a UK soldier in an IED attack today does not signal a step change in activity in MND(SE); rather it illustrates how fortunate the UK has been to avoid fatalities over the last few months."[113]

230. The Board of Inquiry into Fusilier Gentle's death concluded that there had been serious delays in fitting the most up-to-date ECM equipment into vehicles and that the IED that killed Fusilier Gentle would have been "inhibited" by that equipment, although there was "insufficient evidence to prove this conclusively".[114]

> "The early decision to deploy Snatch and ECM has saved lives."[115]

232. The first IED attack in Iraq using an Explosively Formed Projectile (EFP) took place against a UK Warrior vehicle in al-Amara in May 2004.[116]

233. On 1 July, Brigadier William Moore, Director Directorate of Equipment Capability (Ground Manoeuvre) (DEC(GM)), advised PJHQ on the performance of the UK's AFVs against recent attacks.[117]

234. Brig Moore wrote that initial assessments suggested that insurgent capabilities, including EFPs, were capable in some circumstances of overmatching armour fitted to Challenger 2 and Warrior vehicles, but they were not "at any significant risk from EFP".

235. Work to identify potential enhancements had begun, although "no platform enhancement measure" in response to EFPs could be considered until an example of the specific threat weapon had been examined. He also proposed a review of TTPs. Brig Moore emphasised the importance of PJHQ highlighting any new anti-armour weapons found in theatre and full reports of past and future incidents to inform further work on armour protection.

236. Brig Moore provided guidance for commanders in Iraq which stated that commanders and AFV crews should "remain aware of the finite limitations of armour".

237. Lieutenant General Sir William Rollo, GOC MND(SE) from July 2004 to December 2004, told the Inquiry that things were "very quiet" when he took over as GOC MND(SE) in July.[118] He said that the Sadrist disturbances from April and May had "died away". Problems started arising again in August with the clash at Najaf which re-ignited attacks on the coalition, but by December Lt Gen Rollo thought "things were relatively on track".

238. Asked by the Inquiry whether there was any difficulty "moving around" at this time, Lt Gen Rollo said that there was "a sufficient number of Warrior fighting vehicles" that could be used when the situation "became very unpleasant".[119] He added:

> "Outside of that, then we were back into Snatch Land Rovers, which at that stage, while … they could clearly be damaged by IEDs, they were remarkably tough against the threat at that time."

239. When asked whether he had been briefed on the threat from EFPs and the predicted growth in the use of ever more sophisticated IED technology when he became CJO in July 2004, ACM Torpy told the Inquiry:

> "Not specifically EFPs. IEDs, yes … it was not a significant threat in 2004 when I took over and it grew …"[120]

THE IMPACT OF THE 2004 SPENDING REVIEW ON FRES

240. During September 2003, the MOD's cash requirement for 2003/04 had risen from £490m to £1,152m. That prompted Mr Gordon Brown, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to impose controls on the MOD's management of its resources. That is addressed in Section 13.1.

241. At the DMB on 1 October, Mr Ian Andrews, MOD Second Permanent Under Secretary, explained that the MOD was now facing a near-cash shortfall of £1.1bn.[121] Part of the MOD's response was to identify near-cash reductions of £300m across the DLO and DPA.

242. Mr Andrews had produced a paper for the Board that set out proposals for those reductions, all of which were accepted. One measure was to defer £13m from the FRES programme (needed to underpin its suggested procurement strategy), which could "delay the programme by a few months".[122]

243. Considering the Equipment Programme on 26 February 2004, the DMB was told by Sir Kevin Tebbit that Treasury controls had rendered it "unaffordable".[123] There was likely to be no increase in resources and there was no scope to take risks. He said that any additional enhancements "must have compensating offsets".

244. The DMB discussed Mr Woolley's paper of proposed enhancements and savings measures, including deferring the FRES ISD by a further year to December 2011.[124] The DMB said that this was a concern and frustrating:

> "But there was a tension between the need for a basic vehicle relatively quickly and a more complex capability downstream."

245. The Assessment Phase for the procurement of FRES was announced on 5 May 2004.[125]

246. On 24 June, in the context of a wider DMB discussion about the risks of meeting the targets on cost and time for major procurement projects, concern was expressed that FRES "was in danger of falling into the trap of over-specification … despite Board injunctions to the contrary".[126] The project would therefore focus on "delivering simpler variants as soon as possible … with more complex variants later on".

247. On 25 June, Maj Gen Richards produced a paper for the Executive Committee of the Army Board (ECAB) on the impact of the DMB's decisions.[127] He wrote that support to current operations "remained the enduring top priority", but between 2004 and 2008, the emphasis should be on developing network-enabling activity, an initial air manoeuvre capability, "and the development of medium weight forces".

248. The "most painful measure" for the Army as a result of the DMB decisions was the effect on the FRES programme. Maj Gen Richards wrote that delays in agreeing the procurement strategy for the programme meant that the ISD had slipped from 2009 to 2010. In addition, the measures agreed by DMB as part of the discussions about the Equipment Programme in February, meant that the ISD could be delayed further to 2012. As a result, the full operating capability for FRES was "unlikely" to be fielded before 2017. That would mean running on existing armoured vehicles and could lead to additional Short Term Plan or Equipment Programme costs elsewhere in the programme.

249. Addressing future requirements, the paper stated that the Army's highest priority for the next 15 years was the development of a rapid intervention capability "with capable medium forces as soon as possible". Given the delay to FRES, "an imaginative and incremental approach" would be needed. ECAB was asked to agree that the priorities for a medium weight capability were:

- Between 2005 and 2009: Development of an initial medium weight capability, "based on in-service equipments, and those about to enter service in the period".
- Between 2010 and 2014: Capable medium weight forces based on the simple FRES variant.
- Beyond 2014: Fully capable medium weight forces, including complex FRES variants.

250. It was also clear from the paper that the Army perceived the costs of the DMB's decision to protect large capital programmes for the Navy and Air Force, in support of an "apparent ambition to deliver a sophisticated capability in every capability area", had been found from "Land programmes"; and that could lead to further cuts in future.

A "TYPE B" VEHICLE

251. In Maj Gen Richards' review of the Equipment Programme for the Army on 25 June, he had stated that, in "the very short term", UORs would allow "an uplift in capability to meet operational requirements".[128] The UK would "be committed to Op TELIC until at least the end of 2006" and "the UK's commitment to Afghanistan could increase in the same timeframe". Operations in Iraq had:

> "… highlighted the need for a mix of heavy ground manoeuvre capability and DCC [Dismounted Close Combat], whilst the requirement for improved protected mobility has been met by the deployment of Snatch from NI and Saxon. Snatch will be replaced by DUCKBOARD beyond 06. The need for a coherent plan to deliver protected mobility vehicles to meet the requirement of both theatres of operation has been highlighted."

252. On 7 July, DEC(SP) set out the next steps on Project DUCKBOARD so a business case could be developed and approved by September.[129] The minute stated that the role for light protected mobility in Northern Ireland remained enduring, and it reiterated how operational experience overseas had highlighted capability gaps in post-conflict, peace support operations and counter-terrorist situations.

253. DEC(SP) stated that the way forward was "beset with unresolved issues", including:

- a range of threats across new operating environments, such as Iraq and Afghanistan with "ill-defined" requirements;
- "no clearly defined" user focus or capability management mechanisms;
- an "incomplete definition" of the number of vehicles required; and
- "no defined logistic vision or relationship with other mobility capabilities".

254. DEC(SP) repeated the concerns raised in the 14 April business case about the aged Snatch fleet and chassis corrosion.

255. The number of required vehicles remained "undefined" but DEC(SP) stated that an initial analysis "might be" for three different types of PPV:

Table 1: The requirement for three types of PPV, July 2004

Type	Features	Estimated number required
A	Essentially a Snatch replacement with the same levels of ballistic protection for low level counter-terror and public order operations, mainly for use in Northern Ireland.	612
B (the Expeditionary or "Rest of World" vehicle)	For expeditionary use in "high threat CT operations". The minimum ballistic protection level required was considered to be B6 (as was currently provided by Tavern).	144
C	A specialised EOD vehicle; again requiring B6 ballistic protection for use on expeditionary operations.	120

256. On protection levels, the DEC(SP) said that "the terrorist will invariably overmatch the target" given that Iraqi and other Middle Eastern terrorists had been "able to destroy tanks in IED attacks":

> "Protection levels therefore should be optimised for blast, fragments, the 'near-miss' etc rather than to defeat direct attack. Protection for a PPV is more a function of Tactics, Techniques and Procedures (TTPs) (examples include top-cover sentries, combined foot and mounted patrols, multiple vehicle patrols, helicopter top-cover etc) than thickness of armour."

257. The purchase of new vehicles to meet the Type A requirement had an estimated total programme cost of £62.5m. As only £55.31m of funding was available, an upgrade to Snatch 2, at an estimated total cost of £53.8m, was recommended.

258. DEC(SP) intended to take a "twin-track" approach to procurement:

- A programme to upgrade existing Snatch vehicles to Snatch 2 would begin almost immediately to meet the Type A requirement, with 100 Snatch 2 being available by 31 December 2004 and a further 200 by 30 June 2005.
- An initial assessment for the remainder of the Type A requirement and the Types B and C requirement would be undertaken. Delivery of the Type B requirement was expected in Financial Year (FY) 2006/07 and Type C was expected in FY 2007/08.

259. The letter identified the savings measure imposed from the 2004 Spending Review, to reduce the expeditionary capability from medium to small scale in the longer term, as "programme blight". It stated that that, and "the lack of an endorsed requirement for both numbers and capability", meant that a business case for the whole light protected mobility requirement would not be available before September 2004.

260. DEC(SP) also wrote that the actual requirement for Type B vehicles was 396 but the savings measure agreed in February 2004 had rendered that unrealistic.

261. The minute concluded, however, by stating that the enhancement measure agreed in the same review, to bring forward the funding for 80 vehicles to 2004/05, had enabled the search for a solution:

> "To date light protected mobility in an expeditionary role has been something of an orphan capability, managed on an ad hoc basis from a base capability centred on the NI role. Operational imperatives and the bring-forward of funding now offer the opportunity to develop the capability in support of global expeditionary operations, delivering a coherent and integrated concept, whilst at the same time continuing to meet long-term NI commitments."

262. An acquisition strategy for the Type B (expeditionary) PPV capability was produced by the Specialist Utility Vehicle IPT on 19 July.[130] It stated that operational analysis studies had "discounted the use of Snatch 2 as a coherent option for meeting this capability". It considered three options:

- to do nothing;
- a commercial off-the-shelf or a modified commercial off-the-shelf procurement; or
- design development – creating a "bespoke" solution.

263. The option to do nothing was not recommended because the "use of in-service assets that fail to meet the minimum stated performance levels would put users at risk and potentially create an operational vacuum at the source of provision". The time and cost implications of the design development option meant that that was also ruled out.

264. Considering the commercial off-the-shelf procurement, the IPT wrote that there were "a number of products on the market from specialist military vehicle suppliers that could provide a near match to the identified KURs and derived KSRs [Key Service Requirements]". The difficulty was that there would "inevitably" be areas that would not be "optimised for British Army use", such as communications equipment.

265. A modified commercial off-the-shelf procurement was therefore the recommended option as that would allow the MOD to engage suppliers over the British Army's specific requirements.

266. The procurement strategy was to be developed and reviewed leading up to the submission of a business case. No timescale or deadline was specified.

267. Major General Peter Gilchrist, Master General of the Ordnance, produced a paper for an ECAB meeting on 20 July on the Army's Equipment Programme.[131] He said that new lessons from Operation TELIC were "the need to give greater thought to future ECM, protected mobility and [Type] B vehicle desertisation requirements".

268. The requirement for PPVs on operations continued to grow. Immediate needs were being met by the redeployment of vehicles from Northern Ireland and desertisation would be complete by the end of May 2004,[132] "despite delays in receiving clear requirements and UOR funding". There was concern "over the longer-term sustainability" of Snatch's "aged, petrol-engined chassis" but the funding brought forward from EP04 would "help address this issue".

269. Maj Gen Gilchrist wrote that the DEC(SP) minute of 7 July had provided "a sensible framework … to commence project activity" using the twin-track approach: " … in the short term (1-2 yrs), a life extension for Snatch, and in the medium term a new COTS [commercial off-the-shelf] PPV, a little larger than Snatch". The life extension programme, "known as Snatch 2", was already under way. The business case had been approved and trial vehicles had been delivered in June.

270. On FRES, Maj Gen Gilchrist wrote that, following the announcement of the its Assessment Phase on 5 May 2004, it was envisaged that a contract would be let in late 2004, leading to Main Gate approval "for the system and simpler FRES variants" in late 2006.

271. At ECAB on 20 July, although "disappointment" was expressed at the pace with which FRES was being taken forward, the meeting was told that "the collective view of the IAB [Investment Approvals Board] was that the project had not been sufficiently well thought through in terms of requirements".[133]

272. ECAB also noted that "the Army needed better to influence the equipment and planning communities".

273. In discussion of the review of the Army Equipment Programme by Maj Gen Richards, it was pointed out that "it should be made clear that developing an initial medium weight capability [between 2005-2009] was based on existing equipment and did not depend on FRES".

THE THREAT IN MID-2004

274. The IED threat in Iraq continued to grow.

275. On 28 June 2004, the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) formally handed over to a sovereign Iraqi government. The security situation in Iraq remained febrile. The chronology of events and their impact on the UK's overarching strategy is detailed in Section 9.3. The impact of events on the progress of SSR is described in Section 12.1 and the impact on reconstruction is provided in Section 10.2.

276. The JIC Assessment of the security situation in Iraq on 21 July stated:

> "We also judge that Lebanese Hizballah will retain an influence in Iraq (Hizballah members may have been linked to the group that attacked the Sheraton Hotel,[134] and could supply Iraqi groups with terrorist expertise and munitions."[135]

277. On 26 July, the DIS reported that an EFP IED had been found on 15 July in Baghdad.[136] The DIS noted that the EFP IED design had not previously been encountered in Iraq but was, as with the find in May 2004, of a type associated with Lebanese Hizballah. There were also indications of Iranian involvement in the construction of the devices.

278. The DIS concluded:

> "Irrespective of the attribution of the design, production or employment of these charges, their presence and use in attacks against Multi-National Forces in Iraq is a significant force protection issue."

279. A JIC Assessment was produced on 11 August about the recent upsurge of Shia violence.[137] It stated that Iran was "establishing agent networks, providing funding and material to a number of Shia groups and generally seeking to gain influence" and judged that "Iranian encouragement, funding and possibly arms" were "being provided to al-Sadr and the Mahdi Army"; but the "exact degree of Iranian involvement" remained "unclear".

280. On 12 August, Private Marc Ferns was killed by a roadside IED while driving a Warrior vehicle.[138] The vehicle had its hatches open to increase visibility and because of the lack of air conditioning in the vehicle. The blast penetrated the open hatch, killing Pte Ferns.

281. A Current Intelligence Group (CIG) Assessment the following week stated that theatre had reported that a number of Iranian sourced weapons had been seized in al-Amara.[139]

282. General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, Commander in Chief Land Command, visited Iraq later that month.[140] His report to General Jackson highlighted that the security situation was “now far more difficult than hitherto”. It was “complex and multi-layered” and, with the intimidation and killing of key people, it was having an effect on governance and recovery.

283. On 3 September, a CIG Assessment reported:

> “The recent fighting has shown that the Mahdi Army is developing into an increasingly resolute organisation, capable of launching sophisticated attacks … They have been able to mount determined and sophisticated attacks using small arms, improvised explosive devices (IEDs) and heavier weapons such as mortars and RPGs … Al-Sadr retains the ability to mobilise a significant body of poor, unemployed Shia youth.”[141]

284. The Assessment also stated that “some recovered anti-armour weapons may have been procured through Lebanese Hizballah with Iranian knowledge”.

285. On 26 September, a report from Mr Robert Davies, Chief Police Adviser to the Iraq Ministry of Interior, stated that the FCO’s Overseas Security Adviser had directed UK police staff not to travel in Snatch Land Rovers because of inadequate armour.[142] Mr Davies wrote:

> “This direction places a significant limitation on the deployment of our staff … The appropriate protection could be provided by a team from the Control Risk Group,[143] but there are insufficient numbers to meet our requirements.”

286. Acting Commander Kevin Hurley, Chief Police Adviser in Basra June 2004 to December 2004, wrote in a statement to the Inquiry:

> “Security conditions made road travel almost impossible … [W]e were not allowed to travel in Army vehicles due to their lack of protection (Snatches). We were all but ineffective for most of our time. Ultimately … we reached a stage whereby if we could not get a helicopter ride we did not move.”[144]

287. On 28 September, Corporal Marc Taylor and Gunner David Lawrence were killed during the ambush of a military convoy south-west of Basra.[145] An armoured Land Rover was badly damaged and the soldiers came under fire as they tried to extract the casualties.

288. On 1 October, the DIS produced two reports that were circulated within the MOD and to the intelligence agencies.[146] One looked at the Command Wire IED (CWIED) threat and the other at the Radio-Controlled IED (RCIED) threat.

289. The CWIED report assessed that CWIED attacks were relatively uncommon but were growing in number and sophistication; that was assessed as a "concerted attempt" to counter ECM. The DIS advised that improvements to ECM were "likely to lead to increased use of CWIED, RCIED and other forms of non-Radio-Controlled command initiated IEDs".

290. The RCIED report stated that RCIED attacks represented around 75 percent of all IEDs and that IEDs in turn accounted for 75 percent of casualties. The DIS assessed that in the next 12 months:

> "IED technology in use with other Middle Eastern groups especially Lebanese Hizballah, can be expected to appear in Iraq. This would include multiple systems, such as RC (Radio-Controlled) switched PIRs [Passive Infra Red]."

291. Also on 1 October, Gen Walker received an update from AM Torpy on the provision of ECM to UK forces:

- The number, complexity and sophistication of RCIEDs used against coalition forces was increasing.
- The L* programme was experiencing some manufacturing delays.
- There was insufficient ECM equipment in MND(SE) to provide protection for all troops and therefore prioritisation had been necessary.
- ECM did not offer 100 percent protection and was used in conjunction with TTPs and other force protection measures.[147]

292. AM Torpy informed Gen Walker that the value of the L* programme had risen to over £100m since its approval in late 2003.

293. In his post-tour report, Maj Gen Rollo commented:

> "The current ECM suite is adapting to meet the threat, providing UK soldiers the best protection amongst the coalition forces, but procurement and production struggle to meet the demands in theatre. We are well below the scales needed for appropriate ECM protection and whilst the problem lies with industry there must be constant pressure to improve the situation."[148]

A PPV FOR AFGHANISTAN

294. In June 2004, a decision was taken that the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps HQ (ARRC), a UK-led NATO asset, should deploy to Afghanistan in 2006, rather than Iraq (see Section 9.2). By October, that decision had become an important factor in considering resources for Iraq.

295. On 15 October, the strategy for delivering Project DUCKBOARD was produced.[149]

296. A total of 371 "desertised" Snatch 1.5 vehicles had been delivered to support operations in Iraq: 308 were in operation and 63 were held in reserve. An additional 70 Snatch 2 vehicles would be available from December 2004, also for the reserve, to replace the 1.5 variants as their capability deteriorated. More than 20 vehicles on Op TELIC had already been damaged beyond repair.

297. The strategy identified that a requirement for protected mobility still had to be defined and that there were a number of "challenges", including:

- "If Defence has to support; current NI commitments; a continuance of Op TELIC on current scales; and a medium scale operation in Afghanistan simultaneously in 2006, a new acquisition of Protected Mobility vehicles, currently unfunded … will be necessary."
- Production would need to start in April 2005 to meet the "ready to train date" for deployment to Afghanistan.
- Regardless of concurrent operations in 2006, "urgent EP/UOR action" was needed to meet "USURs arising from Operation TELIC and to sustain the Snatch fleet".
- There was "no overarching doctrine, no endorsed CONOPS nor definitive scaling for the provision of Protected Mobility for expeditionary operations".
- The "lack of definition of the numbers and types of vehicles required" continued to "stall the acquisition process".

298. The strategy recommended requirements should be taken forward as three separate projects, "within an overarching scrutiny mechanism", so that each strand could be delivered independently and at its own pace:

- Type A project ("Snatch 2") – continuing the conversion of existing Snatch vehicles for operations in UK and Iraq (the first tranche already under way as an Operational Emergency);
- Type B project ("Vector") – producing this capability would depend on Afghanistan and Iraq concurrency assumptions "and or direction as to required protection levels"; and

[149] Minute MOD [junior officer] to D Jt Cap (AD Jt Mvre), 15 October 2004, 'Strategy for Delivery of Protected Patrol and Combat Support Mobility – Project DUCKBOARD'.

- Type C project ("Format") – producing capability for combat support units in expeditionary operations, including replacing eight Zimmer[150] vehicles sent to Iraq for IED Disposal teams in April 2003, which were "failing" and the USUR raised by the Royal Engineers on 12 June for "some form of protected mobility".

299. The strategy stated that an analysis of the numbers had "proved extremely difficult" without any endorsed CONOPS and "no overall front line Customer 2 lead". The 308 Snatch 1.5 vehicles in Iraq, and 133 in reserve, were listed as a "firm requirement".

300. The "emerging requirements" included a minimum of 224 Type B Vector vehicles for Afghanistan in 2006. Considering its options, the strategy stated that:

- If operations in Iraq and Afghanistan were not concurrent, the present vehicle scaling would suffice, Vector would not be procured, and any enhancements to the 2005 Equipment Programme would be withdrawn. Priority would switch to sustaining the conversion of Snatch 1.5 vehicles to the Snatch 2 variant.
- If the operations were concurrent, the requirement for 224 vehicles for Afghanistan could be met by removing the 133 Snatch vehicles held in reserve for Iraq and reducing Northern Ireland's allocation by 100. "Alternatively, TELIC could reduce to 100 vehicles, freeing the balance of 271", subject to refurbishment, available for Afghanistan.
- If the operations were concurrent, an additional capability could be procured. That was the recommended option.

301. The "realistic assessment" was that definitive requirements and numbers were not likely to be possible before December 2004 and the balance between Iraq and Afghanistan was "unlikely to be clear before mid 05". The strategy proposed that:

- Snatch 2 production be extended by a further Operational Emergency business case for the conversion of another 360 Snatch 1 vehicles to guarantee the model's sustainability for 2006;
- the first tranche of 141 Vector vehicles be procured by UOR against Equipment Programme funding to ensure an interim operating capability by 31 January 2006; and
- the first two of four tranches be procured for 24 combat support vehicles by UOR against Equipment Programme funding.

302. On 27 October, Commodore Peter Eberle, Director Directorate of Joint Capability, raised an SOR for all three Types of PPV with DEC(SP) and Brigadier Tim Inshaw, Director of Capability Integration (Army) (DCI(A)).[151] Cdre Eberle said that it was "needed as a matter of priority" to inform consideration of options in the 2005

Equipment Programme and because of the finite number of Snatch vehicles and the lead times needed by industry to produce additional vehicles in time for a deployment to Afghanistan in 2006.

303. Cdre Eberle stated that there was a potential increase in operational activity over the period 2005-2007 and, in particular in 2006, which correlated with priorities already identified: the importance of light forces in combating international terrorism and the key capability of force protection from asymmetric threats. The "requirement for protected mobility and force protection measures" was "unlikely to diminish". PPVs had continued to prove their worth, "albeit within strict limitations of physical protection".

304. Looking at the three variants of PPV required, the paper stated that the User Requirement Document (URD)[152] for the Type A (public order) variant remained "extant". The URD for the Type B (expeditionary) variant was "similar to the Type A" but also needed:

- better physical protection,[153] including protection against fragmentation and blast, which was "essential", and some degree of protection against mines which was "highly desirable"; and
- the ability to be fitted with the most appropriate ECM suite to counter the prevailing threat in a given theatre.

305. In relation to deployment in Iraq, the paper stated that the employment of PPV Snatch was "threat driven", which:

> "… meant that all tasks being conducted in or through specific areas have required the use of PPV Snatch, with these tasks ranging from framework patrolling to the escorting of white fleet vehicles that are unable to provide their own top cover protection."

306. The paper's recommendations included:

- A minimum requirement of 1,236 vehicles to cover both Type A and Type B PPV variants should be made available to support all UK operations worldwide during 2006.[154]
- A minimum requirement of 1,228 ECM suites which "should be able to counter the prevailing threat where PPV are deployed".
- The figures were the minimum and not the totality of the requirement, constituting 72 percent of the potential peak requirement.

[153] The precise level of physical protection specified remains classified.
[154] The detail about how this figure was broken down according to each operation was provided in an attached annex but the MOD has been unable to provide the Inquiry with a legible copy and unfortunately the defined PPV requirement for Iraq and Afghanistan cannot be seen.

- Brig Inshaw would act as Customer Two "Core Leader" with "the role of overseeing the lines of development" in consultation with Cdre Eberle, who would act as the joint Customer Two.

307. Cdre Eberle stated that the number of PPVs required had been "derived from consultation with FLCs, PJHQ and within MOD Centre" but there were a number of "unknowns" that constrained the ability to "achieve a high degree of accuracy" in the figures. Those included the timeline for the drawdown in Iraq and, for Afghanistan, the nature of the threat, the UK CONOPS, and the scale and timing of the UK's medium-term engagement.

308. The paper stated that there were "no alternatives to PPV for the protected mobility capability requirement within the timeframe under consideration". It described tracked light armoured vehicles as "inappropriate due to their posture and the extended distances that are regularly travelled while on patrol or escort tasks".

309. Civilian movements in Iraq were being constrained by the IED threat as even the Army's more heavily armed vehicles came under attack.

310. On 4 November, Sergeant Stuart Gray, Private Paul Lowe and Private Scott McArdle were killed in a suicide bomb attack at a vehicle check-point in Fallujah.[155] They had been travelling in a Warrior vehicle. An Iraqi interpreter was also killed and eight soldiers were injured.

311. On 5 November, Mr David Hayward, FCO Military Liaison Officer, sent a teleletter to Mr Tom Dodd, Deputy Consul General in Basra, in reply to "a number of problems" Mr Dodd had raised about policing in MND(SE).[156] He wrote:

> "You [sic] comment that rigid security rules prevents senior police officers from being allowed to move freely on the ground is understood. The underlying issue is that FCO duty of care for all HMG staff currently dictates that military vehicles do not meet the minimum level of protection required."

312. Mr Hayward wrote that they were discussing with the Security Strategy Unit whether there was any "room for flexibility in application of current policy". He added: "However, as you know the duty of care does weigh heavily in terms of the safety of personnel in Iraq."

313. On 8 November, Private Pita Tukutukuwaqa was killed when the Warrior vehicle in which he was travelling hit a roadside IED south west of Baghdad.[157]

314. AM Torpy visited Iraq from 24 to 27 November.[158] He noted that "the level of incidents [had] increased significantly" since his visit in August, but in MND(SE) the security situation was "improved".

315. On 2 December, the DIS produced a report on the evolution of the IED threat in Iraq.[159] It stated:

> "Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs) remain the main killer of coalition forces (CF). The threat from IEDs continues to evolve not only quantitatively, but also qualitatively, with new or modified device types and Modus Operandi (MO).
> "The rise in IED attacks in 2004 indicates that, despite CF tactical successes, the security situation has not improved overall and individual terror groups are making significant progress in terms of ability to mount successful IED attacks, probably through improved C2 [command and control], logistics, recruiting and external assistance.
> "Improvement in IED technology has been most significant in Shia areas since May 04, where insurgents have technical progress that we assess could only have been achieved through focused external assistance. We assess that this may be due to an influx of Lebanese Hizballah IED technology under Iranian sponsorship …"

316. The DIS stated that the increased use of CWIEDs in MND(SE) indicated an awareness of UK ECM and assessed that the threat was likely "to continue to develop to resemble that of other Middle East countries, such as Israel, with the further import of IED technology and MO from Palestinian, Lebanese and AQ [Al Qaida] associated groups". It highlighted that IEDs accounted for 40-45 percent of MNF fatalities and over 70 percent of all injuries.

317. On 19 January 2005, Mr Hoon wrote to Mr Paul Boateng, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, asking for an increase of £165m in the MOD's current UOR ceiling (£829m).[160] The additional funding would cover "mainly" force protection and communications equipment:

> "The environment in Iraq for the second half of 2004 was marked by a gradual deterioration in the security situation … The immediate and expanding threat from Radio Controlled IEDs (RCIEDs), which has already resulted in death and injury to UK personnel, has required us to procure further Project L* ECM equipment, to the value of £54m …"

318. Mr Hoon wrote:

> "Protected mobility continues to be a key requirement for forces undertaking a wide range of roles, including patrolling, public order duties and IED search tasks. Protected Patrol Vehicles are therefore vital, and we are seeking an advance of programmes already in our Equipment Plan to the tune of £12m."

319. On 26 January, as part of the new biennial planning cycle, the DMB discussed proposals in a paper by Mr Woolley on the "Future Defence Programme".[161]

320. Mr Woolley outlined that the strategy for Short Term Plan and 2005 Equipment Programme was to implement decisions already taken by the DMB and Ministers, "rather than making significant adjustments to force structure or capability".

321. Mr Woolley wrote that "some £82m" had been earmarked to fund the continuing support costs of recently procured UOR equipments. Recognising constraints on accessing the Reserve, £30m had been set aside across 2005/06 and 2006/07 to "provide headroom for equipment enhancements that might be needed for planned operations" but no specific provision had been made for the "extra equipment costs required to support the possible deployment of a UK brigade to Afghanistan alongside the ARRC HQ".

322. Along with the associated budgets, the paper identified:

- 69 proposed savings measures, including a delay to the ISD of three FRES variants;
- 78 proposed enhancements, including three enhancements to Warrior, two for CVR(T) (both including enhanced protection); and
- 24 further savings measures that were not recommended for DMB approval.

323. The list of proposed enhancements also identified "additional protected mobility for light forces from 2006". That included the upgrade of 550 "near-obsolete Northern Ireland fleet of Snatch 1 vehicles, through the provision of a new chassis", and 100 Vector vehicles that were "better suited to worldwide, rough terrain operations".

324. The minutes of the DMB recorded that Sir Kevin Tebbit had said the 2004 Spending Review settlement had "increased resources in real terms, but there were substantial pressures".[162]

---

[162] Minutes, 26 January 2005, Defence Management Board meeting.

325. Lt Gen Fulton told the DMB that there had been "significant cost growth in several large programmes, some of which had proved impossible to contain", and that:

> "… balancing and de-risking the programme had required a number of painful measures, especially in the early years. But it was now a robust programme that could be taken forward effectively."

326. In agreeing the programme to be submitted to Mr Hoon, the DMB approved lists of proposed savings and enhancements in the Equipment Programme, "reflecting the pressures and changing circumstances since the 2004 Spending Review settlement".

327. A report on lessons from Op TELIC produced by the MOD's Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC) on 22 February stated:

> "With the continued increase in the use of IEDs, the Snatch conversion programme was a belated reaction to the threat … Trends indicate that future operations will continue to face threats of a similar nature and Defence planning should be cognisant of this reality, rather than reactive to a situation after a deployment is under way."[163]

328. The report highlighted two lessons on protected mobility:

- "Sustained investment is required to provide sufficient protected mobility vehicles for operations in hostile environments such as Iraq …"
- "Sufficient equipment to protect patrol vehicles against IEDs should be maintained and available for current and future operations …"

329. The Chiefs of Staff discussed the report on the same day but the minutes do not record any specific reference to the protected mobility concerns raised in the DOC report.[164]

330. The PPV Capability Integration Working Group (CIWG) met for the first time on 1 February 2005.[165] The Chair summarised the group's challenge as "a combination of delivering a PPV capability with insufficient funding against an ambitious timeline".

331. A DEC(SP) representative briefed the CIWG that the DMB had agreed, subject to Ministerial approval of the 2005 Equipment Programme, that the Capital Departmental Expenditure Limit should be approximately £42m over the next three financial years.

[165] Minutes, 1 February 2005, Protected Patrol Vehicle (PPV) Capability Integration Working Group meeting.

332. The minutes recorded that the £42m was insufficient to deliver the total fleet requirement of 1,228 needed to support the deployment of PPVs worldwide.[166] The 1,228 figure would have supported the deployment of 982 Snatch 2 and 246 Vector. There was now only available funding for one of the following options:

- 512 vehicles (312 Snatch 2 and 200 Vector);
- 724 vehicles (624 Snatch 2 and 100 Vector); or
- 936 vehicles (936 Snatch 2 and no Vector).

333. It was agreed that the Directorate of Joint Capability would confirm which option should be pursued by 18 February.

334. The Specialist Utility Vehicle IPT stated that in order to deliver 100 Vector vehicles by June 2006, the solution would need to be a commercial off-the-shelf option and the business case needed to be submitted by July 2005, with the contract let by October 2005.

335. The group agreed Key User Requirements for the Vector vehicle and, the Specialist Utility Vehicle IPT was tasked to identify all of the options that could meet them. Those would be discussed at the next CIWG on 23 February.

336. On 21 February, a revised PPV SOR was produced in light of the funding levels agreed by the DMB, which was referred to in the SOR as a "45% cut" (see the consideration of that figure in the Box, 'Was there a 45% cut?').[167]

337. The SOR elaborated on the three options provided by the PPV Working Group:

- Option 1: Convert the remainder of Snatch to Snatch 2 – giving a total of 936 vehicles;
- Option 2: Convert 312 Snatch to Snatch 2 (in addition to the 312 already undergoing conversion for Iraq) and procure approximately 100 Vector giving a total of 624 Snatch 2 and 100 Vector – an overall total of 724 vehicles; or
- Option 3: Procure 200 Vector – giving a total of 312 Snatch 2 and 200 Vector.

338. Option 2 was identified as the preferred option, with Vector vehicles to be delivered by 1 June 2006.

339. The paper stated that further examination of the funding was necessary to enable a "sensible transition of the PPV fleet from its current to its future configuration" after the Vector vehicles were delivered. Force Level Reviews "must re-examine the current PPV requirements for all theatres" once the actual fleet size was known. The exact number of

---

[166] The minutes do not record the budget to which this figure refers but the Inquiry infers that it was to cover the 1,236 Type A and Type B vehicles proposed in the SOR on 27 October. See the Box, 'Was there a 45 percent cut?'

[167] Minute MOD [junior officer] to DINF Col FD, 21 February 2005, 'Protected Patrol Vehicle (PPV) Operational Requirement'.

PPVs that could be converted to Snatch 2, and the exact number of Vector vehicles that it would be possible to procure, was not yet known.

340. In considering protection levels, the paper stated:

> "The increasing levels of violence during Phase IV of Op TELIC, which necessitated the widespread use of protected mobility, have been highlighted in recent reports.[168] Additionally OA [operational analysis] is consistently reporting on the increased effectiveness of small arms weapons and ammunition. Therefore the PPV CIWG has deemed that the combination of ECM and an enhanced level of protection […] are to be the minimum standard for TYPE B Vector Variant. For Type A, a […] protection level, in conjunction with ECM, is deemed sufficient given the nature of the threat it is likely to be exposed to …"

341. Highlighting current concerns, including the DOC Op TELIC Lessons study, the paper stated:

- "As experience from the last 18 months has shown, having insufficient PPV to meet the operational demands … has resulted not only in sub-optimal solutions through reallocation between theatres (and a commensurate increase in operational risk for all concerned), but also adverse media attention …"
- "There are public, political and media expectations that military operations can now be conducted without significant casualties. Indeed, lessons learnt from operations and policy guidance are demanding sustained investment to provide sufficient protected mobility vehicles for operations in hostile environments, such as Iraq and Afghanistan."

342. The paper ended:

> "Despite the significant resource constraint that has been placed on this aspect of the Force Protection capability as a result of EP/STP05, the operational requirement for Op HERRICK [Afghanistan], which has been the principal driver behind this PPV work, demands a more capable vehicle than PPV Snatch 2. Indeed, the need for PPV is unlikely to diminish for the foreseeable future."

Was there a 45 percent cut?

The Statement of Requirement (SOR) produced by the MOD on 21 February 2005 stated that it reflected revised funding levels for PPVs as agreed by the DMB as part of the 2005 Equipment Programme. The MOD claimed that was a 45 percent cut in funding.

The Inquiry has been unable to find any evidence that that was the case.

[168] "In particular, DOC Op TELIC lessons Study, Vol 2 …" This footnote is provided in the original document.

It has considered the papers that went to the DMB meeting on 26 January 2005 and the minutes of that meeting. The only difference that appears to arise is that the DMB agreed to fund 650 vehicles as opposed to 724 but the minutes and papers do not provide any consideration of how the number of vehicles was decided.

The MOD told the Inquiry it was:

> " … unable to find any evidence of a specific reduction in the funding of PPVs by 45%. It is unclear how that figure was determined."[169]

343. The second meeting of the PPV CIWG was held on 23 February.[170] Option 2 had been finalised but the Chair highlighted the need to "give SUV IPT direction with confirming URs and KURs".

344. Concerns "were aired as to the future of the remaining Snatch" vehicles that had not been funded for an upgrade. The Directorate of Joint Capability agreed to investigate whether they could be funded "from the Afghanistan Contingency Funds through PJHQ".

345. The business case for the conversion of the second batch of 312 Snatch vehicles was submitted on 16 June 2005 and was approved in early July 2005. That is addressed later in this Section.

Response to the increase in the threat

346. In Iraq the IED threat was continuing to evolve, prompting a review of tactics and protection.

347. On 28 April, DSTL produced a presentation entitled 'Performance of Explosively Formed Projectiles Against UK Armour' outlining the results of further testing of IEDs against Warrior-type armour.[171] That stated:

> "Initial investigations concluded that these devices […] posed a significantly enhanced threat when compared to previously exploited weapons."

348. DSTL recommended the inclusion of an additional layer of protective armour on Warrior to help to mitigate the new threat.

349. On 2 May, Guardsman Anthony John Wakefield died as a result of injuries sustained when the Snatch vehicle he was travelling in hit a roadside IED in al-Amara.[172]

350. The first attack where an EFP was detonated using Passive Infra Red (PIR) technology took place in MND(SE) on 29 May, when Lance Corporal Alan Brackenbury was killed while travelling in a Land Rover south of al-Amara.[173]

351. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 1 June, Gen Walker directed Major General Peter Wall, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations (Operations), to conduct an analysis of the incident and inform the Chiefs of Staff of the lessons identified, particularly with regard to countermeasures, and "to take a view on the current operating procedures and the relative merits of protected/unprotected vehicles".[174]

352. Maj Gen Wall submitted his analysis to the Chiefs of Staff on 6 June.[175] He wrote that the attacked vehicle was leading a three vehicle patrol of unprotected Wolf Land Rovers. It was assessed that a Snatch Land Rover would not have offered greater protection or prevented LCpl Brackenbury's injuries.

353. Addressing the use of Snatch, Maj Gen Wall wrote:

> "Operating procedures are based on the threat, the task, the terrain and force profile. Threat and mobility are the key factors in assessing the relative merits of deploying Snatch or TUM [Wolf Land Rover]. Whilst there is no formal limitation on the use of Snatch … TUM is usually preferred for cross country use in rural areas … and this is the standard operating procedure. There is insufficient Snatch in theatre for its general use outside the urban areas …"

354. Maj Gen Wall added that Maj Gen Riley had "adopted a more protective posture" following the recent IED attacks and that "all road movement within the province" was being conducted in Snatch or armoured vehicles – Warrior and CVR(T).

355. In his final report as GOC MND(SE), Maj Gen Riley wrote that his "overriding concern" was the "continuing IED attacks in Maysan", where:

> "… patrols now use Warriors to over-watch the armoured Land Rovers in order to give additional protection. This takes careful explaining to the local population who remember the use of Warriors to defeat last summer's JAM [Jaysh al-Mahdi] offensive."[176]

356. Some of the key lessons Maj Gen Riley identified in a separate report on 10 June were:

- "More training on Snatch and other UOR requirements, and the development of basic infantry skills, must be factored into any pre-deployment training."

- Poor administration of UORs in the UK had caused "a huge amount of work in theatre". He cited ECM as an example.[177]

357. Maj Gen Riley's report also highlighted that a UOR had been raised for the enhanced protection of Saxon vehicles.

358. On 8 June, Gen Walker directed that Lt Gen Fry should lead on a paper looking at "the new IED threat" and the technical and tactical responses to it.[178]

359. The record of actions from the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 15 June indicated that the paper would be produced on 17 June.[179]

360. Lieutenant General Robert Fulton, DCDS(EC), provided that paper on 20 June.[180] He advised that the UK's current capability was "largely ineffective" in MND(SE). A new detector, due to enter service in December, was more effective, but "not suitable for the protection of mobile patrols". An airborne detection capability had been deployed to MND(SE) but that also had its limitations.

361. Lt Gen Fulton asked the Chiefs of Staff to note those points but no solution or further action was recommended. He stated that there was no complete solution to the problem available.

362. On 21 June, DSTL submitted a report to the DIS on the performance of EFPs against UK armour.[181] It concluded that the weapons it had been asked to examine had "greatly enhanced penetration capability" against those tested by DSTL in September 2004 and could overmatch the armour of a Warrior.

363. On 30 June, Major General James Dutton, who had succeeded Maj Gen Riley as GOC MND(SE), recorded in his weekly letter that a PIR IED had been used in attacks in MND(SE).[182] He stated:

> "We are not yet sure exactly what this means (although a link to Lebanese Hizballah, possibly through Iran seems likely), but there is no doubt that the threat to our troops has increased. I have confidence that work under way both here and in the UK to address the threat is progressing as quickly as possible."

364. Reflecting the preferred option identified in February of a PPV fleet comprising 624 Snatch 2 and 100 Vector vehicles, a business case to convert the remaining 312 vehicles to Snatch 2, at a cost of £21.5m, was put forward on 16 June.[183]

365. The ISD for 80 vehicles was November 2005 and the development of an up-armoured appliqué kit that could provide protection levels of up […] for Snatch 2 was to be complete by September 2005.

366. The business case stated that the operational analysis on Snatch had been conducted by DSTL and that the cheapest options to meet the Snatch 2 and Vector protection requirements were to upgrade remaining Snatch 1 vehicles to Snatch 2 or a potentially new Snatch 3 variant.

367. While no work had been done to understand the proportion of the fleet that required higher levels of protection, a "sensitivity analysis" had confirmed that evolving the Snatch model was the most cost-effective method of achieving better protection. Further work would be done to understand the number of upgrades needed and would be reported when the Vector business case was submitted.

368. The business case to convert the remaining 312 Snatch 1/1.5 vehicles to Snatch 2 standard was approved by the Investment Approvals Board (IAB) on 7 July.[184]

369. The IAB's approval note said that, in early 2004, Mr Nick Bennett, Director General (Scrutiny & Analysis) (DG(S&A)), met a DEC(SP) official and agreed a strategy for "establishing the balance between Snatch 2 and Vector numbers around which a procurement route was to be determined". The note said that that work had not been done, "presumably due to the Operational Emergency approach" taken to the 14 April 2004 submission, "which indicated that the balance of investment operational analysis work would be completed to inform the follow-on submission. This was also not done".

370. The note stated that Mr Nick Barnett, DG(S&A) between July 2005 and September 2005, wanted reassurance that, in parallel with any other procurement action for the second batch of conversions to Snatch 2, the balance of investment work on Vector and Snatch 2 numbers would "be taken forward before long".

371. The work that concentrated on the Type B PPV capability necessary to procure the Vector vehicle became known as Project Vector.

372. The business case for the first tranche of vehicles was submitted on 3 March 2006 and is addressed later in this Section.

373. Lord Drayson, who had become Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and Minister for Defence Procurement in May 2005, visited Iraq from 6 to 8 July.[185]

374. The report of his visit stated that feedback on equipment was generally positive but "a number of issues" were raised when he spoke to troops from 12 Mechanised Brigade. Those included the long wait for Warrior upgrades and that "the protection of RAF Regiment Land Rovers was not thought to be sufficient by the troops for the tasks that they were expected to carry out in the vehicles".

375. On 16 July, Second Lieutenant Richard Shearer, Private Phillip Hewett and Private Leon Spicer were killed in an EFP IED attack in al-Amara.[186] They were travelling in a Snatch Land Rover.

376. After 16 July until late August, the Chiefs of Staff reviewed progress on countermeasures against the threat from IEDs using PIR devices and EFPs at every meeting.[187]

377. At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 20 July, AM Torpy briefed that there had been a 13 per cent increase in the overall number of attacks in Iraq, with a 65 percent increase in casualties as the lethality of attacks also rose.[188]

378. The minutes stated:

> "With the exception of Maysan, MND(SE) had remained comparatively quiet; the fatal attack of a vehicle patrol on 16 Jul 05 had nevertheless resulted in a review of Tactics, Techniques and Procedures, including increased ISR [Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance] and use of SH [support helicopters], and the possibility of deploying elements of the Divisional Reserve to ensure that essential security and SSR could be sustained."

379. The update from Major General Mark Mans, Deputy Commanding General MNF-I, on 20 July said that the attack on 16 July was "the fifth EFP incident in the vicinity" of al-Amara since October 2004, including three devices which had been "found and cleared".[189] The use of EFPs was "spreading", including attacks in Mosul and Kirkuk. Significant numbers had been used in attacks in Baghdad.

380. On 22 July, a UOR was submitted for additional armour to protect Warrior vehicles in Iraq.[190]

381. The UOR said that, although the last three EFP attacks had been directed at Snatch vehicles, there was no reason why insurgents would not try to ambush Warrior vehicles, especially if Warrior was used "more in the future due to EFP attacks". It was "not possible" to protect Snatch, CVR(T), FV430 and Saxon against EFPs; the only vehicle that could be "better protected" was Warrior. Warrior was currently being used as the lead and rear vehicle for all convoys in Maysan province.

382. The UOR for additional Warrior armour was approved and the MOD told the Inquiry that that was fitted to vehicles in September 2005.[191]

383. The minutes from the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 27 July stated:

> "Following the recent attacks in Maysan, procedures have been modified to counter the threat: TF [Taskforce] Maysan were now conducting patrols in Warrior, and would not automatically respond to IED incidents to avoid being caught in secondary explosions. An additional Warrior company and the Telic Reserve RE [Royal Engineer] Search Team (from Cyprus) had been deployed into the area, with the latter able to provide a surge capacity for up to 60 days. The current cycle of attacks had 'fixed' CF [coalition forces] in the area and, as a result, progress on SSR had stagnated; PJHQ had therefore asked for an urgent review of UK SH [support helicopters] priorities, to see if further assets could be allocated to MND(SE) …"[192]

384. Lt Gen Fry told the Chiefs of Staff that work on PIR IED countermeasures continued, "but thus far they were only effective at very short range":

> "The importance was therefore stressed of countering the threat by all means possible, including TTPs. DCDS(EC) confirmed that appropriate action was being taken at the right tempo, and that the work was joined up with US efforts to counter similar threats elsewhere in Iraq."

385. On 30 July, two British security guards employed by Control Risks Group were killed while travelling in an armoured vehicle in Basra.[193] The deaths were later attributed to PIR EFPs.[194]

386. AM Torpy's report of his visit to Iraq in late July 2005 addressed the PIR EFP IED attacks:

> "With the exception of Maysan, incident levels across the AOR [Area of Responsibility] remain low and there are no major issues. In Maysan, significant effort is focused on building up an intelligence picture of the group suspected of carrying out the EFP/PIR attacks … whilst at the same time improving overall force protection measures. The GOC is also keen to gain more visibility of possible Iranian infiltration across the border … and maintain the pace of SSR in Maysan."[195]

[195] Minute PSO/CJO to PSO/CDS, 5 August 2005, 'CJO Visit Report – Pakistan, Afghanistan, Iraq and Qatar 25-30 July 05'.

387. On 3 August, Maj Gen Dutton reported:

> "… the threat from IEDs is worrying, with our Electronic Countermeasures unable to defend against the victim operated Passive Infra Red and the use of EFPs and (in the most recent attack) shaped charges able to penetrate armoured vehicles […] if used accurately. This technology has now been used across MND(SE) and indeed further north having first been seen in Maysan."[196]

388. Following Lord Drayson's visit to Iraq in early July, Mr Ingram sought advice on the protective capability of RAF Land Rovers on 19 August.[197]

389. PJHQ advised that three Land Rover variants were used by the RAF Regiment, of which Snatch was "the most highly protected". Its allocation across theatres was "centrally managed" on the basis of "relative priority" for those troops most at risk. That inevitably meant:

> "… compromises which mean that individual theatres receive fewer than is ideal. That said, a greater allocation of Snatch to Iraq is not currently judged to be operationally essential."

390. PJHQ wrote that there were "some 380 Snatch Land Rovers deployed" in Iraq, "(including 64 Snatch 2), against a liability of 420". The Snatch 2 programme was under way and 66 of the "updated vehicles" had already arrived in theatre.

391. There were "no spare Snatch" to deploy to Iraq, and the production line was "currently devoted to non-air conditioned variants". The programme would "not address the numbers" of vehicles available but would "enhance the capability" of the vehicles deployed. DLO intended to return the number of Snatch deployed in Iraq to the agreed level of 420 "as soon as suitable vehicles" were produced.

392. The process of allocating priorities in Iraq, in common with all operations, involved "acceptance of risk in some areas". While PJHQ sought "to reduce this risk as much as possible", it was "impossible to eliminate". Since Lord Drayson's visit, six Snatch vehicles had been allocated to the RAF Regiment. The number of vehicles allocated to the RAF Regiment was "judged to be commensurate with current threat levels" and would "continue to be subject to review".

393. PJHQ stated that: "Theatre assigns its Snatch assets in line with the currently assessed areas of highest risk and operational policy."

394. Draft press lines stated that British lives were not being put at unnecessary risk. Service personnel used:

> "… the vehicles most appropriate to the missions and tasks they are undertaking. If the threat level increases, so do the protective and preventative measures taken, for example by using Warrior Infantry Fighting vehicles."

395. The key message was that British forces were:

> "… equipped with the most suitable and best protected vehicles for the job in hand. The allocation of vehicles on Op TELIC is therefore constantly reviewed in line with the currently assessed areas of highest risk and operational priority."

396. Mr Ingram's Private Office recorded on 24 August that he had noted the advice.[198]

397. In late August, in response to tasking from Lieutenant General Robin Brims, who had become Senior British Military Representative-Iraq in April, the DIS, PJHQ and MND(SE) assessed Muqtada al-Sadr's strategy and future intentions:

> "Given past casualties and the increasing sophistication of recent attacks, we expect such action in the future to mainly consist of limited engagements, standoff attacks and deniable operations including the use of technologically advanced Improvised Explosive Devices (IED), (incorporating Passive Infra-Red sensors (PIR), Explosively Formed Projectiles (EFP), and Remote Controlled (RC) arming), of Lebanese Hizballah/IRGC QF design. It is assessed such IED attacks are not being directed by JAM as an organisation but it appears that certain Shia extremists, who may also belong to JAM, are co-operating with external actors to conduct such attacks."[199]

398. On 26 August, Dr John Reid, who had become Defence Secretary in May, was provided with advice from a junior official in the Directorate of Joint Commitments about how the MOD intended to counter the threat posed by the PIR IEDs.[200]

399. The official stated that technical work on a countermeasure was at an "advanced stage" and that the UK should deploy a pre-detonation capability (M*[201]) to Iraq as soon as one was technically available, subject to securing UOR funding. That was expected to be around October 2005. The initial estimate of cost was £35m.

400. The official also warned that PIR detonation was the insurgents' response to existing ECM and that it was likely that any UK response would be met with further adaptation resulting in yet further ECM requirements.

401. Dr Reid agreed on 30 August that this capability should be deployed once available.[202]

402. On 5 September, Fusilier Stephen Robert Manning and Fusilier Donal Anthony Meade died as a result of injuries sustained when the vehicle in which they were travelling hit an IED in az-Zubayr.[203] They were providing top cover at the time of the explosion.

403. On 11 September, Major Matthew Bacon was killed when a roadside IED hit the Snatch vehicle in which he was travelling in Basra.[204] Three other British soldiers, who were travelling in the same vehicle, were seriously injured.

404. AM Torpy visited Iraq from 12 to 15 September.[205] On the threat in MND(SE) he reported:

> "The recent spate of IED attacks in Basra appears to be employing the same EFP/PIR technology seen in Maysan … Focused intelligence effort is being targeted against key individuals in these groups … with the aim of conducting offensive operations at the earliest appropriate moment … On the defensive side, it is apparent that aviation top cover has a positive deterrent effect and we are looking to see what can be done to increase the hours available from the aircraft currently in theatre. On the ground a great deal of work is under way to refine TTPs and the first tranche of PIR countermeasures equipment is due to arrive in theatre soon. The GOC has also worked hard … to improve the use of ISTAR assets and coordination of intelligence."

405. The first two M* units arrived in Iraq on 2 October.[206]

406. It is clear that UK forces struggled to cope with the sophistication of the IED threat in MND(SE) during the summer of 2005.

407. Lt Gen Riley told the Inquiry that, after "a long spell of quiet" after he arrived as GOC MND(SE) in December 2004, there was "an increase in effective attacks" from "the end of April/early May" 2005.[207] Those attacks introduced more sophisticated IEDs that "were very hard for our countermeasures to defeat and which were capable of penetrating pretty much any vehicle that had been out".

408. Asked how the UK dealt with the change in threat during his time as GOC, Lt Gen Riley told the Inquiry that it took "perhaps half a step backwards at first" and that "we had forgotten institutionally how to deal with this" after the long period of ceasefire in Northern Ireland.

409. Lt Gen Riley added that "the armour on the Warrior and Challenger main battle tanks was upgraded very rapidly". The Snatch vehicles were also upgraded and "a new series of vehicles which were more effective" were introduced. But "the sort of vehicles that we employ now in Afghanistan were just not in production" and there was "no technological silver bullet" to address the problem. The US was still "relying on the Humvee … largely". The UK "had not procured anything and there was little on the market that could have been deployed to assist me".

410. When the Inquiry asked whether the IED threat had been brought to his attention during his time as Defence Secretary, Mr Hoon said:

> "I think it was beginning to develop at the time that I left the department [May 2005] yes."[208]

411. Asked whether the UK was unable to move around in a protected way once the insurgency in Iraq developed, Sir Kevin Tebbit replied:

> "I don't think … that was not anticipated because of lack of money. I think that was not anticipated because we hadn't seen the threat evolving as rapidly as it did with IEDs and roadside bombs. That developed so very quickly from 2004."[209]

412. Sir Kevin added: "I think the roadside bomb, the IED threat evolved very, very rapidly in a way we hadn't anticipated, and we hadn't really got grounds to have expected, frankly."

413. Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry that the circumstances in Iraq:

> "… became very difficult from the summer of 2005, particularly most dramatically evidenced by the appearance of … explosively formed projectiles, in threes, that were sufficiently effective that even our most protected vehicles were at risk …"[210]

414. When asked by the Inquiry what he was being asked to produce to support force readiness for the growing insurgency, Gen Dannatt said: "The critical deficiency was force protection measures, vehicles in particular."

415. At their meeting on 5 October, the Chiefs of Staff noted that "the high tempo of insurgent PIR technological and tactical innovation was forcing equally rapid evolution of Coalition countermeasures".[211]

416. On 13 October, a DIS report of the technical influence of foreign fighters on the insurgencies in Iraq judged:

> "Of key concern is the possible state sponsorship of insurgent groups in Iraq. Highly lethal Improvised Explosive Devices of Lebanese Hizballah origin, probably migrating from Iran to Iraq, continue to pose a significant challenge to coalition forces and in particular the UK forces in MND(SE)."[212]

417. The DIS report continued:

> "The development of the IED capability in Iraq has been rapid. By way of comparison, the level of IED expertise reached by the IRA over some 30 years of conflict in Northern Ireland has been far exceeded by Iraqi insurgents in less than three years. This rapid progress is largely attributable to the technical influence of foreign fighters, many of whom view Iraq as the centre of a global jihad."

418. Following a visit to Iraq from 10 to 13 October, Gen Jackson reported:

> "Much of MND(SE)'s tactical focus has been on countering the EFP/PIR threat. TTPs have been amended and Project M* is delivering an effective interim technical countermeasure. But the enemy will adapt too, so we remain alive to the threat for some time yet. It is clear that the Scientific Advisor and his team in HQ MND(SE) have been instrumental in developing these countermeasures so rapidly and efficiently …"[213]

419. It was agreed on 14 October that 14 Warrior vehicles that were due to be returned to the UK should remain in Iraq.[214] An additional Merlin helicopter would also be provided.

420. On 18 October, Sergeant Chris Hickey, who had disembarked from his vehicle, was killed in Basra when his patrol was hit by an IED.[215]

421. At the end of October, Dr Reid reported to Cabinet that UK forces had, since May, been attacked by "a new type of bomb which had previously been associated mainly with Hizballah".[216]

422. On 31 October, Dr Reid wrote to Mr Des Browne, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, to request an increase in the UOR funding, predominantly to cover £30m funding for the initial roll-out of the M* capability.[217]

THE IMPACT ON WIDER CIVILIAN OPERATIONS

424. The IED threat constrained the UK's ability to deliver Security Sector Reform (SSR) and Civil Military Co-operation (CIMIC) as military officers, police officers and civilian personnel were unable to move safely around MND(SE).

425. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry that he had an "optimistic" briefing from the MOD before he started as GOC MND(SE) – that his role was to keep SSR "ticking over" – but that was skewed "massively" by the increased EFP threat when he arrived in Basra.[219]

426. On 11 November, Chief Constable Paul Kernaghan, the lead on international affairs for the Association of Chief Police Officers, contacted the Home Office to express concern about a report that Maj Gen Dutton had stated that he wanted to see civilian police personnel travel in Snatch vehicles, and that Maj Gen Dutton had suggested he would review – or even terminate – the relevant contracts of employment to ensure that was possible.[220]

427. On 20 November, Sergeant John Jones was killed whilst on patrol in Basra when his vehicle hit a roadside IED.[221] Four others sustained injuries in the attack, one seriously.

428. Gen Walker visited Iraq from 22 to 24 November.[222] His visit report stated that there was no "sole technical answer" to IEDs and "defensive tactics, techniques and procedures, and disruption of the terrorists, were essential parts of an overall solution".

429. On 29 November, Major General William Rollo, ACGS from January 2005, reported to Gen Jackson on his recent trip to Iraq:

> "The PIR IED threat is of real concern, and we are now more fixed by force protection than ever before. The effect of these weapons is constraining activity across all lines of operation, including SSR. Whilst overall numbers of attacks across the division has reduced, the effectiveness of each attack has risen sharply and the opposition now achieves a coalition casualty rate exceeding one killed for every PIR attack conducted …"[223]

430. The report was forwarded to Gen Walker.[224]

[224] Minute MA1/CGS to PSO/CDS, 12 December 2005, 'ACGS Visit to Iraq: 18-20 NOV 05'.

431. The FCO Senior Overseas Security Adviser visited Kirkuk, Baghdad and Basra between 10 and 21 November.[225] He reported:

> "The Security Managers and CRG [Control Risks Group] are to be congratulated on their professional control of road movement … It is clear that all road moves are subject to risk … The use of helicopters is vital in order to change the pattern of movements.
> "We recommend that all staff in Basra can move in Warrior armoured vehicles."

432. Dr Reid visited Basra in early December.[226] The report of his visit stated that he had had "an opportunity to examine vehicles fitted with upgraded armour kits".

433. On 7 December, AM Torpy briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the discovery of a large EFP suggested that rogue JAM elements "had intended to attack heavily armoured Coalition vehicles, including Warrior".[227]

434. In his 'Hauldown Report' to AM Torpy of 12 December, Maj Gen Dutton wrote:

> "… the dominant feature of the last four months of my … tour has been the victim initiated passive infrared explosively formed projectile. This weapon, which has now proliferated through Iraq has radically affected our freedom of manoeuvre and consequently inhibited our Security Sector Reform and CIMIC effort. There is a straight trade-off here: if troops are doing force protection, they cannot be doing SSR. We are taking direct action against perpetrators … constantly amending our TTPs and there is a huge scientific effort to produce counter measures. We will never entirely defeat this threat, but it is manageable and I do not believe it has a significantly deleterious effect on morale in this AO [Area of Operations]."[228]

435. On 16 December, officials from the Department for International Development (DFID) recommended to Mr Hilary Benn, the International Development Secretary, a number of changes to transport arrangements in Basra, including the use of Warrior vehicles by DFID staff for mission critical visits to certain sites in southern Iraq.[229] Until then, DFID staff had travelled in civilian rather than military vehicles because of their lower profile, consistent with the nature of DFID's work.

436. Officials advised Mr Benn:

> "… the continuing threat from EFPs in southern Iraq fundamentally compromises our ability to complete important projects, particularly in the power and water sectors at acceptable levels of risk."

437. Three days later, FCO officials recommended to Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, "a safe and measured return to road moves" for civilian staff in the South "in order to fully promote HMG objectives".[230] They proposed that, subject to regular review:

- all civilian staff be allowed to travel in Warrior vehicles within Basra, where there was a significant risk from armour piercing roadside bombs;
- UK civilian police officers be able to travel with contracted British Iraqi Police Advisers in their FCO armoured vehicles, escorted by UK military Snatch Land Rovers; and
- road moves in FCO armoured vehicles should restart along the main road from Basra Airport to Nasiriyah and Basra Airport to Kuwait.

438. Mr Straw approved the recommendations on 9 January 2006, provided the rules were subject to regular review.[231]

439. In his post-tour report on 18 January, Maj Gen Dutton recorded:

> "The most significant threat in MND(SE) derives from Passive Infra-red (PIR) initiated EFP IED attacks on MNF patrols and civilian convoys … RCIEDs and CWIEDs remain an extant threat … EFP IEDs […] were responsible for 18 fatalities between Sept and Dec 05 …"[232]

440. Maj Gen Dutton reported that the "new and more complex IEDs allowed Shia militants to conduct increasingly lethal attacks and effectively fix MNF by an extended low intensity terrorist operation. This achieves the intent … by separating MNF from the Shia community and allowing local JAM to fill the security vacuum."

441. In explaining the lessons from his tour, Maj Gen Dutton wrote: "The over-riding operational imperative during this period has been the requirement to mitigate the development and proliferation of PIR initiated IEDs."

442. Maj Gen Dutton stated that in some circumstances their effect had been "particularly tangible" upon freedom of operation and had "resulted in significant rebalancing of force structures" and "a rapid evolution and re-examination" of TTPs. That had led to decisions to prohibit any ground movements, other than by Warrior or Challenger vehicles, inside the towns of al-Amara and al-Majir al-Kabir in Maysan; and subsequently, "stringent" Warrior-led convoys into Basra City and "the satellite bases". SSR had been "significantly curtailed".

443. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry that less time was devoted to SSR because of the need for greater force protection. Describing how the threat restricted movements in the second half of his tour, he said:

> "… my vehicles never left the compound, we did all movement by air, or if the vehicles did move, they were in convoys protected by armoured vehicles."[233]

444. Lieutenant General John Cooper, GOC MND(SE) from December 2005 to June 2006, told the Inquiry that, when he arrived in MND(SE), "on the security side, everything was containable but there was this sense of increasing military activity, particularly from [JAM]".[234] The introduction of PIR EFPs "had an impact on lower level tactical issues". That was an "issue with which we could deal, but it was sometimes unpleasant".

445. Lt Gen Cooper stated that the response from the UK's "scientific and defence community was very good, both in terms of personal equipment and vehicles".

446. In a statement to the Inquiry, Assistant Chief Constable Colin Smith, Chief Police Adviser Iraq from May 2005 to April 2006, wrote:

> "The 'deteriorating' security situation had a major influence on ability to progress development plans. As attacks increased in MND(SE) movement became difficult … Movement of CivPol [civilian police] became a further issue. As security deteriorated CivPol officers needed increasingly to be escorted by substantial military resources (Warrior Armoured Vehicles and helicopters). Their priority however was increasingly lowered by the military … This caused serious difficulties in moving between sites to attend meetings with staff often stranded overnight in various locations without transport. It was not uncommon for officers to spend 2 or 3 days at the Basra APOD [aerial point of departure] awaiting movement. Similar problems existed in Baghdad with an FCO 'fly only' policy supported by insufficient helicopter resources.
> "I do not criticise the military for this situation. As security and 'war-fighting' became a greater priority, movement of civilians became a lesser priority."[235]

447. Speaking to the Inquiry about his duty of care to UK police officers in Iraq, CC Kernaghan said that he had not wanted his officers to travel in Snatch Land Rovers.[236] He said he "was quite clear that Snatch Land Rovers posed an unacceptable risk". CC Kernaghan added that this was not meant as a criticism of general officers who deployed the military in Snatch vehicles because: "They had no alternative. You do what you do with what you have got."

448. The DOC published its third report of Op TELIC lessons on 4 April 2006.[237]

449. The report contained a section on "National Issues" described as "issues that warrant MOD's attention due to the impact on operational capability". Such issues affected "not only Iraq but may have a wider significance for other operations, including Afghanistan". One of those issues was the UK's counter-IED capability.

450. The report highlighted how PIR IED and EFP attacks had restricted the SSR and CIMIC effort, citing Maj Gen Dutton's Hauldown Report. It stated: "The technology is developing quickly and it is highly likely that it will migrate between theatres." Countering the IED threat had become a "tactical focus" and, while the MOD continued "to strive to counter the long term threat", it anticipated that the M* capability "should deliver an effective interim countermeasure to the current threat".

451. The report stated that the "system" to counter IEDs was "made up of four elements: threat awareness; operating in an IED threat environment; disposal of IEDs; and development of CIED [counter-IED] capability". For CIED capability to evolve into "a coherent expeditionary capability", integral components of that system needed to migrate because "much of the capability currently deployed in Iraq is dependent upon personnel and equipment on attachment from Northern Ireland". If that did not happen, there was a risk that CIED expertise would be lost when operations were drawn down from Northern Ireland as part of the Peace Process.

452. Lieutenant General Sir Richard Shirreff told the Inquiry that, when he arrived as GOC MND(SE) in July 2006, there was "effectively no security at all": "Any movement required deliberate operation to … get around the city. There was a significant lack of troops on the ground."[238] He said that troops that could have been used on the ground were perhaps "tied up guarding, securing convoys".

Decisions on the wider protected mobility capability for the Army

453. Over the same period, in mid-2005, the Army was continuing to voice concerns about delays in the FRES programme.

454. The origin of the FRES programme and the DMB's decision in July 2004 to defer its ISD were addressed earlier in this Section.

455. Brig Moore and Brig Inshaw produced a paper on 18 May 2005 to inform ECAB members on the progress of the FRES programme, prior to their meeting on 26 May.[239] The paper set out the "potential conflict" between capability decisions: a vehicle that could be rapidly deployed by air could not also be the solution to a whole range of medium weight ground vehicles that needed replacing.

[237] Report DOC, 4 April 2006, 'Operation TELIC Lessons Study Volume 3'.
[239] Paper DEC(GM)/DCI(A), 18 May 2005, 'Future Rapid Effects System (FRES)'.

456. While the requirement to deploy quickly must be included, ECAB was asked to endorse the FRES Steering Committee's view,[240] that it "should not overly distort" the need to provide "an effective family" of vehicles across "the full spectrum of operations".

457. ECAB agreed Brig Moore and Brig Inshaw's recommendations on 26 May.[241] The FRES Steering Committee "had identified a potential conflict of priorities between FRES as an element of the medium weight capability, and FRES as the Army's light and medium Armoured Vehicle replacement programme".

458. Gen Jackson "said that ECAB agreed that the purpose of FRES was to equip the balanced force and that within this, both the development of a medium weight capability and the replacement of increasingly obsolete CVR(T), Saxon and FV430 fleets were equally important".

459. On 8 June, Maj Gen Rollo set out the Army's equipment priorities for the 2007 Equipment Programme (EP07) in a paper that would go to ECAB later that month.[242] Following the 2005 Programme, the challenge to identify savings while funding necessary equipment enhancements to support current operations (including an investment in light protected mobility) had meant that "a number of very painful savings measures and slippages had to be absorbed". FRES had been protected "apart from a slip to 3 variants at the back end of the programme".

460. Maj Gen Rollo wrote that the slip in the FRES ISD suggested the Army "should invest further in the transitional medium force" but any additional purchase "should not threaten the FRES ISD". Maj Gen Applegate's team was "examining this issue in detail, looking at innovative ways of finding the necessary resources and assessing the STP and EP impacts". It would report in July.

461. It is not clear what the details and results of this work were as the minutes of the next three ECAB meetings do not record that Maj Gen Applegate's team reported back to the Board in July.[243] The MOD has been unable to find any supporting documents.

462. Addressing the various programmes under way, Maj Gen Rollo wrote that there was "a need in this planning cycle to determine the protected mobility requirements for light forces across the Army".[244] He cited DUCKBOARD and Vector as examples of "disparate programmes" that might need to be "rationalised" in the future programme to "provide a coherent solution" for force protection.

[240] The Inquiry requested all meeting minutes from the FRES Steering Committee between 1 January 2005 and 1 January 2008. The MOD has been unable to locate any such records.

[244] Paper ACGS, 8 June 2005, 'Army Equipment Priorities for EP 07'.

463. In introducing his paper to ECAB on 20 June, Maj Gen Rollo said it "was a realistic approach which recognised that requests for extra investment might require the identification of compensating reductions".[245]

464. Gen Jackson said that ECAB was content with the priorities listed and "emphasised that war-fighting must continue to determine the Army's equipment priorities". He said that there should be "a sharper focus on FRES, emphasising the delivery of the programme".

465. At the ECAB meeting on 22 September, Gen Jackson explained that, whilst progress on the FRES programme continued, "he feared a slip in the ISD".[246] That "would be very damaging to the Army". The minutes record that Gen Dannatt "reinforced this point". ECAB would "need to make strong representations" to the Chief of Defence Procurement and DCDS(EC).

466. On 14 November, ECAB discussed a report of the Army's performance between 1 July and 30 September.[247]

467. Maj Gen Rollo had produced a paper on the areas of under-performance, which reported that Gen Dannatt had emphasised "an equipment issue of immediate concern".[248] Gen Dannatt was quoted as saying:

> "Our patrol vehicles routinely deployed on current operations … are vulnerable and we are suffering casualties. Snatch has poor mobility, inadequate protection and is unreliable due largely to its hard use. We are working with PJHQ to address vehicle and ECM issues and to develop TTPs, but there is a need to bring a clarity to the requirement for protected patrol vehicles. In addition, I am concerned at the lack of [Type] B vehicle protection more generally. I recognise that it may take time to deliver a solution, but we face the prospect of continuing operations in Iraq into 2008 as well as in Afghanistan."

468. Maj Gen Rollo's asked ECAB to note Gen Dannatt's concern and "consider whether any additional measures can bring greater clarity to vehicle protection requirements".

469. The minutes of the ECAB meeting on 14 November do not record any specific discussion of Gen Dannatt's concerns at the meeting but the subject of protected mobility was discussed more broadly.[249]

[249] Minutes, 14 November 2005, Executive Committee of the Army Board meeting.

470. In considering the "failure to provide appropriate protected mobility on operations", ECAB noted that the mitigating action to cover the risk included:

- "Improve ECM: two sets of the new equipment had been delivered to Iraq in a trial to meet the threat from IEDs."
- "Replace Snatch 1 with Snatch 2/Vector: Snatch 2 was more reliable than Snatch 1 but still had the same protection and mobility characteristics. Although money had been allocated towards the Vector project, a vehicle solution had yet to be identified."
- "Examine early replacement of Saxon with Warrior/improved FV430: Warrior is the only vehicle currently available to the Army which provided significant protection against EFP IEDs. Any additional battalions equipped with Warrior to fill the AV [Armoured Vehicle] gap on operations need only be trained on its use for mobility requirements and not full manoeuvre capability."
- "Maintain FRES ISD of 2012."

471. At its meeting on 19 January 2006, ECAB was given a presentation on the progress of the Assessment Phase for FRES in the light of the critical decisions required for the programme to maintain momentum, including the extent to which "the Army was prepared to compromise on capability … to achieve an early ISD" for FRES.[250] Final decisions would be taken by Ministers on the advice of the IAB.

472. In a paper for ECAB about the FRES Fleet Review, Brig Moore concluded that further work was necessary and the earliest that an initial operating capability (which would meet the requirements for survivability and future growth) could be achieved was 2015 to 2018.[251]

473. The paper stated that full operating capability would not be delivered until beyond 2023. That meant that some elements of the current fleet would be over 60 years old before they were taken out of service, and additional funding would be required.

474. The paper stated that, although the US Stryker vehicle could be procured to fulfil the Utility FRES variant "around 2013", that option had been discounted because it would only be available in its current configuration. For the "FRES era", this model offered insufficient protection, lacked growth potential and the UK was unlikely to be able to make any necessary modifications to it.

475. A second paper by Brig Moore, on the implications of the Fleet Review on the Army's AV capability, detailed how the FRES delays had "exacerbated" the Armoured Personnel Carrier (APC) vehicle gap; Saxon's limitations made it unsafe for use on operations but there was currently no alternative vehicle available.[252] Gen Dannatt had asked Brig Moore to identify the options to fill this gap until FRES was able to enter service.

476. In considering whether PPVs could offer a solution, Brig Moore outlined the differences between the FRES APC requirement and PPV capabilities:

> "… PPV [sic] has a limited degree of protection and mobility, and is designed around a patrol mission of up to 8 hours. These vehicles are not organic to units, but are issued in theatre as required. Originally designed as a specialist NI capability, the requirement for PPV in all theatres is becoming enduring …"

477. Brig Moore wrote that the in service PPV capability was provided by Snatch vehicles, which were being upgraded and completion was expected by August 2006. The Vector programme would deliver "about 80" vehicles. The original requirement had been for 153 but "further risk" had been taken "for reasons of affordability". Vector would not replace Snatch and its protection levels would be "less than Saxon".

478. Brig Moore stated:

> "Whilst new PPVs cannot fill the APC gap, they may help to mitigate its impact, especially on operations in the short term. The longer term plan for PPVs is currently being scoped by DCI(A) [Brig Inshaw]."

479. Brig Moore concluded that the "most effective way" to address the issue was by "a combination of upgrading and managing in-service AVs". That would have an impact on the AV fleet, but further work was necessary to "confirm the most operationally appropriate and cost effective mix" and to assess how much risk could be carried.

480. Gen Jackson stated at the meeting that the Army was "disappointed by the conclusions" of the review, "but it was vital that ECAB understood how such conclusions had been reached and the implications for the in-service armoured vehicle fleet".[253]

481. ECAB agreed:

- "FRES was the Army's highest priority and that, given the future threat, the requirement was fully justified. It would be important to get the DMB engaged in the whole Armoured Vehicle Fleet issue so that it was seen as a priority in terms of resources."
- The FRES Fleet Review Outcome Paper with some amendments, including that:
  - The programme should "aim to achieve the earliest possible" ISD and full operating capability by "challenging traditional acquisition models and seeking an incremental introduction of capability".
  - It would be necessary to update and upgrade FV430 and CVR(T) and replace Saxon.

[253] Minutes, 19 January 2006, Executive Committee of the Army Board meeting.

- Purchasing new MOTS [modified-off-the-shelf] vehicles such as to meet the Mechanised Infantry APC gap, such as Stryker, "should not be considered further".
- It endorsed the "aspiration" to withdraw Saxon from mechanised brigades and take it out of service "as soon as was practicable".

- "The requirement to improve our PPV capability should be addressed as a related but separate piece of work."

482. Reflecting ECAB's discussion, Gen Jackson wrote to Lord Drayson, on 23 January, inviting him to note the delay in the forecast FRES ISD and that ECAB had commissioned further work on maintaining adequate military capability.[254]

483. Gen Jackson set out how the FRES programme had failed to keep up with planned timescales, with the earliest ISD being delayed from 2012 to "2015-2018" as a result of the requirement to meet the threats it would likely face. He described that conclusion as "extremely unpalatable".

484. Gen Jackson wrote that ECAB had concluded that there was "an urgent non-discretionary requirement to maintain adequate military capability and protected mobility" until FRES came into service, and that there was "a clear moral responsibility to do the best we can to safeguard soldiers' lives in the interim". That would include plans "to run on – and upgrade" FV430 and CVR(T) vehicles to fill the gap.

485. Lord Drayson's Private Office recorded that he had discussed the advice with Gen Jackson on 24 January and was not content to note the delay.[255] Lord Drayson viewed:

> "… the suggested slip in (FRES) In Service Date as entirely unacceptable and, as agreed, intends to work with CGS [Chief of the General Staff] and IAB [Investment Approval Board] members over the next months to ensure a way ahead is found that meets the Army's requirements."

486. Lord Drayson spoke to Mr Bill Jeffrey, MOD Permanent Under Secretary, on 30 January, about armoured vehicle capability including those in use on current operations and FRES.[256]

487. Lord Drayson told the Inquiry that he had asked Mr Jeffrey:

> "… to grip the FRES situation because I was not content with the proposal to further delay the project and because I was concerned that the MOD was not giving the issue of armoured vehicles sufficient priority."[257]

[257] Statement, 15 December 2010, page 5.

488. On 3 February, Lt Gen Fulton advised Mr Jeffrey how the MOD intended "to deliver a coherent armoured vehicle capability which meets current and future needs, against the background of the wish to make an early announcement to reassure the public, industry and the Army that the MOD is on top of the issue".[258]

489. Lt Gen Fulton recommended that Mr Jeffrey should note that:

"a. Urgent work is under way to identify and cost options to meet Defence's short term need for armoured vehicles which meet the increased demand of current operations and to consider whether timescales and capability can be advanced by making an early commitment.

b. The armoured vehicle work builds on the Defence Industrial strategy … and the more general armoured fighting vehicle work with industry.

c. Concurrent work is considering how the Future Rapid Effect System (FRES) project can be accelerated to meet Defence's longer term need for armoured capability."

490. Lt Gen Fulton advised that work "during the FRES Assessment Phase" had "indicated" that it was "very unlikely" that an initial operating capability could be achieved before 2015; and that was "principally driven by the need to ensure" that it was "capable of future weight growth (in order to achieve protection requirements over a long life) and technology insertion".

491. Addressing the implications of that delay, including the need to retain existing armoured vehicles with recognised deficiencies, Lt Gen Fulton wrote: "Work has been under way since July 2005 to identify the full implications for the armoured vehicle fleet of these deficiencies, and to consider how to address them." The FV430 and CVR(T) fleets were facing obsolescence but that could be managed to a degree. They would need up-armouring to meet the threat level faced in Iraq. Saxon was described as "insufficiently effective". The funding provided for FRES in the Equipment Programme would be examined "to identify opportunities to fund enhancements to the existing AV fleet".

492. Mr Jeffrey forwarded Lt Gen Fulton's advice to Lord Drayson, agreeing that the issue should be looked at urgently for a number of reasons, including that "the increased demands of current operations" had "exposed weaknesses in what was already a fleet facing obsolescence".[259]

493. Mr Jeffrey stated that the DMB would discuss the deficiencies of the existing armoured vehicle fleet on 9 March and it "may be that there will be opportunities to deploy funds previously earmarked for FRES". FRES would be discussed by the IAB on 9 February.

[259] Minute PUS [MOD] to Minister (DP), 3 February 2006, 'Armoured Vehicle Capability'.

494. Mr Jeffrey promised a progress report after the DMB in March, stating:

> "My aim is to put the Secretary of State and you in a position to make a clear early public statement on FRES and plans for armoured vehicle capability in the intervening period before FRES comes into service, to give confidence that we are addressing the issue responsibly."

495. The MOD has not been able to provide a complete record of the DMB meeting held on 9 March, but the summary of conclusions makes no specific reference to FRES.[260]

496. The summary of the record did state that the DMB had concluded "that there was a stronger continuing operational requirement for FV430 overhaul and upgrade than had been assumed in STP05". It was decided that sufficient additional resources should be provided to cover this cost in 2006-2007 and the longer-term requirement would be reviewed in STP/EP07.

497. ECAB met on 16 March.[261]

498. The minutes of the meeting stated that Lord Drayson's:

> "… visit to Land had gone well, and the Minister understood the importance of FRES; the implications of the new ISD [In Service Date]; the need for an interim solution to plug the gap … and the requirement to improve Protected Patrol Vehicles (PPVs)."

499. On 17 March, Mr Jeffrey wrote to Lord Drayson with an update on armoured vehicle capability following the DMB's discussion of the subject on 9 March.[262]

500. Mr Jeffrey stated that the discussion was "set in the context of the wider financial position in 2006/07 and the other demands on our resources; including the desire to bring forward the buy of the 5th C17, higher fuel prices … and a range of other matters".

501. The DMB view was that "the majority of issues should be resolved in the wider EP/STP planning round, but that there were grounds for taking some decisions early". That included replacing Saxon and the overhaul of the FV430 series of vehicles "to provide a better capability for mechanised infantry". The resources for the conversion of vehicles for use on Op TELIC would be sought through a UOR.

502. Mr Jeffrey said that the DMB had discussed the "high priority" of ensuring FRES was delivered "as early as possible". Lt Gen Fulton was tasked to prioritise the requirement for FRES funding in 2006/07 in the context of "other capability requirements, and any other cost pressures on the Equipment Programme" in 2006/07.

503. Other issues relating to armoured vehicle capability were to be taken forward within STP/EP07.

[262] Minute PS/PUS [MOD] to Min(DP), 17 March 2006, 'Armoured Vehicle Capability – DMB Decisions'.

504. Mr Jeffrey's minute stated that the requirement for PPVs was "distinct from the armoured vehicle capability, but PPV may help to mitigate shortfalls over the next few years". The Vector contract "for at least 62 vehicles" was imminent and "options to deliver more" would be considered in the planning round.

505. On 24 April, Maj Gen Rollo told ECAB that co-ordinated work on "the FRES/AV Gap" was "in hand for STP/EP07 and STP/EP08".[263] Two programme reviews were ongoing, including an Armoured Vehicle strategy and "Armoured Vehicle Through Life Management Plan". Lord Drayson "was fully engaged in this issue and the Army should capitalise on this".

506. Mr Des Browne replaced Dr Reid as Defence Secretary in May 2006.

507. On 25 May, Mr Browne was advised by a junior MOD official to write to Mr Stephen Timms, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, to seek an uplift in UOR funding to begin up-armouring the FV430 fleet for Iraq "as soon as possible".[264] A business case for £6m to procure the "long-lead items" for this project had been approved in April 2006.

508. The FV430 fleet had not previously operated outside MNF bases as they fell short of the force protection levels required, but Mr Browne stated:

> "It is anticipated that there will be an increasing requirement for the FV430 fleet to deploy in a more overt capacity over the coming months, necessitating appropriate protection against the associated exposure to prevalent threats."

509. Mr Timms approved the proposal on 15 June.[265]

510. On 21 June, the DMB received two presentations; one about medium weight capability, and one about FRES.[266] The minutes do not make clear what constituted medium weight capability for the purposes of the meeting but stated that it was a valuable "over the horizon" capability that was much broader than FRES, although FRES "formed an important part of it". It was a joint capability to which all three Services contributed. It did not appear from the minutes that either presentation related to PPVs.

511. The DMB concluded that FRES was the Army's highest priority equipment programme after support to operations. FRES would be in service for many decades and it would be essential that there was growth potential and realism about timelines. The Board noted "with concern" that the programme was taking longer than originally anticipated. That was attributed to the time it had taken to understand the requirement properly, to plan, research and de-risk the programme. The delays were operationally damaging and had led directly to the need for force protection enhancements to FV430 vehicles deployed in Iraq. The DMB stressed that it expected lessons to be learned.

512. The up-armoured FV430 vehicles, known as Bulldog, began to deploy to Iraq in December 2006.[267]

513. Following his trip to Iraq in late 2006, General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, Vice Chief of the Defence Staff, recorded:

> "Bulldog (up-armoured and engined 430) received rave reviews for its protection (not yet fully tested), mobility in tight streets and reduction in road/kerb damage. The battlegroup's hierarchy saw it as a sound medium capability for up to 10 years."[268]

PROJECT VECTOR

514. As the preceding text in this Section shows, the MOD had been considering the potential requirement to deploy PPVs concurrently in Iraq and Afghanistan since 2004. In February 2005, it had been decided that, alongside the Snatch conversion programme, 100 Vector vehicles should be procured.

515. A business case for Project Vector, requesting approval to purchase 62 Vector vehicles at a cost of £18.8m was submitted to the IAB on 13 March 2006.[269] Those vehicles were intended for Afghanistan. PJHQ accepted that the vehicles would not be available before March 2007.

516. The business case stated that "initial scoping studies" for a Vector vehicle solution had considered "an increased capacity Snatch" but that had not been successful and would not be considered any further as a suitable platform for Vector. That was due to a "complete inability" to meet the Key User Requirement concerning the weight it was expected to carry.

517. Snatch 2 vehicles had been deployed to Afghanistan but had been "restricted to urban patrols" because of their mobility issues and the extreme terrain. Vector would offer a "substantial increase in the performance to that of Snatch 2 in terms of protection, mobility and capacity". On protection it stated:

> "It can be seen that Vector can be used in a more hostile environment than Snatch as is anticipated on Op HERRICK once full operations are undertaken."

518. The operational analysis had been conducted by DSTL.

519. The business case stated: "Vector is currently CinC (LAND) [Gen Dannatt]'s highest priority."

520. There was a reference to the SOR produced on 21 February 2005 stating that the requirement for PPVs on a global and enduring basis was 1,030 vehicles: 877 Snatch 2 and 153 Vector vehicles. The business case stated that financial limitations currently constrained the numbers to 624 Snatch 2 and 62 Vector vehicles. The risk arising from the shortfall in vehicles would be managed by "the PPV management committee" but:

> "Initially all of the procured vehicles will be deployed on Op HERRICK due to the improved mobility that Vector offers over Snatch 2A."[270]

521. A requirement for 166 PPVs had been endorsed for Op HERRICK. That would initially be met through the deployment of Snatch 2A but 62 would be withdrawn and replaced with Vector during roll-out. The 62 withdrawn vehicles would be "redeployed to reduce risk taken on expeditionary operations" which was "expected to be Op TELIC".

522. A commercial off-the-shelf option was recommended as the means to deliver the capability as there were "a number of manufacturers who produce armoured vehicles which would fulfil the requirements of Project Vector" and some of those vehicles were in service with "other armed forces". There was "insufficient time" to develop a bespoke option.

523. Lord Drayson's copy of the business case was annotated by his Assistant Private Secretary on 7 March.[271] It stated:

> "For info only and low priority. Worth a skim solely because it deals with armoured vehicles (albeit light ones), is described CinC Land's 'highest priority' and you will see him on Friday!"

524. On 9 March, Lord Drayson noted: "Following visit let's get focused on this project."[272]

525. On 14 March, Lord Drayson's Assistant Private Secretary wrote to the Directorate of Capability, Resources and Scrutiny (Battlespace Manoeuvre) (DCRS(BM)), noting the 3 March business case and Lord Drayson's visit to Land Command.[273] Lord Drayson understood "that the vehicles are required for the March 2007 Afghanistan roulement", and it would be important that work was completed "on schedule by September".

526. The "Project Vector" business case was approved on 21 March.[274]

527. On 22 March, Lord Drayson's Private Office recorded that:

> "Given the present tempo of operations, and the threat the Army are typically facing during deployments, Lord Drayson believes it is imperative that we ensure we are providing them (in both the near and long term) with appropriately protected vehicles. This will clearly involve both addressing the present operational requirement, and ensuring that FRES is brought into service no later than 2012."[275]

528. On 22 March, an MOD official from DCRS(BM) advised Lord Drayson on how the remaining 104 Vector vehicles (from the 166 total) might be procured with Treasury funding.[276] The manufacturer would be working "flat out" to produce the initial purchase and there was "no scope to produce either more vehicles [between March and May 2007], or bring forward the delivery timeline".

529. Approval had been given to buy as many vehicles as the available funding would allow but, due to the late inclusion of an additional protection measure against EFPs, it was "possible" that fewer than 62 would be purchased.

530. The official added that there were "anticipated requirements for future PPV capabilities in the short and long terms". Lord Drayson was advised that a follow-on purchase could be made in the short term either through UOR or Equipment Programme action to meet the "full Defence wide requirement".

531. Considering the UOR route, the official wrote that the requirement for additional Vector vehicles had not been included in the financial estimate for Afghanistan approved by Cabinet. It was therefore not advised to approach Treasury until the operational requirement was "sufficiently mature", coupled with some operational experience of Snatch's performance in Afghanistan. Delaying a UOR until September would not have an impact on the delivery schedule, given that the manufacturer was working at maximum capacity to deliver the first tranche of vehicles. "Initial informal soundings" from the Treasury were that:

> "… not only would the requirement need to be robust (ie a clear explanation of why Snatch, for which they have already provided UOR funding is not appropriate at all for Op HERRICK, and that no other in-service vehicle … would not fill the gap), but also that the costs would need to fall within our currently negotiated funding envelope."

532. Raising an Equipment Programme enhancement option was an alternative route to secure the vehicles which again would not have an impact on the delivery schedule. The official advised that, whilst it was "likely" that procuring additional Vector vehicles would be seen as "a high priority across Defence", it was noted that "other competing priorities in EP07" meant that there was no guarantee that funding would be found. The official gave three examples of those priorities, one of which was additional FRES funding.

533. The official did not recommend which option Lord Drayson should approve. It was also stated that longer-term consideration was needed to understand "how this enduring capability might be met, to replace the Snatch/Vector mix".

534. Lord Drayson was also informed that, of the £74.5m the DMB had allocated to the PPV programme in FY 2005/06, £11m would not be spent.

535. Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry that, from the time of the announcement in June 2004 that the Headquarters ARRC would be deployed to Afghanistan in 2006, "whatever was happening in Iraq and however Iraq was going to develop, there was going to be another operation in Afghanistan in the middle of 2006"; and that:

> "… everything as far as I was concerned to do with Iraq from the time that I became Commander in Chief in March 2005 was not just in the context uniquely of Iraq, but in the wider context of '… and we are going to be involved in Afghanistan as well'."[277]

536. Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry that, in his view:

- Afghanistan was "perhaps much more important to get right";
- "resourcing the operation in Afghanistan was particularly important"; and
- "Afghanistan would always develop as being the main effort".

537. Referring to the decision to procure Vector vehicles, Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry that one of the brigades going into Afghanistan "had no vehicles at all" and the Army "knew that by spring 2007 we had to have something for them".[278] Gen Dannatt said that the Vector programme was decided "in something of a hurry".

538. The procurement of the remaining 104 Vector vehicles, to bring the total to 166, was progressed as part of Maj Gen Applegate's response to the armoured vehicle review in June 2006. That is addressed later in this Section.

THE DECISION TO PROCURE ADDITIONAL VEHICLES FOR IRAQ

539. Further fatalities in Iraq prompted questions about what more could be done to provide better protection for British troops.

540. On 31 January 2006, Corporal Gordon Pritchard was killed whilst on patrol in Umm Qasr when the Land Rover in which he was travelling was hit by a roadside IED.[279] Three other soldiers were injured, one seriously, in the same incident.

541. On 28 February, Captain Richard John Holmes and Private Lee Ellis were killed in an IED attack in a joint Snatch and Warrior vehicle convoy in al-Amara.[280]

542. On 15 April, Lieutenant Richard Palmer was killed when his patrol vehicle hit a roadside IED north-west of Basra.[281]

543. On 13 May, Private Joseva Lewaicei and Private Adam Morris were killed while on patrol when their Snatch vehicle hit a roadside IED just outside of Basra.[282]

544. On 28 May, Lieutenant Tom Mildinhall and Lance Corporal Paul Farrelly were killed by a PIR EFP IED whilst on patrol in Snatch vehicles.[283]

545. Brigadier James Everard, Commander 20 Armoured Brigade, wrote in his post-operation tour report that a policy had been put in place from 29 May whereby all vehicles travelling around Basra City were led by Warriors.[284] He wrote:

> "This measure proved its worth as SAF [small arms fire] and RPG contacts also increased from July and Warrior a magnet for enemy fires frequently drawing attention away from other less well protected vehicles …"

546. In a debate in the House of Lords on 12 June, Lord Astor of Hever raised the question of when the Government intended to bring into service further patrol vehicles armoured to provide protection against IEDs.[285]

547. Lord Drayson responded that PPVs were:

> "… only one of a range of vehicles available to commanders to allow them to balance mobility, protection, and profile based on the threat, the terrain and the task. PPVs offer a level of protection commensurate with their weight, size and role, together with good mobility and a low profile."

548. Following a supplementary question from Lord Astor, stating that the Snatch "was not remotely adequate for patrolling areas where insurgents used land mines" and asking whether an assessment had been made of the RG31,[286] "which the Americans had bought in large numbers", Lord Drayson responded:

> "… I do not accept that Snatch Land Rovers are not appropriate for the role. We must recognise the difference between protection and survivability. It is important that we have the trade-offs that we need for mobility. The Snatch … provides us with the mobility and level of protection that we need.

"We had RG31s in Bosnia, which we took out of service some time ago due to the difficulties with maintenance. We have looked at the RG31 … and concluded that the size and profile did not meet our needs. Size is important in the urban environment. The RG31 cannot access areas that Snatch Land Rovers can get to."

549. Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, who succeeded AM Torpy as CJO in March 2006, visited Iraq from 13 to 15 June.[287] He reported:

"… I do have some concerns as I look ahead over the balance of the year … If we are to match the wider campaign desire for a decisive six months we need to balance ourselves accordingly."

550. On reducing troops and equipment in Iraq, he stated:

"Do not look for too big a dividend this year. Particularly we need to retain as much Warrior … as LAND can afford. The reality is that Warrior gives us confidence and a protective edge over EFPs. The boys can manage Snatch – just; but they have no inherent confidence in it."

551. Mr Ingram gave evidence about Snatch Land Rovers to the Defence Select Committee on 20 June.[288] He said that there was no "off-the-shelf" solution that would offer the "all-round protection we would seek with the same utility and manoeuvrability".

552. Mr Ingram told the Committee that there was "a balance of risk" that needed to be taken. While the MOD was "very conscious of where the threats were coming from", they did "not necessarily have every capacity to deal with those threats".

553. On 26 June, Mr Browne announced a review of armoured vehicles in Parliament.[289] He stated:

"As I have already said to the House, it is open for commanders to deploy vehicles that have heavier protection than the Snatch Land Rover … Other vehicles are available to them; there is a choice. However, commanders must be free to make decisions in relation to the operations for which they deploy soldiers. I have already said to the House that I am aware of the issue: I could not but be aware of it following my visit last week and, indeed, my earlier visit. I have asked for a review of what we can do in the long term and immediately. I shall see what we can do immediately to respond to the changing situation, although significant measures other than those in relation to the vehicle's armour must be taken. We are at the leading edge of some of them, and electronic counter-measures, in particular."

554. Mr Browne met Mr Ingram and Lord Drayson to discuss the review on 27 June.[290] He asked Lord Drayson to:

> "… set the necessary work in hand to provide Ministers with urgent, realistic, costed advice on whether there is anything more we can do to protect troops … and to enable them to achieve their mission(s). In particular, the review should examine whether there are any vehicles with a higher level of protection than Snatch Land Rovers which could be procured quickly (and if so, at what cost)."

555. Maj Gen Applegate provided a paper to Lord Drayson on "the capability that might be achieved with the investment of about £50m for the protection of soldiers in PPVs" on 28 June.[291] He recommended that Lord Drayson approve:

- a commitment of £2m for an "urgent study on options for an enhanced PPV";
- the procurement of all 166 Vector vehicles for Afghanistan; and
- the purchase of additional armoured kits for FV430 for use in Iraq. The existing UOR would begin to deliver up-armoured FV430s in October 2006 and deliveries would be completed by January 2007.

556. Maj Gen Applegate advised Lord Drayson:

> "PJHQ and LAND regard a broad systems approach to force protection as essential, linking ISTAR, situational awareness, tactic techniques and procedures, ECM and platform survivability. This systems approach seeks to defeat the system; if this fails defeat [sic] the device, and finally defeat the attack."

557. Maj Gen Applegate highlighted that the UK had been criticised for not adopting the RG31, variants of which were in service with US and Canadian forces and which had been used by UK forces in the past. He wrote that RG31 had previously been discounted as a suitable alternative to Snatch. Brig Moore would be briefed on its development and growth potential when he visited South Africa on 29 June.

558. In relation to the study into future PPV capability, Maj Gen Applegate wrote:

> "The threat continues to develop and there is a requirement to assess urgently how to sustain the PPV capability. The US is conducting a similar assessment. New developments designed to meet this threat are currently at the demonstrator stage and it would be prudent to examine these urgently to understand what capabilities they might offer. In general if we are to combat the developing threat we will require a heavier vehicle capable of carrying a higher payload in order to mount additional armour. The ability of such a vehicle to operate effectively in the urban environment will be part of the assessment."

[291] Minute Applegate to APS/Min(DP), 28 June 2006, 'Protected Patrol Vehicles (PPV)'.

559. Maj Gen Applegate recommended that additional funding be provided "to develop concurrently an enhanced PPV capability to match the emerging threat, with an anticipated fielding in the latter half of 2007". In the interim, "and to provide the commander with sufficient flexibility to mitigate the weakness of Snatch, additional armour packs should be procured for FV430". The possibility of accelerating the modification of FV430 and Vector was also being explored.

560. Lord Drayson approved the request the same day.[292] He asked Maj Gen Applegate to "engage with coalition partner to identify whether they may have excess PPV capacity which would provide a greater level of protection which could be made available to the UK"; and for further advice by 13 July.

561. Following his visit to South Africa, Brig Moore advised on 3 July that, should the Army decide that "a better protected PPV" was required, then the RG31 had "the potential to meet that requirement".[293] In considering the requirement, Brig Moore wrote that there was a "conundrum" between a heavier vehicle that was able to protect soldiers against the mine or IED threat, and ensuring the vehicle was agile enough to access built-up areas. He added that "if the UK wants to provide its soldiers with the protection necessary to do their job, it will need a heavier PPV".

562. On RG31, Brig Moore stated:

> "It is now apparent that RG31 … has sufficient stretch potential to take the additional weight associated with protection against […]. In addition, LSSA [Land Systems South Africa] has a rigorous testing regime … and this is fully compliant with DSTL thinking. LSSA is innovative, front running and is at the leading edge of their trade. Should the Army want a heavier and better protected PPV, RG31 would be a strong contender."

563. In his summary, Brig Moore said that "the South Africans were open, engaging and ready to help in any way possible. Notwithstanding the considerable attributes of RG31, UK should exploit this opportunity."

564. In response to a question from the Inquiry, about whether he had asked about potential alternatives to Snatch on the global market before June 2006, Lord Drayson wrote in his statement:

> "Yes … I was advised that there was no vehicle identified that could provide the mobility and small footprint offered by Snatch and that the vehicles used by the US such as Stryker and Humvee did not offer a better solution. The larger protected patrol vehicles (such as the RG31 …) were regarded by the Army as unsuitable for Iraq …

Getting the Army to want such a vehicle to the point where it was prepared to allocate funding to it was the key point. I pushed to try to make this happen.
> "I asked Des Browne to direct me to look into this issue."[294]

565. While discussions about the medium weight PPV were ongoing, Gen Dannatt wrote to Gen Jackson in July about the level of operational risk on current operations.[295] Gen Dannatt was to take over as Chief of the General Staff in August. He wrote:

> "The pace and changing dynamics in theatre have brought into sharp relief the concerns that you and I have about support to current operations. In addition, Ministers have recently faced difficult questions in the House. Given that there are some important discussions in ECAB, Programme and Planning Strategy Group, and DMB in the next few days, I thought I should set out now very clearly my view of the unacceptable areas of risk."

566. Gen Dannatt described four "major concerns as the Force provider", protected mobility and protected patrol vehicles being his "first and overriding concern".

567. Gen Dannatt wrote that the use of Vector, up-armoured FV430 and Warrior would "provide a balanced capability" in the short term which could be "tailored to met the different demands" of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. It was "accepted" that Vector would not provide "full protection against all threats" but it would "increase survivability compared with Snatch improved protection, greater mobility and larger capacity)" and he believed that there was "no immediate or practicable alternative".

568. Gen Dannatt stated that there was therefore "an urgent need to complete the buy of Vector now". While plans in place meant that that "should achieve the immediate goal" for Afghanistan, it would leave forces in Iraq with Snatch "for the foreseeable future". He wrote:

> "How the remainder of the PPV capability shortfall should best be addressed will require further consideration. If a better PPV than Vector can be developed, and delivered in the right timeframe, then clearly we should pursue this line. However, I reiterate the need for a balanced capability …"

569. "In parallel", Gen Dannatt thought that there was "an urgent need to complete the upgrade of FV430s".

[294] Statement, 18 January 2011, pages 5-6.
[295] Letter Dannatt to Jackson, July 2006, 'The Level of Operational Risk on Current Operations'.

570. On 4 July, Mr Browne sent Lord Drayson a note summarising a meeting they had earlier that day to discuss PPVs.[296] They agreed that Lord Drayson would pursue:

- clear confirmation from military commanders that there was a requirement for a medium weight armoured patrol vehicle as an alternative to Snatch or Tracked Armoured Vehicles;
- subject to that confirmation, a rapid investigation of options to deliver such a capability as an interim solution (around 50-100 vehicles, although that would need to be refined) whilst work continued on longer term solutions; and
- subject to both points, deploying the vehicles alongside the forces due to be deployed to Iraq in November 2006.

571. Mr Browne reported that he had discussed funding with Mr Gordon Brown, Chancellor of the Exchequer, following his meeting with Lord Drayson where it was concluded that the MOD could initially use the UOR contingency of £30m to fund the project; and that additional funds could be sought as required.

572. On 5 July, Lord Drayson asked Lt Gen Houghton for clear confirmation, "in consultation with Front Line Commands", as to whether there was a requirement for a medium weight armoured patrol vehicle "as an alternative to use of Snatch or Tracked Armoured Vehicles on current operations".[297]

573. Lt Gen Houghton provided that confirmation on 7 July, stating:

> "I am clear that, in light of the increasingly sophisticated and potent asymmetric threat that we now face, a requirement for a medium weight PPV, in addition to the current and planned enhancements to light weight PPV and tracked armoured vehicles exists …
> "We need a medium weight PPV … to provide a significantly enhanced physical protection against EFP IEDs and RPGs … to prosecute our missions successfully without unnecessary casualties. Only a balanced force will give the operational commander the optimum flexibility to meet the range of tasks based on an assessment of threat and risk. The Frontline Commands share this assessment."[298]

574. Lt Gen Houghton added that, as Lord Drayson was aware, physical protection was "only part of a balanced systems approach to delivering a Force Protection capability"; and that improvements to the ISTAR capability were "a key element in achieving the overall protection that we need".

575. On the same day, Lord Drayson asked Maj Gen Applegate:

> "… for advice … in consultation with CJO and Land by 1600 14 July setting out the number of vehicles required to meet present operational commitments … [and] project plans for delivering the requisite number of vehicles in time to deploy on the next Iraq roulement in November 2006."[299]

576. On 11 July, Mr Browne told the House of Commons Defence Committee that the increased IED threat had "generated a set of circumstances" where, in his view, the MOD needed "to look at whether there is a need for something between Snatch Land Rovers as a form of land transport and the Warrior".[300] In ordering a review of the use of the Snatch, he had "accepted in principle" the need "to see if we can identify resources that can be procured and deployed in the timescale that would provide that [the required] level of protection while we wait for other armoured options becoming available".

577. On 12 July, Brig Inshaw recommended that Maj Gen Applegate agree:

> "Despite recent casualties, the requirement to operate PPVs on current operations endures and may increase as Defence is likely to be required to conduct concurrent … campaigns over the next 3-4 years."[301]

578. Brig Inshaw advised that there was a requirement for a "balanced PPV capability". It should include a medium weight PPV, for which there was "an urgent requirement", and light, agile PPVs "such as Vector", although "commanders recognise that such a vehicle will never be protected against the most demanding threats".

579. Brig Inshaw advised that Brig Moore had examined "a number of options" that were "either in development or in service elsewhere in the world". Brig Inshaw wrote that commanders accepted all of these could produce solutions that were "significantly larger" or have "a more aggressive profile" than Snatch and Vector. It was accepted that this was "a penalty" commanders would "have to pay for the improved levels of protection". Brig Inshaw added:

> "To avoid confusion, it should be noted that PPVs will not deliver the capability or overall protection levels we would expect of an in-service APC [Armoured Personnel Carrier] (such as FV430 Mk 3) or of FRES, which will be designed to operate in a less permissive environment (where issues surrounding size and posture are far less important) and to defeat a significantly more demanding threat. A mixed fleet of light and medium PPVs would allow commanders to force package appropriately to the terrain and task."

580. In addition, Brig Inshaw wrote that there was "an urgent requirement for armoured vehicles to provide protected transport to move personnel for administrative purposes" because PPVs had "been used to fulfil this role" in the past. That would be addressed by the deployment of FV430s in November 2006 and LAND was "deploying additional up-armoured Warrior" vehicles to meet the requirement in "the very short term".

581. Brig Inshaw advised that improved physical protection was only part of the solution; work was also under way to address battlefield helicopter and ISTAR shortfalls, and TTPs would continue to be adapted. He noted that fielding a larger PPV would "require some change to current operational practices".

582. Initial calculations highlighted a shortage of PPVs in Iraq, Afghanistan and the training pool. Brig Inshaw wrote that the MOD was taking "some 30% risk in numbers against the requirement" and that could worsen between 2007 and 2008 when Snatch 1.5 was removed from service. He suggested that 808 medium PPVs were needed to meet the operational requirement, 510 of which would be for Iraq. He also advised that all PPVs in Iraq should be medium weight (as opposed to a combination of light and medium weight vehicles, which was the suggestion for Afghanistan). The planned procurement of Vector and up-armouring of the FV430s should continue.

583. On 13 July, Lord Drayson's Assistant Private Secretary summarised a meeting that had been held between Lord Drayson and Maj Gen Applegate that evening.[302] Maj Gen Applegate had informed Lord Drayson that the requirement for 166 Vector and additional armour packs for FV430 had been confirmed. Lord Drayson had confirmed that the resources for those requirements "would not count against the new resources being provided by the Treasury to meet the medium weight PPV requirement".

584. Maj Gen Applegate had advised Lord Drayson that 15 vehicles had been examined and "the only option to borrow vehicles was 25-50 Bushmasters that Australia could release" but there was no way of acquiring additional vehicles beyond this because "there was no manufacturing line". Two options were "worthy of further consideration": the Protector (a new variant of the RG31) and the Iraq Light Armoured Vehicle (ILAV) (derived from the Cougar which was already being used by the US Marine Corps and had survived around 1,000 IED attacks in Iraq). Both vehicles would meet the required protection capabilities; the key for the MOD was which vehicle could be delivered more quickly. The US was "willing to provide a couple of ILAV vehicles to the UK early for testing".

585. Lord Drayson had suggested acquiring a number of both vehicles to reduce the delivery time and Maj Gen Applegate undertook to investigate it further. There was a discussion about "the difficulties posed" by Force Protection Inc being a new MOD supplier. Two possible options had been identified for expediting matters: either acquiring ILAV vehicles from the US under Foreign Military Sales with configuration for the UK's communications equipment, or acquiring the vehicles through a "call off contract".

586. Lord Drayson was grateful for the efforts which had been made and had stated that the "pace of work must now be maintained". He requested an update by 20 July, including advice on how "to achieve the necessary commercial arrangement".

587. Gen Granville-Chapman visited Iraq from 9 to 13 July.[303] He reported:

> "On equipment, ISTAR and helicopters remain the key focus. Whilst clearly all acknowledge the limitations of Snatch, feeling was not as strong … as I had expected. Very striking was great confidence in ECM equipment … All I spoke to had faith that this, coupled with rigorous execution of the now highly developed TTPs, gave them confidence and a good level of protection. But they would welcome a new PPV, though were clear that any vehicle would need to be able to access the tight urban sprawl that characterises much of Basra – Vector, they felt, would take the trick in this respect, but their point about utility in tight urban areas will need to be taken into account in the Medium PPV work."

588. On 19 July, in the House of Commons, Mr Owen Paterson asked Mr Browne what the performance specifications of the new Vector vehicle were and how its protection levels compared to Snatch and the RG31.[304] Mr Browne replied:

> "The key performance requirements for Vector are improved mobility, payload and capacity compared to Snatch. We do not comment on levels of armour protection …"

589. The USUR for a medium weight PPV, for use in Iraq and Afghanistan, was articulated by Lt Gen Houghton on 19 July 2006.[305] He reported that, between July 2004 and July 2006, almost half of the UK's fatalities from hostile action, 20 of the 44 deaths, were personnel travelling in Snatch Land Rovers.

590. The USUR stated: "The IED and RPG threats" in Iraq and Afghanistan "are here and now; Snatch is both obsolete as a light weight PPV and the heightened EFP IED threat" in Iraq demanded that it "should be replaced by a Medium Weight PPV (MPPV)". It should "have as much protection as possible without compromising its function (capacity and mobility) providing as balanced an answer to the range of threats as is feasible".

[305] Minute CJO to DEC GM – SO1 PLANS, 19 July 2006, 'Op TELIC and Op HERRICK – Urgent Statement of User Requirement for Medium Weight PPV'.

591. In explaining the justification for the requirement and the inadequacies of existing equipment, the points made by Lt Gen Houghton included that:

- "EC advice suggests that we have reached the engineering and technological limits of the physical protection that can be provided by Snatch and other light weight PPVs."
- " … Defence has a moral responsibility towards our servicemen to ensure we have done everything that is reasonable to minimise loss to life and ensure operational success; there is still some way to go before that assurance can be offered."
- " … [T]he public, political and media expectation is that military operations can now be conducted without significant casualties".
- "A MPPV is needed in order to provide significantly enhanced physical protection against IEDs (incl EFP) and RPGs … to prosecute the mission successfully without unnecessary casualties."
- "Every effort should be made to enhance force protection measures – perversely this may mean that as troop numbers go down, PPV numbers remain broadly similar, thereby affording greater levels of protection to a larger part of the deployed TELIC force."
- " … [O]nly a balanced force will give the operational commander the optimum flexibility to meet the range of tasks based on an assessment of threat and risk."
- " … [H]elicopters are already in short supply and it is highly unlikely that additional aircraft will be available to meet the increased demand without severe impact on JHC [Joint Helicopter Command] ability to sustain the current and emerging operational requirements."
- "Snatch is no longer fit for purpose as a light weight PPV and the increased threat requires a MPPV."

592. When the Inquiry asked Lord Drayson why he had found it necessary to ask Lt Gen Houghton for confirmation that there was a requirement for a medium weight PPV, Lord Drayson wrote in his statement:

> "It was necessary because I had become concerned about the growing casualties to personnel travelling in Snatch from IEDs in Iraq. The military had identified a requirement for a new light PPV for HERRICK (Afghanistan) which had been approved via the core equipment programme by PJHQ in March 2006 (the Vector vehicle) but no requirement had been identified for Iraq. I wrote to CJO to force the issue. The push to procure a medium weight PPV in time for the Nov 06 roulement of forces came from Ministers."[306]

593. The Inquiry asked Lt Gen Fulton why he thought the push for a medium weight PPV had to come from Lord Drayson instead of from the Defence Board or Chiefs of Staff:

> " … I think there's a sort of relationship there between the commander on the ground at whatever level, the commander in theatre, the Permanent Joint Headquarters, the chiefs, the equipment customer and a series of examinations of what was needed against what was … available in the sense of, you know, did it exist?
> "I don't think people were sitting on their hands saying, 'It is all fine'. I think people were saying, 'this IED problem is a whole theatre problem …'"[307]

594. Lieutenant General Andrew Figgures, who succeeded Lt Gen Fulton as DCDS(EC) in June 2006, told the Inquiry that the procurement of a medium weight PPV was not possible before 2006 because there was not a vehicle that could meet the requirement:

> "… my judgement would be that every waking hour people had they were attempting to solve the problem in this area, but if there is no technical solution to it, however much effort you put into it, you can't solve it."[308]

595. The Inquiry asked Lord Drayson why the military chain of command had not identified the requirement earlier. He replied:

> "I found it hard to understand why the military chain of command had not raised a requirement for a medium weight PPV when it was clear that it was not technically possible to procure a light weight PPV at that time with enough armour protection to overmatch the IED then being used against our troops. The thinking of the military throughout this period was that a small light weight vehicle of the size and weight of Snatch was needed to patrol in the way the British Army operated in Iraq. I accepted that buying a much bigger and better protected medium weight vehicle would not be suitable for this type of patrolling in narrow streets but I believed that providing commanders in theatre with the option of a bigger vehicle would allow them to choose when and where to use it."[309]

THE INTRODUCTION OF MASTIFF

596. A variant of the US Cougar vehicle was selected as the solution to the medium weight PPV gap. It was already in service with the US Army in Iraq.

[309] Statement, 15 December 2010, page 6.

597. A business case for the procurement of 108 Cougar vehicles at an estimated cost of £73.1m was submitted to the IAB on 20 July.[310] It was a joint case from the DEC(GM) and SUV IPT teams. One company of vehicles would be delivered by November 2006 and the remaining vehicles by April 2007. The total requirement was for 510 vehicles for Iraq and 150 for Afghanistan.

598. The business case stated that a "significant proportion of IEDs are EFPs, which have constantly changing initiation methods and are difficult to detect".

599. There were currently 380 Snatch vehicles in Iraq, against a theatre establishment of 420:

> "The Snatch PPV provide the deployed force with a level of manoeuvrability and survivability in order to conduct operations, however, the rapidly evolving asymmetric threat faced on Ops TELIC and HERRICK have overmatched the capability envelope of the Snatch PPV. Moreover, the majority of Snatch deployed on Op TELIC are the 1.5 variant which is due to go out of service from January 2007. With a host of obsolescence issues, Snatch is no longer capable of matching the high level of threat faced in Iraq and Afghanistan."

600. The business case stated that there was "no specific operational analysis to support the requirement" for a medium weight PPV but that it had been driven by the "rapidly evolving threat", namely EFPs. Work had been initiated by Brig Inshaw "to define the longer term requirement to fulfil the future PPV capability".

601. The business case considered four options:

- To do the minimum: deploy additional assets "and/or" reallocate assets to Op TELIC and Op HERRICK. In Iraq that was likely to mean more Warrior vehicles were deployed but "the current high usage rates" were already having a detrimental effect on the ability to sustain the Warrior fleet in the longer term. That option had "been discounted".
- RG31: That solution was considered "immature" and had "been discounted".
- Cougar 6x6: The preferred solution with "proven mine protection (in-service US Army data)" and sufficient payload to mount armour necessary for better protection.
- Bushmaster: An Australian vehicle with mine protection that was in service with Australian forces in Iraq. Up to 25 vehicles had been offered by the Australian Government which could meet the "challenging timelines" but it would need further investigation.

602. The business case proposed procuring the Cougar 6x6 through a Foreign Military Sales case with the US (see Box, 'The Cougar vehicle'). In assessing the commercial risk, the attached risk register said that there was "high level US military support for the planned acquisition". The business case proposed to adopt "a single source acquisition strategy" that was based on "a world-wide market survey, paper technical assessment and industrial visits to ascertain the most suitable and cost effective solution".

603. The business case stated that, although Cougar would provide a "significant enhancement in survivability" over Snatch and Vector, it would still be defeated by the most effective EFP and very large blast IEDs. It also highlighted that Cougar was "a large platform with good cross country mobility but less agility and terrain accessibility in the urban environment than Snatch and Vector". It was reiterated that the chain of command should understand and explain the strengths and limitations of the platform to all potential users.

604. On 20 July, Lord Drayson wrote to Mr Timms seeking his agreement for an additional £89.2m of UOR funding to be found from the Reserve for Cougar vehicles and FV430 vehicles.[311] The £47.8m required for additional Vector vehicles for Afghanistan could be found from within the Defence budget.

605. Lord Drayson wrote that the review of protected vehicles announced by Mr Browne on 26 June had "confirmed" there was a capability gap in Iraq and Afghanistan's protected vehicles. The "key threat in Iraq" was "now" the EFP IED. Warrior vehicles had been up-armoured to help meet this threat but that had led to an "over-reliance" upon it in theatre which meant that personnel in Warrior units were "significantly exceeding" guidelines for operational tour intervals.[312]

606. Lord Drayson stated that Snatch vehicles could not "be armoured sufficiently to defeat the EFP IED or RPG threats": "As the media and a number of politicians have highlighted recently, there have been a significant number of deaths in Iraq from EFP IED attacks on Snatch."

607. Lord Drayson said that, after "a very rapid evaluation" of "possible vehicles available worldwide", the Cougar variant was best placed to meet "both the time and performance criteria". He added:

> "The fact that an early version is already in the UK service with Explosive Ordnance Disposal troops and it is also in service with both the US Army and Marine Corps gives us considerable confidence in it. We will be relying on the assistance of the US Government and military to deliver it as rapidly as possible and this is an excellent example of where the Special Relationship will have a direct impact on our capability on operations."

608. Lord Drayson wrote that, given Mr Browne's commitment to report back to Parliament "as soon as possible" and the start of recess on 26 July, he would be grateful for confirmation of the funding by the following day.

609. Mr Timms replied to Lord Drayson on Sunday 23 July, saying he realised that Mr Browne was "under pressure to make an announcement in the House on Monday" and the "considerable work" undertaken by officials "in scoping the requirement" within the tight deadline.[313] Mr Timms wrote that he fully recognised the need to provide "adequate protected mobility in these challenging environments" and that he supported the proposals.

610. While Mr Timms agreed that the MOD could enter into commercial arrangements to up-armour the FV430s and procure Cougar vehicles, he was "not comfortable" that the "commercial terms" had been reached for the requirements to be "properly costed". He asked for an update once the full costs were finalised, at which point he would "formally uplift" the UOR funding.

The Cougar vehicle

The Cougar is described by the US Department of Defense as "a hardened engineering vehicle that provides protection against armor-piercing rounds and high-explosive devices".[314] It is used for "ordnance disposal, communications, command and control, and leading convoy missions". It is available in two configurations: 4x4 and 6x6.

Both of these configurations have been integrated with UK systems to enable their use on UK operations: the 4x4 became the Ridgback, and the 6x6 became the Mastiff.

The main distinction between the two is their size. The British Army refer to Mastiff as Ridgback's "bigger brother".[315]

The US Marine Corps contracted Force Protection Inc to provide 28 Cougar vehicles in April 2004.[316] Three further orders were placed by the US Army for Cougar vehicles between May and June 2005, but for a Joint EOD Rapid Response Vehicle (JERRV) variant. Those were in both configurations (4x4 and 6x6) and were delivered in 2005.

The JERRV variant was a type of vehicle also known as a Mine Protected Vehicle, or more commonly a Mine Resistant Ambush Protected vehicle (MRAP) which is specifically designed to protect against landmine and IED attacks, making them suitable for Explosive Ordnance Disposal tasks.

The MOD has told the Inquiry that it cannot confirm details about US vehicles and their deployment to Iraq.[317]

The UK's EOD teams were using early versions of the MRAP Cougar, the 4x4 variant, from "2003-04" in Iraq and also deployed them to Bosnia (in 2004) and Afghanistan.[318]

To procure equipment from the US, the MOD is required to follow a Foreign Military Sales programme. That is where, under the US Arms Export Control Act, the two Governments enter into a government-to-government sales agreement.[319] It can be done where the President formally finds that to do so would strengthen the security of the US and promote world peace.

611. In anticipation of his written statement on the armoured vehicle review, Mr Browne was offered presentational advice on 21 July.[320]

612. The advice stated that one of the key messages to convey was:

> "With current vehicles, including Snatch (which will remain appropriate for some tasks) this provides a coherent package of vehicles, offering a range of protection, mobility and profile. Commanders will have a significantly increased choice of vehicles to be used as they see fit to best meet the mission and counter the threat. No one vehicle is appropriate for every task.
> "It will be important to make clear that while we are confident that the Med[ium] PPV being procured offers significantly greater protection against the key threats in both Iraq and Afghanistan than the Snatch, as with any other vehicle, it cannot be guaranteed to offer absolute protection …"

613. According to the advice, the short timescales in which the medium PPV programme had been developed meant that the usual "full testing" of the vehicle had not been possible but the MOD was confident of its capability based on US use of the same base vehicle in Iraq.

614. The range of different vehicles would allow commanders "to balance protection against the requirements of the mission". Snatch was "still an appropriate vehicle for some tasks" and the additional vehicles did not mean Snatch was "not used at all".

615. The advice recognised that the announcement marked a significant change of direction. Answers to Parliamentary Questions in June had stated that the "requirement was for small, light, highly mobile vehicle that could operate in urban areas and vehicles such as RG31 and Cougar would not meet this requirement". It added:

> "At that time the ECC [Equipment Capability Customer] was considering whether there was a long term answer to the need for a small, mobile but better protected patrol vehicle … The review [announced on 26 June] established that there was no small but better protected vehicle available now and the only immediate options for better protection were vehicles such as Cougar."

616. The advice stated that the MOD "might be open to criticism" that it had only taken action "when forced to by the media". Draft briefing for Press Office included:

"Q. Why have you done this now, not a year ago?

"A. As recent events have shown, the situation in Iraq and Afghanistan changes rapidly and the threat is constantly evolving. In response, work was ongoing within the department to examine options for the procurement of a medium protected patrol vehicle. The review announced by the Secretary of State for Defence on 26 June enabled the acceleration of this work including by securing additional funding."

617. The advice also considered the potential question of why Cougar had not been procured sooner, given that the US had been using it for "some time". The suggested response was that that was because the situation in the UK's Area of Responsibility was different to that of the US.

618. The advice acknowledged that the UK had "some very early versions" of the Cougar, such as the Mine Resistant Ambush Protected (MRAP) variant, which was used for Explosive Ordnance Disposal tasks and deployed to Iraq in "2003-4". It had been bought in 2002 from Supacat Technical Solutions Group, a subsidiary of Force Protection Inc. The advice said the MRAP vehicles were "very different" to the Cougar vehicles being procured because the MRAP vehicle was not a patrol vehicle and would not meet the UK's requirements. It did not elaborate on any of those points.

619. Mr Browne's Written Ministerial Statement on 24 July said:

"It [the Armoured Vehicles Review] has confirmed that there is a growing requirement for a protected vehicle with capabilities between our heavy armour, such as Warrior, and lighter patrol vehicles, such as Snatch. The review has also identified feasible options to address the gap in the short term. We have now completed a very rapid assessment of those options and have identified three complementary ways forward …"[321]

620. Mr Browne announced:

- the purchase of an additional 100 Vector vehicles for Afghanistan;
- the up-armouring of a further 70 FV430s for Iraq by spring 2007, in addition to the 54 already ordered; and
- the purchase of 100 Cougar vehicles for Iraq and Afghanistan.

---

621. Mr Browne concluded:

> "The up-armoured FV430, the Cougar medium PPV, and Vector fill the requirements for varying degrees of protection, mobility and profile … But I am confident that together these vehicles provide commanders with the right range of options to deal with the situations and threats they face."

622. The MOD IAB approved the Cougar business case on 25 July.[322] It warned:

> "There is clear risk of cost and time growth given the focus on satisfying the survivability requirement and the speed with which the case has been put together … Due to the exceptional way in which this programme has been funded, it is important that it is understood that there is no scope for cost growth. The Treasury have indicated that they will pay no more than the stated cost of the vehicles … Contrary to … the Business case it is not correct to assume that additional funding will be available from the Department. Any cost growth must be contained within the approved cost, if necessary by reducing numbers."

623. The IAB asked for a further note to be submitted following the examination of Bushmaster vehicles "as soon as possible, and by Sep 06". It should report the results and, if necessary, seek the appropriate approval.

624. On 5 August, the DIS produced a report on the EFP threat in MND(SE).[323] It stated:

> "Since May 2005 the use of Explosively Formed Projectiles (EFPs) has become increasingly common in MND(SE); 83 incidents have been reported with the monthly number peaking at 12 in April 2006 …
> "MND(SE) has a disproportionate number of EFP attacks in comparison to the rest of Iraq … and they have accounted for […] IED related fatality in the region since the end of May 2005."

625. The DIS concluded:

> "The supply of EFPs in Iraq has recently increased with a four to five fold increase in the number of EFPs in circulation for Apr to Jun 06 compared with the previous three months … Recent incidents in MND(SE) have involved increasingly more EFPs and are becoming more complex, involving additional munitions and targeting entire convoys. It is likely that we will continue to see a widening of the charges and munitions used …"

[323] Report DIS, 5 August 2006, 'EFPs in MND-SE Update'.

626. In its report on UK operations in Iraq published on 10 August, the House of Commons Defence Committee referred to its visit to Basra Palace in June:

> "We heard that Snatch were very good vehicles, but they were old and could often break down. Many had previously been used in Northern Ireland. They were fast and manoeuvrable but not well armoured and were particularly vulnerable to IED attack. Similar concerns were voiced by UK troops at the Shaibah Logistics Base."[324]

627. The Committee stated:

> "We are concerned at the increasingly sophisticated nature of the threat and the consequent vulnerability of UK Forces travelling in Snatch Land Rovers. We welcome the Secretary of State's review of the use of Snatch vehicles in Iraq and believe it is essential that this review be completed as quickly as possible. In the long-term, FRES may offer a solution to the difficulties associated with the Snatch, but its introduction is too far off to offer an answer to current operational needs in Iraq. The MOD should consider an 'off-the-shelf' purchase as an immediate and interim replacement for Snatch, even if it does not fulfil the long term capability requirement. It is unsatisfactory that the lack of capability was not addressed with greater urgency much earlier."

628. Gen Dannatt wrote to Mr Browne on 31 August:

> "I wrote to my predecessor [Gen Jackson] in July expressing my concerns about the levels of protection for our patrol vehicles, the shortage of intelligence and surveillance capability, the pressure on helicopters … That said I am most appreciative of Lord Drayson's recent efforts on the vehicle issue, but we have a deficit to make up and the threat/response cycle is very dynamic …"[325]

629. The Inquiry asked Mr Gordon Brown, the Prime Minister, whether there were any requests for funding for armoured vehicles between 1997 and 2006, and if any concerns were raised with him about Snatch Land Rovers.[326] Mr Brown said that the question of expenditure in Iraq had to start from the "one fundamental truth" that "every request that the military commanders made to us for equipment was answered. No request was ever turned down."

630. With regards to Snatch vehicles, Mr Brown told the Inquiry that:

> "… the point at which the Ministry of Defence decided that, as a result of the change in tactics by insurgents against them, that they wanted additional and other vehicles to deal with the problems they faced in the Basra area, we immediately agreed with the Ministry of Defence that they should have the money …

> "So the first time the request was made, we met it immediately with £90 million, and that was a decision that military commanders could make only themselves as to when and where they needed these new vehicles …"

631. Sir Peter Spencer, the Chief of Defence Procurement from May 2003 to March 2007, told the Inquiry that he used to call regularly on the three single Service Chiefs of Staff, the Chief of the Defence Staff and the three Commanders in Chief and that: "If there had been concerns about UORs, they would have been raised."[327]

632. Sir Peter later observed:

> "… if it had been a problem somebody would have come to me and said … Chiefs of Staff aren't backwards in coming forward. If they think something is not right they let you know."[328]

633. Several witnesses, in their evidence to the Inquiry, explained that hardening vehicles was just one way of protecting troops and emphasised the importance of tactics, techniques and procedures.

634. Asked whether he had been concerned about the vulnerability of Snatch in Iraq, ACM Stirrup replied:

> "Very concerned. We wanted to get rid of Snatch outside the wire as quickly as possible but you can't get rid of it by using just a big, heavy vehicle … it is a mistake to believe that simply by increasing the armour on a vehicle, you can defeat an improvised explosive device. You have to take a broad spectrum approach. You have to improve your detection of the devices … You have to provide as much physical protection in terms of armour as is consistent with the mission … but, crucially, you have … to attack the people who are doing this."[329]

635. When asked specifically for his reflections on "the growth of the IED threat or Iranian influence", in the context of a wider question on the development of particular trends or any notable events during his tenure, ACM Torpy wrote:

> "During my time as CJO we saw a gradual, although not dramatic rise in the number of IED/EFP attacks against UK troops. Considerable effort was directed at developing tactics, techniques and procedures to mitigate the threat … whilst at the same time seeking improvements to equipment, particularly the introduction of new electronic warfare equipment, additional vehicle armour and better body armour for personnel. Additional intelligence effort was also directed against IED/EFP networks to enable disruption operations to be undertaken."[330]

636. Major General Jonathan Shaw, GOC MND(SE) from January 2007 to August 2007, told the Inquiry:

> "There is no such thing as a safe vehicle because if you look at … what protection means, only a part of that … is actually the hardening of the vehicle itself. Most protection is achieved by not being located or identified or targeted in the first place …
> "… more heavy armoured vehicles were hit than Snatch … Snatch has come in for a lot of criticism, but actually it was an extremely effective weapon, and the soldiers really liked using it because, although it was risky, it avoided the damage [to roads and streets]."[331]

637. For the PPV programme, Sir Peter Spencer told the Inquiry that Lord Drayson had become "the catalyst" for moving it forward.[332] When asked if that was unusual, Sir Peter replied that it was "a leadership issue for the top of the shop in defence".

638. The Inquiry asked ACM Torpy what direction he had provided about the appropriate levels of risk. He responded:

> "I honestly do not believe it is CJO's role to be giving direction to the in theatre commander as to the levels of risk he should be taking with his people … Clearly we wanted to minimise risk to people, but recognising that we had a job to deliver as well … So we would do the utmost we could possibly do in terms of providing improvements in terms of capability … tactics and procedures, I have to say I left very firmly to the GOC …"[333]

639. The Inquiry asked ACM Torpy whether he was reliant on or had challenged the GOC's judgments. ACM Torpy replied:

> "… that goes back to … regular visits by senior officers…. not just me going out to theatre but CinC LAND … General Jackson … very experienced army officers. So I would have hoped if there was concern about what they were seeing on the ground that they would have put that in a visit report or come and tapped me on the shoulder and said, 'Torpy, why hasn't this been addressed?' and that never happened."[334]

640. When asked whether commanders on the ground were telling him that they had confidence in Snatch, ACM Torpy told the Inquiry that they:

> "… saw it as a capability that they needed to fulfil the task … they clearly would have liked a vehicle which offered better degrees of protection and extra armour was put on to Snatch vehicles. They had alternatives … Warrior or, if necessary, a Challenger, but that … has perception problems … So … there is a balance to be struck … and the only person I believe who could take that is the commander on the ground."[335]

641. Asked if he had discussed with Generals Jackson or Dannatt whether something else was needed for Snatch or if he had ordered any review of Snatch, ACM Torpy said:

"There was work going on … Snatch had always been identified as a problem and I was very aware of the work … going on in the equipment capability area and in the Front Line Command to look at what alternatives there were.

"The message … of the equipment capability areas is that there is not another vehicle on the market which can provide that sort of mobility which we could go out and procure tomorrow … The Americans didn't have anything. They were still using Humvees … they were having similar problems …

"… from a PJHQ perspective … we rely on the expertise which is in the equipment capability area and the Frontline Commands to deliver the requirements of the in theatre force …"[336]

642. The Inquiry asked ACM Torpy if he had received any requests for the provision of a replacement for Snatch. He replied:

"No, not that I recall."

643. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry:

"Snatch served a really useful purpose in built-up areas where it was not easy – in some cases not even possible – to get more heavily armoured vehicles, so … Snatch was not necessarily an unpopular vehicle … depending on what was happening. But … I recall … there was a particularly nasty incident in Maysan, where … soldiers … were killed and they were in Snatch Land Rovers and that was IEDs, so it became obvious at that point that this vehicle was not optimised in any way to counter that."[337]

644. The Inquiry asked Lt Gen Dutton whether it was difficult for commanders to decide when it was appropriate to use heavier armoured vehicles in Iraq.[338] He told the Inquiry:

"Yes, but there was an element of 'You have got what you have got.' So you might have to use them, even if you know they are not the vehicle optimised for that particular – and then you ask for different ones, and over time, they appear."

645. When asked by the Inquiry whether the need and subsequent requests for different levels of armouring was a feature of his time as GOC, Lt Gen Dutton replied:

> "It must have been, but I don't actually sort of recall it now … we were certainly aware that, once the EFP arrived – we either needed to move people more by air or we needed different tactics, techniques and procedures or we needed more heavily armoured vehicles."

646. The Inquiry asked Lord Drayson whether action to improve the effectiveness of electronic countermeasures or the level of protection afforded by Snatch was suggested to him when he took office in May 2005.[339] In a statement to the Inquiry Lord Drayson wrote:

> "The briefings at that time did not indicate that action was required on the effectiveness of countermeasures against IEDs or the protection afforded by the Snatch Land Rover … I was informed by the military advice that the Snatch was essential to the UK's style of operations in Iraq that required a small, light and highly manoeuvrable vehicle to enable our troops to patrol in the narrow streets of Iraqi towns. The view expressed by the military at that time was that a heavily armoured tank like vehicle would not have been practical or consistent with the UK's style of patrolling 'amongst the people'."

647. The Inquiry asked ACM Torpy whether the problem was that there was no agreement on what an alternative vehicle should be able to do.[340] He told the Inquiry that different commanders had different views, but that was not the problem. The problem was that "genuinely there was a lack of a product on the market" which could replace Snatch.

648. When asked if it was "ultimately pressure from Ministers" on the military chain of command which had led to the acquisition of heavier patrol vehicles, ACM Torpy replied that Lord Drayson had "created momentum for Mastiff to be introduced", and "provided leadership in the MOD to make sure something was delivered". That provided the in theatre commander with "another medium weight vehicle with a higher level of protection". There was "no doubt that Mastiff was welcomed by the people on the ground" and that they "could undertake certain tasks", but they "could not do what they were doing with Snatch previously".

649. Asked why the pressure for a heavier vehicle had not come through the chain of command, ACM Torpy added:

> "I think there was always pressure from the … theatre … to the MOD. I think the problem actually arises where you have an equipment programme which is under-funded and a desire … on the one hand to make sure that the capabilities > we have to sustain our long-term defence capability against Defence Planning Assumptions, you have that conflict against today's problem in an operational theatre, and how do you balance the money? It took the Minister to say, 'We are going to do this'."[341]

650. Asked whether he had been pushing for an alternative vehicle to Snatch for deployment in Iraq, Gen Jackson told the Inquiry:

> "This is one of those areas where it can be very frustrating as a single service chief, because you don't have the chequebook and you don't place the orders. At that time we were somewhat – what is the word I seek – quaintly known as Customer Two in the procurement construct, which says something about how the user was regarded …"[342]

651. Gen Jackson added:

> "… it leaves the single Services somewhat at arm's length from the process of acquiring equipment … we need something better to use than Snatch – you may need something bigger … That's the requirement from the user but it gets rather tortuous: it's a very arm's length relationship and therefore a very frustrating one."

652. Gen Jackson stated that the Defence Procurement Agency wrote the specifications; they were not handled by the service board and only in broad parameters by the Equipment Capability staff.

653. Responding to a comment from the Inquiry that General Kevin O'Donoghue, Chief of Defence Logistics 2005 to 2007 and Chief of Defence Materiel 2007 to 2009, had said Gen O'Donoghue only bought what the customer had requested, Gen Jackson replied:

> "Yes, but who says 'it must withstand an explosion of this size'? Who says 'its ground pressure must not be more than that'? Who says 'it must not be more than this weight'? That's not the function of the Army Board. The Army Board says 'we want a vehicle that will do this' without going into that sort of detailed specification."[343]

654. Asked specifically whether he had tried to push back against the processes he was describing in relation to Snatch, Gen Jackson told the Inquiry:

> "Yes, very much so. I have a recollection of what to me was a very important meeting with the then Procurement Minister, Lord Drayson, because I just felt we were not getting anywhere within the normal processes of the MOD, you know, and actually reflecting upon moral duty here."[344]

655. In Gen Jackson's view, Lord Drayson:

> "… was able, using his ministerial authority, and to be fair his commercial experience, to cut through some of the Gordian knots which seemed to surround what otherwise was this complex process."

656. The Inquiry asked Gen Dannatt about Sir Peter Spencer's comment that if the Commanders in Chief had concerns about UORs they would have been raised, and asked whether he was satisfied that the Army had had the equipment it needed to fight in Iraq coming through the UOR process.[345] Gen Dannatt replied:

> "In general terms the answer is yes. There was a problem, though, which was … that the process whereby the troops deployed on the front line saw a requirement and reported it back to PJHQ, the action in the PJHQ and the staff there, which were relatively small in number, were able to turn the opinion and the requirement of soldiers on the ground into a rapidly staffed requirement for new and changed equipment that could then be fired at the Defence Procurement Agency or whatever it was at the time.
> "I felt that there was a greater role that … Land Command, could have played to help out at least the horse power of those on the equipment staff of PJHQ, and also play our wider understanding of army requirements from our frequent involvements informally with the troops on the front line. I thought we could actually get a greater understanding, get it more quickly. I made several offers, and they were taken up eventually, to have my own equipment staff help the PJHQ equipment staff to try to convert the needs of the front line into identified requirements that the procurement system could then get on and act upon."

657. Gen Dannatt added that he "was never convinced" that "we were actually doing all we could be doing to make sure that we had the right equipment, in the right quantity in … front line hands, as quickly as possible"; and that "there was a bit of deficiency in leadership and energy at times".

658. When asked specifically about why it had taken so long to find a replacement vehicle for Snatch, Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry:

> "All commanders have accepted there is the need to have a light patrol vehicle. Narrow streets, small roadways and so on, that you have got a vehicle that can get down these places.
> "That has been used as a justification to keep the existing Snatch in small numbers still in theatre for the present moment.
> "Another line is … and I was strongly of this view, let's get all the Snatch out as quickly as we can, but if you accept there is a need for a light patrol vehicle, it was said by all those involved with industry and the procurement process that there was nothing available on the market to replace the sort of Snatch-type dimension very quickly.

"I think we have already … mentioned the fact that even now the Ministry of Defence I understand is deliberating between two contenders for effectively a Snatch replacement. This is 2010. That was 2003/4."[346]

659. Gen Dannatt continued:

"… it was said by the people whose advice one had to take, 'There is nothing else out there'. I am not a scientist myself. If that's what they say, one had to accept that.

"Therefore the next strand of argument was to really go for the work-arounds as to how do we protect our people with other vehicles? That's where we get into the Mastiffs, the Bulldogs … Many of these have been very successful. Mastiff very successful … In the context of Iraq something that I found counterintuitive and had to agree to while I was Commander in Chief was the Bulldog. The old 430 lightly armoured personnel carrier that I grew up as a platoon commander in the early 1970s and I thought had had its day in the battlefield. When I said, 'We must have a better vehicle', eventually they came to me in middle 2005 and said, 'Commander in Chief, the best option that we can get into the field quickly with good protection is to slap modern armour around a re-engined 430 series vehicle. That's the best we can do'.

"I took a very deep breath and said, 'If that's the best we can do, then that's what we are going to do'. For Iraq I think it played a significant role."

660. When asked about the Ministerial review into PPVs in 2006, why it had taken so long and why it was a political rather than a military initiative, Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry:

"… it wasn't money and was not industry capacity … I think it was a deficiency in leadership and energy in solving this problem … but really frustrating not to be able to get on with this, and the fact we have still not closed with the issue in 2010."[347]

661. The Inquiry asked Gen Dannatt about where that lack of leadership and energy resided. He replied:

"… if you were going to identify a requirement that needed resources thrown at it, which couldn't be funded immediately from the UOR process, it has to come from somewhere else in the core MOD Equipment Programme. That meant something else had to go and other people perhaps did not want to see other things they thought were very important going.

> "It would be wrong to say this was kicked into the long grass, but other solutions, work-arounds were preferred than tackling this one head-on …I am not a technical person, I am not a scientist …"

662. The Inquiry asked why the Mastiff programme had been initiated by Ministers rather than the Defence Board providing the answers to what, by then, was recognised every day in Iraq to be a serious problem.[348] Gen Dannatt replied:

> "I was purely a member of the Defence Board, and there were many people around the table and many conflicting points of view. You can articulate your point of view as clearly as you can. Others might be persuaded by your argument or choose not to be persuaded by your argument. … In many cases they chose not to be persuaded by my argument. So one had to accept the decisions that were taken, albeit with a degree of frustration."

CHANGES TO THE ARRANGEMENTS FOR IDENTIFYING AND FUNDING UORS

663. The earlier part of this Section, considering improvements in the MOD's procurement processes during Op TELIC, looks in more detail at the advice given by Lt Gen Houghton in 2006 on how to improve the way in which capability gaps were identified.

664. At the same time, concern was growing about the MOD's failure to control expenditure on UORs for Iraq and Afghanistan, leading the Treasury to seek a new arrangement for funding UORs.

665. When ECAB discussed a review of the Equipment Programme on 5 July 2006, it was pointed out "that considerable work had been undertaken (including the engagement of Ministers) on the PPV issue and protected mobility", but there were remaining concerns about:

> "… the ability of the routine procurement process to react quickly enough to match changing threats. The UOR process worked well at the start of a campaign, but was not designed to support enduring operations."[349]

666. On 24 November, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms to request an increase of £460m in the combined UOR funding.[350] Despite tight controls, the requirements for UORs continued "at a rate higher than anticipated, and considerably above historical norms", because of:

- the intensity of operations in Afghanistan;
- the slow drawdown of forces from Iraq;

- the constantly evolving threat in both theatres; and
- "a decreased willingness, at all levels, to 'make do' with sub-optimal solutions and uncomfortable living and working conditions now that both operations [Afghanistan and Iraq] have become enduring".

667. The size of the request prompted Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary to do "a little digging" into the MOD's UOR system.[351] He reported to Mr Browne:

> "The UOR system – the people who make bids on it and those who sanction bids within it – are changing their attitude. There is greater willingness to ask for technical solutions to reduce risk and discomfort and less inclination to block such bids. Partly this is because there is a perception (rightly or wrongly) that the political environment has changed, and money is no longer the constraint it was. Whilst it never was for UORs/operations, many in the MOD became used to it as a constraint in restructuring and that attitude bled across to other things …"

668. Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary suggested a discussion of the UOR culture that was forming, and "whether we need to re-steer a little or accept that this is the new price of doing business".

669. The request on 24 November prompted a series of discussions between the Treasury and the MOD about the adequacies of the UOR system.

670. Mr Timms was advised by a Treasury official on 9 January 2007 that:

> "At official level, MOD have indicated that the underlying reason for the sustained high level of UORs is linked to a Ministerial judgement that soldiers must be provided with the optimum equipment, especially where force protection is at stake.
> "HMT [the Treasury] have never refused a request to fund a UOR. Once forces are deployed and commanders are generating requirements it is difficult to deny the resources … It follows that the mechanism for limiting the total cost of operations is to resist any expansion of troops committed to operations, rather than UORs to supply the troops already deployed in theatre."[352]

671. Mr Timms was advised by a Treasury official on 20 April that the "step-change" in the level of UOR funding made the current UOR arrangement "unsustainable".[353] The Treasury had provided £2.1bn to fund UORs relating to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2001, of which over half had been provided in the last two years:

> "We [the Treasury] do not question the military judgment that there is a current operational need – but we believe that many of these items seek to provide > a general capability that could have been provided through the Equipment Programme. Many items appear to be kitting out the Army while the Equipment Programme has invested in ships and aircraft … As such we think the UOR scheme is becoming a straightforward supplement to the EP [Equipment Programme] in a way that it was never intended to be, bailing out MOD of the need to prioritise in the kit they purchase and compensating for bad decisions in the past."

672. The official advised that the UOR regime was not ideal for the UK military either, as:

- despite accelerated procurement, UORs were frequently not available until several months after a need had been identified. It would be better to plan to have the capability in advance;
- that would also enable soldiers to be trained on new equipment before their deployment to theatre, and for new equipment to be properly incorporated into military doctrine; and
- after one year, the ongoing costs of UORs reverted to the core defence budget. Those unplanned costs could be difficult to accommodate.

673. From June 2007, the process changed so that the Treasury cleared every UOR individually (rather than only those above £10m).[354]

674. The outline of a new UOR regime was agreed in late July, as part of the MOD's settlement in the 2007 Comprehensive Spending Review:

- the Reserve would pay for the "first element" of total UOR costs each year;
- MOD and Treasury would share equally any costs in excess of this amount (with the Treasury meeting those excess cost up front, and then reclaiming them from MOD on a rolling three-year basis);
- MOD would receive £200m to assist with its first payments under this new arrangement, and;
- MOD would review its Equipment Programme with the intention of "rebalancing spend towards … the current operating environment".[355]

675. The changes to the UOR process, and discussions leading up to them, are considered in more detail in Section 13.1.

Protected mobility between late 2006 and mid-2009

676. The security situation in MND(SE) continued to deteriorate into late 2006.

677. On 4 September 2006, Gunners Stephen Robert Wright and Samuela Vanua died as a result of injuries sustained when their Land Rover hit a roadside IED on patrol north of Basra.[356]

678. By the end of October, the security situation in Basra had deteriorated to the point where Mrs Margaret Beckett, the Foreign Secretary, decided that it would be necessary to withdraw the majority of civilian staff from Basra Palace.[357] That is addressed in Section 9.5.

679. A note from Brig Inshaw on 3 January 2007 advised Gen Dannatt that the first four Mastiff vehicles had been delivered to Iraq on 30 December 2006.[358] A further 11 vehicles were expected by the end of January.

680. Brig Inshaw acknowledged that those deliveries would miss by one month the "hard target" set by Lord Drayson for a company's worth of vehicles to arrive in Iraq by 31 December, but that Gen Dannatt "may feel" that the work undertaken since July to get the Mastiff vehicles ready for theatre so quickly was "very impressive".

681. Maj Gen Shirreff wrote in his post-operation tour report on 19 January 2007:

> "Bulldog is proving itself in battle and has the confidence of the soldiers who fight from it. Mastiff has arrived and although it will take some time to prepare it for operations, it is an impressive beast and will significantly enhance our capability."[359]

682. Mr Jeffrey visited Iraq from 12 to 13 March where he met Brigadier Paul Jacques, Chief of Force Support.[360] Mr Jeffrey was shown one of the new Mastiff vehicles and Snatch ECM equipment. Brig Jacques reported that 12 out of 54 Mastiff vehicles "had arrived and were proving highly capable, but even when the full complement was delivered there would be a continuing requirement for Snatch because of their manoeuvrability and speed".

683. Brig Jacques praised the work that had enabled Mastiff's arrival into service and "said they would welcome follow-up visits to discuss problems and potential improvements based on operational experience". He thought in general that it would be helpful to have more frequent visits from IPT members, and for closer contact between theatre and the DECs on the progress of UORs.

684. IED attacks in MND(SE) continued to cause casualties, with an increase in the targeting of Warrior vehicles.

685. On 28 December 2006, Sergeant Graham Hesketh was killed when the Warrior vehicle in which he was patrolling hit a roadside IED in Basra City.[361]

686. On 5 January 2007, PJHQ informed Mr Browne that a Warrior vehicle had been penetrated by an IED attack on 27 December, resulting in seven minor casualties.[362]

687. PJHQ said there had been an increasing number of larger EFPs used against MNF vehicles over the last two months and, as a result, two further UORs to enhance the Warrior's armour had been submitted. A reserve pool of Warrior vehicles was maintained to replace those damaged beyond repair in theatre.

688. On 10 January, Mr Browne requested further advice on the nature of the advanced armour, when it was likely to be fitted and any intelligence held on the increased threat.[363]

689. Private Michael Tench was killed on 21 January when his Warrior vehicle suffered an IED attack while patrolling with three other Warrior vehicles.[364] Four other soldiers sustained injuries, one of which was very serious.

690. PJHQ submitted further advice to Mr Browne on 26 January.[365] It said that the recent attacks were the first to penetrate the Warrior vehicles but, while the number of EFP attacks had increased, "these large EFPs are not a new threat, as they were first seen in MND(SE) in Jul 05". Six Warriors had sustained serious damage since 1 November 2006.

691. PJHQ assessed that the increased targeting of Warrior was likely to be a result of their increased use in road convoys (due to the reduction in the use of Snatch Land Rovers). The two UORs for enhanced armour were predicted to be in service by the end of April.

692. On 5 February, Second Lieutenant Jonathan Carlos Bracho-Cooke died as a result of injuries sustained when his Warrior vehicle suffered an IED attack on patrol in Basra City.[366]

693. On 9 February, Private Luke Daniel Simpson was killed when his patrol vehicle hit a roadside IED.[367] Private Simpson had been driving the lead vehicle in a convoy of three Snatch Land Rovers in Basra.

694. Lord Drayson visited Iraq on 8 March and discussed various equipment issues in theatre, including force protection.[368] The report of his visit stated that "the overall opinion" on Mastiff and Bulldog "seemed to be positive" although there were some performance issues and suggestions for improvement. With Mastiff, there were "a number of minor issues" that "could be easily solved" with a visit from IPT. Those included: a lack of servicing schedule or handbook; radio batteries not generating sufficient power for good communications; and air conditioning units not adequately cooling the ECM, creating a risk of overheating. The "most significant concern" was that "the vehicle would be a victim of its own success"; there had been cases of visitors "insisting on travelling in Mastiff, relegating them to VIP taxis rather than the patrol tasks they were bought to fulfil". Lord Drayson "made it clear that they should not be abused in this way".

695. Lord Drayson was told that there were "many problems" with the Snatch 2 platform. The Snatch 2A was "a lot more reliable than the Snatch 2" but needed modifications to improve night vision and communications equipment.

696. The visit report highlighted that Mastiff was too large for use inside Basra City. There were some areas where Bulldog was also too large to go and Snatch was deployed because the threat of IED attacks in those areas was "minimal". The US was using less protected vehicles, Humvees, for that role but "protected them through aircover". The report stated:

> "Given the scientific limits on the amount of armour that could be applied to a vehicle the size of Snatch, any vehicle used to carry out tasks in confined urban areas was inevitably going to be at risk – but it was safer than carrying out the tasks by foot, or by helicopter."

697. Lord Drayson was told:

> "Overall there was a clear perception in theatre that UK MOD was not taking account of the rate of change. UORs too often sought to deliver a perfect capability, but in doing so delivered so late the requirement had changed or theatre were without any capability for too long. It was suggested that if there were greater dialogue between theatre and the ECC/ABW [Equipment Capability Customer/Abbey Wood[369]] on individual UORs then trades … could be made."

698. The report concluded by saying that "the lack of faith in the UOR process" and the suggestion of a "fundamental mismatch" between theatre's requirements and the "ECC/IPTs endeavours to deliver the perfect capability in a more extended timeframe was concerning". Lord Drayson asked for advice, by 10 April, from Maj Gen Figgures on how to address that and for him and the Chief of Defence Materiel "to reinforce the urgency that everyone should attach to delivering UORs".

699. In his evidence to the House of Commons Defence Committee on 20 March about UK operations in Afghanistan, Lt Gen Houghton said that the deployment of Mastiff and Vector was expected to be complete by the end of autumn.[370] He said that, by that time, all Snatch vehicles would have been removed from theatre.

700. On 18 May, Lord Drayson was advised that a total of 49 operational Mastiff vehicles out of 108 had been delivered so far: 14 in Iraq, 16 in Afghanistan and 19 in the UK.[371]

Capacity to improve the UOR system

Following Lord Drayson's request for advice on how to address the "fundamental mismatch" between theatre's requirements and the delivery of capability, Lt Gen Figgures advised on 4 April that the UOR process continued to be "agile and reactive, with an average of just seven months between the PJHQ endorsement of a requirement and the in-service date of the UOR-ed equipment".[372] Those seven months included:

- identification of a solution;
- the drafting and approval of a business case;
- the placing of a contract;
- the manufacture and/or integration of the equipment; and
- the delivery of that equipment to theatre.

Lt Gen Figgures acknowledged the rise in USURs during FY 2006/07 and stated that "the more heavily loaded" teams, the Departments of Equipment Capability (DECs) and Directorate of Capabilities Resources and Scrutiny (DCRS), had augmented their staff "so as to be able to continue to react rapidly to the increase in volume and not slow the process down".

Time was "the key driver for UORs" and it was "universally accepted" that UORs only had to meet "an 80+ percent solution", on the basis that it was "preferable to rapidly fill the capability gap that exists in theatre rather than achieve a technically perfect outcome".

Considering potential reasons for delay, Lt Gen Figgures wrote that there had been "a gradual evolution" in the type of UORs being submitted over recent months from "traditional" UORs that sought to modify or enhance existing equipment to UORs "asking for entirely new systems" which inevitably would take longer to deliver.

Lt Gen Figgures added that perceived delays could also potentially be attributed to optimism bias and the six-month duration of rotations, the latter meaning that some personnel might not stay in theatre long enough to see equipment enhancements arrive during their tour.

On communications between the UK and theatre, Lt Gen Figgures advised that PJHQ remained "in constant daily contact" with Equipment Capability (EC) cells in theatre. The DECs were also "in frequent dialogue" with the EC cells. There had been various visits from teams engaged in the procurement chain and those would continue in balance with theatre's priorities.

Recognising that some improvements could be made, Air Commodore Brian Bates, Director Directorate of Joint Capability, and Mr Guy Lester, Director DCRS, were going to join PJHQ's monthly video conference calls with theatre as of that month. Lt Gen Figgures concluded:

> "Indeed, this already regular dialogue with theatre made the concerns expressed to the Minister all the more surprising as reports from theatre on UORs tend to be very positive."

On 23 April, Lord Drayson met Lt Gen Houghton and Lt Gen Figgures "to discuss the apparent discrepancy between the view of troops in theatre and PJHQ/MOD on equipment and UORs".[373] VAdm Style sent a note of the meeting to Lord Drayson on 21 May after consulting with PJHQ and EC cells.

VAdm Style reported that the average length of UOR delivery time had fallen over the last three years from an average of 9.3 months to 7.5 months. A "longer term analysis" indicated delivery times at the start of Op TELIC were shorter, taking 5 months in 2002 and 3.1 months in 2003, but it was felt that "reflected the simpler nature of the UORs processed".

VAdm Style wrote that the overall feedback on UORs remained "very positive" with "94 percent/100 percent" of Op TELIC and Op HERRICK UORs being rated as effective or highly effective.

The recent comments about perceived failures in the UOR process were "a source of concern". VAdm Style suggested several ways to address the "causal factors" for those comments:

- a review of pre-deployment UOR training;
- better communication of what had been done and what was being done;
- a clearer flow of information from theatre because direct communication between theatre and the Equipment Capability Customer (ECC) was "still the exception rather than the rule";
- assessing staff shortfalls in "key" Integrated Project Team (IPT) posts; and
- finding ways to "aggressively and imaginatively bear down upon UOR timelines".

[373] Minute DCDS(C) to Min(AF), 21 May 2007, 'Meeting with CJO and DCDS(EC) – Equipment Requirements in Theatre'.

On 28 June, VAdm Style reported that progress had been made against all actions, "but it would be premature to state that they may have been met or that the underlying issues have been resolved".[374]

To improve the communication flow with theatre, DEC desk officers had been encouraged to engage directly with theatre EC cells instead of through PJHQ. There was greater sharing of information such as sending copies of the UOR database and all approved business cases to EC cells.

701. The threat in Iraq continued to increase and further improvements to force protection were agreed.

702. On 29 March 2007, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms to outline UOR funding requirements for financial year 2007/08.[375] That included:

- An additional £15m plus for ECM: "Anti-coalition forces in both Iraq and Afghanistan are developing the methods they employ in the use of Improvised Explosive Devices; we are in a stronger position as a result of additional better-protected vehicles procured last year (by summer 2007 there will be over 50 Mastiff and Bulldog in theatre), but the best way to protect against attack remains to stop the IEDs before impact …"
- £50m for a Counter Rocket, Artillery and Mortar (C-RAM) system capable of detecting, providing warning of and intercepting indirect fire (IDF).
- £87m plus for intelligence and surveillance capabilities for both Iraq and Afghanistan, including ISTAR enhancements.

703. On 5 April, Second Lieutenant Joanna Dyer, Corporal Kris O'Neill, Private Eleanor Dlugosz and Kingsman Adam James Smith were killed when an IED exploded underneath the Warrior vehicle in which they were travelling.[376] A local civilian interpreter was also killed in the attack.

704. On 17 April, the Chiefs of Staff were briefed that the security situation in MND(SE) "had been dominated by the two under belly IED attacks against a Warrior and a Challenger 2".[377] That type of attack had been seen elsewhere in Iraq but was unusual for MND(SE). The implications were still being assessed but "appeared not to represent a migration of this type of attack to the South, rather a response by a resourceful and adaptive enemy responding to MNF operations – operating procedures continued to be reviewed and refined in theatre".

705. On 19 April, Corporal Ben Leaning and Trooper Kristen Turton were killed when their Scimitar vehicle was struck and badly damaged by an IED attack in Maysan province.[378] Three other soldiers were injured in the attack. The vehicle had been providing protection for a convoy.

706. On 6 May, Private Kevin Thompson died as a result of injuries sustained when the vehicle in which he was travelling hit an IED in the early hours of 3 May.[379] He had been taking part in a routine convoy to re-supply the Contingency Operating Base at Basra Air Station.

707. Maj Gen Shaw sent an update to CJO on 7 June, stating:

> "Our vehicles are protecting us but at an unsustainable rate. On average we are losing an armoured vehicle due to damage beyond local repair at a rate of a vehicle every nine days; faster than the UK can resupply them."[380]

708. Maj Gen Shaw told the Inquiry that the vehicle he was referring to in his update of 7 June was Warrior.[381] When asked what he had in mind in making that statement, Major Gen Shaw said:

> "It was the unsustainability of what we were doing … alerting people that what we were doing was unsustainable."

709. When asked by the Inquiry what was being done to deal with that problem, Maj Gen Shaw said: "I can't recall."

710. On 22 June, Corporal John Rigby died from injuries sustained by a roadside bomb attack in Basra.[382]

711. On 28 June, Corporal Paul Joszko, Private Scott Kennedy and Private James Kerr were killed by a roadside IED in Basra.[383] The soldiers had dismounted the Warrior vehicle in which they had been patrolling when the device detonated.

712. On 7 July, Lance Corporal Ryan Francis was killed when an IED hit the Warrior vehicle in which he was travelling north of Basra.[384] LCpl Francis was taking part in a large scale operation to detain insurgents in Basra City. Corporal Christopher Read was also killed as a result of the operation, through injuries sustained from small arms fire attack, and a third soldier was injured.[385]

713. On 31 July, Corporal Steve Edwards was killed when the Warrior vehicle in which he was patrolling was struck by an IED in Basra City.[386]

714. On 9 August, Lance Sergeant Chris Casey and Lance Corporal Kirk Redpath were killed when their Snatch Land Rover was hit by an IED during an operation to the west of Basra City.[387]

715. On 3 September, UK forces withdrew from Basra Palace and moved to Basra Air Station. The move and the arrangements surrounding it are addressed in Section 9.6.

716. In its review of UK land operations in Iraq, published on 3 December 2007, the House of Commons Defence Committee acknowledged the introduction of Mastiff and Bulldog.[388] It stated that that had "significantly improved the force protection available to our Forces in Iraq".

717. Major General Graham Binns became GOC MND(SE) in August 2007. He told the Inquiry that when he arrived in Basra, the security situation was "difficult":

> "Every move outside our bases required detailed planning and was high risk. I thought that we were having a limited effect on improving the security situation in Basra. 90 percent of the violence was directed against us …"[389]

718. Maj Gen Binns told the Inquiry that the move to Basra Air Station in September 2007 coincided with other changes that helped to reduce the threat to forces.[390] He said that protected mobility of vehicles "improved significantly" with the upgrade of Warrior vehicles and introduction of Mastiff, the latter being "a very good vehicle for the role on roads".

719. On 13 September 2007, the Defence Board endorsed a request to use MOD funding to pay for additional Mastiff vehicles as a UOR.[391] In discussion, it was said that procuring more Mastiff vehicles "was the right thing to do. They had already proved their worth in theatre in Iraq and Afghanistan and there was a clear operational requirement."

720. On 2 October, a DCRS official advised Lord Drayson that the MOD had initiated the procurement of an additional 147 Mastiff vehicles.[392] Force Protection Inc, the manufacturer, was "not yet on contract" to provide the vehicles but IPT was "maturing the Business Case" and "negotiating with both the United States Marine Corps (USMC) and the manufacturer". The USMC held "considerable influence" over Force Protection Inc's production "as it accounts for a significant proportion of the manufacturer's order book".

721. DCRS advised that the MOD's request for additional Mastiff vehicles would be considered at the next US Joint Chiefs of Staff on 11 October. Without its approval, Force Protection Inc was unable to make any commitment to the MOD.

722. On presentational advice, DCRS stated that "any attempt to directly influence the US Congressional process would be unhelpful and so an announcement" should be "considered carefully". It added that an announcement would, "however", offer "significant advantages" because it "would illustrate the Department's intent to procure additional protected mobility vehicles, in order to improve force protection and operational effectiveness".

723. The UOR for an additional 147 Mastiff vehicles for Afghanistan was submitted to the IAB by DEC(GM) and the Specialist Utility Vehicle IPT on 4 October.[393] That would increase the total Mastiff fleet to 280: 76 for Iraq and 204 for Afghanistan. Of Iraq's 76 vehicle allocation, 54 would be deployed (including eight ambulances) and there would be 22 vehicles in the training fleet (including two ambulances).

724. The UOR stated that an additional 26 vehicles were to be deployed "to the user" by 31 April 2008. That would meet Iraq's requirement but would leave Afghanistan with insufficient vehicles "to meet the operational, training and maintenance requirements". There were currently 49 Mastiff vehicles available in Iraq, with 18 vehicles in the UK in a training pool shared with operations in Afghanistan.

725. While it had been "originally envisaged that Vector would be suitable to provide the bulk of the protected mobility" in Afghanistan, it was "now clear that the situation, threat, mission and nature of operations demand[ed] a different capability". A "comprehensive review of protected mobility" in Afghanistan had shown that "the capabilities required for the bulk of the combat troops are best met by a combination of ATV(P) Viking and Mastiff".

726. The UOR stated that Mastiff was "now essential to operations on Op TELIC". It was "the most appropriate vehicle for long distance convoy escort operations where movement is canalised on the main supply routes" between the Contingent Operating Base and Kuwait, where logistic elements were based. It was "not possible" to draw down Iraq's Mastiff fleet to support Afghanistan without an impact on operations. It added: "The shortfall in ambulances with commensurate protection and mobility is constraining commanders (or forcing them to take risk)."

727. On 8 October, Mr Brown announced that the MOD was placing an order for an additional 140 Mastiff vehicles.[394]

INTRODUCTION OF A NEW PROCESS TO DETERMINE THE ACCEPTABLE LEVEL OF RISK IN OPERATIONS

728. In September 2007, the DOC reported on its "extensive review and analysis of the UK's current Force Protection (FP) capability in order to expose risk, provide assurance and present strategic recommendations to COS [Chiefs of Staff]".[395]

729. The review was not specific to Iraq or Afghanistan but drew heavily on the UK's experience there. The review focused on:

- risk and governance;
- the application of theatre entry standards;
- training;
- lines of communication;
- protection in the land, air and maritime environments;
- operational level protection; and
- UOR procured equipment.

730. The review stated:

> "Before undertaking an operation, COS should collectively reach a judgement on sensitivities, likely benefits and consequences as well as the appetite – amongst public, politicians and ministers – for sustaining casualties and prosecuting operations that carried a certain degree of risk. This risk/benefit analysis would be articulated and reviewed through the Strategic Estimate process. Any guidance would have to be balanced to ensure that it was not overly prescriptive … or, conversely, too generic …"
> "… The management of FP risk must be based on a thorough identification of strategic and operational threats to ensure that a balance of research, investment and training is achieved commensurate with the threat …
> "In deriving an assessment of cumulative risk, PJHQ should have a clear understanding of the totality of known risk in the forces declared to it. This should include all the equipment and other limitations which were accepted in the procurement of force elements; all the subsequent limitations evident in practice together with manpower, training or logistic support issues. If this risk capture process works efficiently, CJO will be able to form an accurate judgment of the risk to the protection of UK forces, which in turn would allow him to engage on palliative measures required early in the operational planning process."

[394] House of Commons, Official Report, 8 October 2007, column 24.
[395] Report DOC, September 2007, 'Protection of the Deployed Force Operational Audit Report 1/07'.

731. One of the points the Chiefs of Staff were asked to note was that, while the UK had "a first class capability to neutralise and mitigate the IED threat", "significant continued investment" was necessary "to keep pace" with its rapid development. The review stated: "Physical protection levels against the more capable anti-armour IEDs are, however, probably approaching engineering and material limits."

732. On protected mobility, the review stated:

> "The commander needs a range of protected vehicles to provide different levels of protection and mobility depending on the specific operation. This includes the need to operate in urban areas where larger, tracked vehicles may not be able to enter."

733. The review stated that, while the Snatch Land Rovers had been upgraded, they were "still very vulnerable to roadside bombs and RPG".

734. The review stated that "the need for a replacement wheeled protected vehicle was previously identified and Vector … PPV was procured with money being pulled forward from the programme that already sat within the EP. Vector delivers increased protection and greater capacity in comparison to Snatch and a total of 166 vehicles have been procured." There were 34 vehicles in Afghanistan and 22 in the training fleet; the remaining 110 were due to be delivered by 31 October 2007.

735. The review also referred to Mastiff's rapid procurement and said that early reports suggested it was "performing well".

736. There was "still no clearly defined Theatre Entry Standard for minimum levels of protection and equipment that must be fitted to all vehicles" and that "an overall assessment of the protection levels" would be "appropriate".

737. The Chiefs of Staff endorsed the recommendations on 26 September, including the need to understand and articulate the level of risk that was acceptable on any operation.[396]

738. As a result of the DOC audit, the MOD produced a force protection policy in November 2007.[397] It stated:

> "The central tenet of this Force Protection (FP) policy is that the application of FP measures to achieve a tolerable level of risk … enables, rather than constrains, our freedom of manoeuvre."

739. In the policy document, the MOD mandated "the employment of a standard risk methodology across all activities to ensure a common approach to the implementation of FP [Force Protection] measures". Oversight across the department would be achieved through an FP Co-ordinating Committee (FPCC) chaired by Air Commodore Brian Bates, [396] Minutes, 26 September 2007, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

[397] Paper MOD, November 2007, 'Policy for the Protection of UK Forces'.

Director Directorate of Joint Capability. The committee, with the DECs, would ensure that FP development was "coherent across the DLODs [Defence Lines of Developments] and prioritised in accordance with current and future vulnerabilities".

740. The risk management process was laid out as:

- "Identify. The key to efficient risk management is the identification of adversary, natural and human threats to the Force, which, if not tempered, would otherwise impact upon mission success. That includes the anticipation of increasing and emergent threats, particularly where it may take time to develop countermeasures."
- "Assess" – assessing the probability and impact of the identified threats on mission success.
- "Address. Resource constraints inevitably mean that Defence cannot protect against all threats at all times in all circumstances." That meant that investment in capabilities had to be prioritised. It added: "Where a lack of resources or mitigation activity could impact adversely on mission success, commanders must communicate, through the chain of command, the need to review the risk level."
- "Review. Staff and commanders must manage risk proactively by monitoring the risk profile, assessing the effectiveness of risk mitigation measures and reporting upwards FP shortfalls or unavoidable risk issues."

741. Although the policy did not refer specifically to Theatre Entry Standards for minimum levels of protection, it did identify the leads for a comprehensive range of force protection elements, and what their considerations should be.

742. The policy lead for platform protection was the Directorate of Joint Capability but responsibility for its capabilities was spread across the relevant DECs and was co-ordinated on behalf of DCDS(EC) through the Joint Capabilities Board. It said:

> "Procurement staffs must balance key user requirements and forecast operational exigencies against current and future threats to deliver the appropriate degree of platform protection … Operational staffs must risk manage the employment of platforms according to the threat and the level of tolerable risk."

743. The policy said that the Joint Commander[398] owned the operational risk for forces under his command. The CDS was responsible for articulating the risk for specific operations and the Defence Secretary owned the risk inherent in the activities of the Armed Forces on behalf of the Government.

744. The MOD told the Inquiry that the latest iteration of the force protection policy, dated 21 May 2015, "defines risk ownership and governance more clearly than its predecessors".[399] The MOD said this had been integrated into wider MOD risk management processes which had also been revised.

745. The MOD said that the Operational Commander (which for Iraq was the CJO), is accountable to CDS for understanding, quantifying and reducing risk to the force and mission respectively. This risk response may require changes to activities or capabilities.

THE REQUIREMENT FOR AN "URBAN" PPV

746. Fatalities in Afghanistan meant the continued use of Snatch Land Rovers remained the subject of media and political debate.

747. Baroness Taylor of Bolton became the Minister of State for Defence Equipment and Support in November 2007.

748. On 22 April 2008, a junior officer from DCRS advised Mr Browne that the requirement for light PPVs was likely to continue in Afghanistan, albeit at a reduced level, and with the introduction of more heavy and medium PPV variants.[400] The advice had been prompted by a series of fatalities on Op HERRICK where personnel had been travelling in General Service Land Rovers; vehicles that offered less protection than Snatch Land Rovers.

749. While operations in Iraq were not addressed in the note, the junior officer did cover broader protected mobility issues and "the constant need to balance protection against mobility": "A range of vehicles, with different protection and mobility capabilities is required." The choice of vehicles available to commanders had been increased significantly, and the delivery of more Mastiff, combined with the introduction of Ridgback, would "harden" the Op HERRICK force considerably.

750. A summary of the UK's current and planned PPV range was provided in an annex, where the Mastiff was described as a "heavy" PPV as opposed to the "medium" Ridgback, and "light" Vector and Snatch vehicles. It stated that the Force Protection Inc's Cougar vehicle, the 4x4 variant, had been selected as the model for the Ridgback in December 2007. Its expected interim operating capability date was October 2008.

751. On Baroness Taylor's copy of the minute, her Assistant Private Secretary had written: "This useful note … has been triggered by Matt Cavanagh [Special Adviser to Mr Brown] who wants to see zero use/casualties of Snatch …"[401]

752. In April 2008, the UK began to deploy Military Training Teams (MiTTs) alongside the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF). The roles of those teams and the rationale behind them are explained in Section 12.1.

[401] Manuscript comment MOD [junior officer] on Minute EC DCRS [junior officer] to PS/SofS [MOD], 22 April 2008, 'The Use of Light Vehicles on Operations'.

753. In his weekly report on 17 April, Major General Barney White-Spunner, GOC MND(SE) from February 2008 to August 2008, wrote that one of the lessons learned about "MiTTing" was that the MiTT teams "must have the same mobility as their Iraqi partners".[402] Maj Gen White-Spunner said that AFVs were perceived as "too aggressive (by both the Iraqi leadership and by Basrawis)" and whilst the Mastiff had a reduced profile, it was "still too large" to manoeuvre around "a complex urban environment". He described it as "an elephant compared to the Humvees of the US and Iraqis".

754. Maj Gen White-Spunner wrote that "the mobility challenges presented by Mastiff" also increased the risk of it being "vulnerable to attack". He concluded: "There is an urgent requirement to consider if there are protected mobility vehicles that might best suit this task, although we are now clear that the solution is not Humvees."

755. On 20 April, the EC Branch in MND(SE) submitted a USUR for an "urban" PPV that provided better manoeuvrability around Basra City than what was possible with the existing, larger PPVs.[403]

756. The USUR stated that both Warrior and Bulldog were considered to be unsuitable because tracked vehicles were unable to operate in urban areas. There was a concern that Bulldog would "be considered as a tank" and affect the local perception about the nature of the tasks being undertaken.

757. The USUR described Mastiff as being used "through necessity, not choice" because of restrictions on Warrior and Snatch. Mastiff's size, kerb weight and manoeuvrability made it unsafe in urban areas. Snatch was assessed as providing insufficient force protection.

758. On Snatch the USUR said:

> "There would be political concern associated with the use of SN2A [Snatch 2A] in the city. SN2A was withdrawn from use in the city in 2006 due to the high rate of fatalities when vehicles were attacked. The equipment is not suitable for the task in its current form and is not considered further."

759. The EC Branch identified the Cougar Ridgback as its preferred solution; US MiTTs were using the US version of the Ridgback, the Cougar 4x4, and "generally" did not have any problems accessing Iraqi Army units within the city. It also had good levels of protection and some commonality with the Mastiff.

760. In reviewing the potential vehicle solutions, the EC Branch said that the Australian Bushmaster had good protection and mobility comparable with the Ridgback but required "another Foreign Sales agreement", had no commonality with the Mastiff and the Australian fleet was being withdrawn in June 2008.

[403] Minute ECB MND(SE), 20 April 2008, 'Op TELIC – Urgent Statement of User Requirement for a Urban Protected Patrol Vehicle (UPPV).

761. On 29 April, Lieutenant General Peter Wall, DCDS(C), briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the protected mobility options for the MiTTs in Basra "had been investigated and Bulldog had been determined as the most applicable solution".[404]

762. The minutes do not record that that was said to be the best option in the interim, but the documents that follow suggest that Bulldog was only ever intended to be a short-term solution until Ridgback came into service at the end of 2008.

763. In his weekly report, on 2 May 2008, Maj Gen White-Spunner stated:

> "The provision of suitable vehicles for the remaining MiTTs is going to be a tricky one and we are grateful for all the hard work being done in the UK to find a solution. We have accepted … that we will have to manage with Mastiff and Bulldog in the short term, and at least until Ridgback becomes available later in the year. This is not ideal, as you know; Mastiff, as well as being in short supply, are having considerable difficulty keeping pace with IA [Iraqi Army] Humvees through narrow obstructed streets and Bulldog, being tracked, will be unpopular with both the Iraqi chain of command and … with the Baswaris.
> "I understand that Ridgback simply cannot be delivered in the required timeframe even if diverted from their original target in Afghanistan, and my point is simply to emphasise the urgency of procuring them as fast as possible. In the meantime, we can make up some of our Mastiff shortfall for MiTTs if we are prepared to replace some of those Mastiff on less vulnerable tasks (such as in Umm Qasr) with Vector, which we understand are readily available in the UK."[405]

764. Ministers continued to take a close interest in the provision of protected mobility for deployed forces.

765. On 6 May, the Chiefs of Staff were told that Vector would be used from the UK training fleet to backfill vehicles used in lower threat areas to release Mastiff for use by the MiTTs.[406] Options for the use of Ridgback in the longer term were being investigated.

766. On 22 May, a junior official advised Mr Browne that:

- The UK's PPV requirement for "comprehensive MiTTing" was 60 vehicles. Mastiff was "the most appropriate vehicle" to fulfil the task, of which MND(SE) had 51 employed across a range of tasks and 43 could be re-allocated to MiTTing.
- The Chiefs of Staff had endorsed military advice that, in order to make the 43 vehicles available, Mastiff vehicles operating elsewhere in Iraq would be replaced with Vector, "at manageable risk to personnel on those tasks".

[404] Minutes, 29 April 2008, Chiefs of Staff meeting.
[405] Minute White-Spunner to CJO, 2 May 2008, 'GOC MND(SE) Weekly Letter – 1 May 2008'.
[406] Minutes, 6 May 2008, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

- The shortfall of 17 vehicles would be met by Bulldog in the short term "to provide the best protection available", although this could "have a negative effect on Baswaris and ISF consent".[407]

767. The junior official's advice recognised that re-allocating Mastiff vehicles to MiTTing would "inevitably incur greater risk elsewhere" but that PJHQ and GOC MND(SE) considered that "to be acceptable". The use of Vector vehicles would be restricted to lower threat areas where the risk was "manageable" and would be subject to "a continuous MND(SE) intelligence-based threat assessment" based on Maj Gen White-Spunner's recommendation.

768. The advice recognised that the decision to deploy Vector would reduce the number of vehicles in Afghanistan's regeneration pool but that was seen as "manageable in the short term".[408] If the consent for using Bulldog vehicles in the MiTT role deteriorated "to an unacceptable level", Mastiff vehicles planned for Afghanistan could be diverted to Iraq, albeit creating a delay of one to two months for Mastiff vehicles to reach Afghanistan. The impact of using Bulldog vehicles in a MiTT role would be assessed at the end of July.

769. Mr Browne was advised that industry could not produce "an adequately protected vehicle" in less than six to nine months. Ridgback vehicles were being procured for Afghanistan but the earliest those could be deployed was "early 2009" and the provisional timeline for completing MiTTing in Iraq was May 2009 (see Section 12.1). DCRS had advised that the Treasury was "most unlikely to fund a new vehicle or modifications to existing vehicles" given the timelines.

770. On presentation, the junior official warned that as Vector was "originally procured to meet a lesser threat" in Afghanistan, it had "considerably lower levels of ballistic protection than either Mastiff or Bulldog". That potentially meant that "accusations could be levelled" that Vector was "providing unacceptably low levels of protection to UK forces". A handling plan was being developed to address that.

771. On the same day, Mr Browne's Private Secretary replied to an MOD official, stating that Mr Browne had discussed the note with HQ MND(SE) and was "not clear" that Maj Gen White-Spunner's intent on the use of Vector was "indeed as set out".[409]

This email clarified that the number of Vector vehicles being damaged and destroyed in Op HERRICK had reduced and would continue to reduce as new PPVs were rolled out to Afghanistan and the "reliance on Vector in the higher threat areas" lessened.

772. Mr Browne asked that PJHQ check that point with Maj Gen White-Spunner and that "a robust narrative" be developed "ASAP" to explain the discrepancy between the reason Vector was originally procured and its planned deployment in Iraq.

773. On 23 May, an MOD official submitted revised advice to Mr Browne, reducing the figure of Mastiff vehicles that should be re-allocated from 43 to 39 and stating that Maj Gen White-Spunner was content.[410]

774. Mr Browne agreed the advice, but reiterated the necessity to generate a narrative which explained the use of Vector in southern Iraq.[411]

775. Lt Gen White-Spunner explained to the Inquiry that the difficulty of using Mastiff vehicles for a MiTT role was:

> "… for MiTT to really work well, it wants to always be slightly unobtrusive … and we had large protective vehicles because of the dangers we had been facing …"[412]

776. Lt Gen White-Spunner commented that a vehicle which balanced protection needs with the desired military profile was not possible: "Industry just can't do this, they are not in the showroom." He added:

> "So we had to use the Mastiff vehicles, which … is an excellent vehicle … it is just slightly large for going down the more delicate bits of the Hanaya."

777. On 17 June, Corporal Sarah Bryant, Corporal Sean Reeve, Lance Corporal Richard Larkin and Paul Stout were killed by an IED while patrolling in Lashkar Gar in Afghanistan.[413] Their deaths prompted further questions in the media and in Parliament about Snatch vehicles.

778. During a House of Commons debate about defence procurement on 19 June, Mr Patrick Mercer asked Mr Bob Ainsworth, Minister of State for the Armed Forces from June 2007 to May 2009, when Snatch vehicles would be taken out of service.[414]

779. Mr Ainsworth referred to the introduction of Ridgback but added:

> "Whether we will be able to take away these small platforms without taking away a whole area of capability will need to be thought about very seriously. Snatch has suffered some considerable setbacks; we have lost lives in Snatch Land Rovers. However, I am being told by commanders on the ground that they still need Land > Rover-based platforms … and will do for the foreseeable future. Ridgback will not entirely do that job, because it will not be able to get into the narrow, compounded urban areas in Helmand province, however much we would like it to."

780. Mr Ainsworth said that he was "aware of some of the opinions about Snatch" but that he had received military advice that Snatch vehicles were still necessary. Mr Ainsworth was also challenged by Mr Mike Penning, who argued that commanders could only use what vehicles they have available.

781. Mr Ainsworth said that commanders were provided "with a range of vehicles" that allowed them "to select the platform most suited to the immediate task in hand". Protected mobility requirements were kept "under review" and that was why Mr Brown had announced the procurement of Ridgback.

782. On 25 June, Mr Browne called a meeting with senior military figures and Baroness Taylor "at short notice" to "discuss future plans for the protected vehicle fleet, particularly in Afghanistan".[415]

783. While the meeting had "in part been prompted" by the recent Snatch fatalities, Mr Browne "recognised that the issue ran wider" and there were vulnerabilities associated with other patrol vehicles such as Vector that "were stories waiting to happen".

784. Mr Browne had:

> "… made clear his intent: namely, to deliver as quickly as possible a balanced and sustainable protected vehicle capability in Afghanistan, with all patrol vehicles … mine-protected, commensurate with their weight. This might infer [sic] the removal from theatre of Snatch, Vector, Pinzgauer and GS Land Rover."

785. Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, who had become Chief of the Defence Staff in April 2006, said that they "needed to start" by understanding the operational requirement for lighter vehicles in Afghanistan and Iraq, and what the impact would be if PPVs with a lower weight and protection level than Ridgback were no longer used.

786. Sir Jock said that if a light PPV was "mission critical, whether to secure access, increase flexibility or avoid the corrosion of popular consent, then the second question was whether Snatch was the best vehicle available on the market to fulfil any of that requirement". If it was, then they "could collectively stand behind its continued use; if not, it should be replaced".

787. It was agreed at the meeting that "all vehicles had their vulnerabilities" but:

> " … if we were able to demonstrate that we had replaced, or had clear plans to replace, all sub-optimal vehicles, then that would allow us to build a convincing narrative around our intent, which should also give confidence to deployed service men and women that vehicle vulnerabilities are being addressed."

788. A discussion followed about the options for replacing the current fleet of light armoured and unarmoured vehicles "in full" and it was agreed that those should be pursued. The deployment of Ridgback into theatre was "Ministers' first priority".

789. Mr Browne "emphasised the need for a clear and coherent public narrative" about what had been achieved and what was being done "to enhance the robustness" of the PPV fleet. He asked for a Written Ministerial Statement to be produced before Parliament rose for the recess on 22 July.

790. A Written Ministerial Statement on protected mobility was not made until 29 October 2008.[416]

791. Mr John Hutton, who had succeeded Mr Browne as Defence Secretary earlier in October, stated:

"We have already achieved a great deal in improving the protected mobility options available to commanders on operations. Mastiff is unquestionably a success story. For its role, Mastiff is delivering the very highest levels of protection available anywhere in the world. Where it can be used, and its size and weight mean it has its limitations, it is clearly the vehicle of choice. That is why the Prime Minister announced a further order of these vehicles last year …

"It is not only through Mastiff that we are delivering a world class protected vehicle capability; we are also delivering Ridgback. Using the smaller Cougar 4x4 chassis, and innovative, cutting-edge UK armour technologies, we will be able to deliver protection levels close to that of Mastiff in a package that is able to better access urban areas, increasing the survivability of troops in these roles …"

792. On Snatch Land Rovers, Mr Hutton said:

"Inevitably, any statement on protected mobility must address the role of the Snatch Land Rover, a vehicle which has received considerable criticism. First, to be absolutely clear, I can inform the House that – in addition to the regular reviews that are conducted into protected mobility – senior operational commanders were asked to specifically consider the requirement for the Snatch Land Rover and its importance to operations. The response was clear: commanders need a vehicle of the size, weight and profile of Snatch Land Rover, capable of transporting men, to fulfil their tasks in theatre. Further, the availability of such a vehicle is considered mission critical …"

793. Mr Hutton said that that did not mean there was "no action" to be taken on Snatch. There was a programme in place to learn lessons from the development of Mastiff and Ridgback and the Snatch vehicle would continue to be modified, although, as with any vehicle, it could never be made "invulnerable".

794. The latest variant, the Snatch Vixen,[417] had been especially configured for Afghanistan, and the MOD had "already fielded a small number of these vehicles".

795. On 7 November, Lt Gen Houghton advised Sir Jock Stirrup on "an urgent review of the impact of limiting the use of all variants of Snatch Land Rover".[418] The advice suggested that Lt Gen Houghton had issued separate, earlier advice in July to Sir Jock following the meeting with Mr Browne on 25 June and the 7 November advice was because he had been asked again to consider the impact of limiting the use of all variants of Snatch in Iraq and Afghanistan.

796. Lt Gen Houghton wrote that the justification for retaining Snatch had not changed since his previous advice in July; Snatch vehicles remained "mission critical" in both theatres due to their profile, manoeuvrability and carrying capacity.

797. Lt Gen Houghton said that limiting the use of Snatch outside secure bases in Iraq would have a "significant impact" on operations by reducing patrols' situational awareness and restricting movements.

798. The "interim solution" of Snatch Vixen in Afghanistan had "started to deliver". DEC(GM) was "working towards a final solution" but there was no light PPV "on the market that could be delivered within a year". The Ridgback and Mastiff programmes for Afghanistan had been delayed and were not now likely to be delivered until the beginning of 2009.

799. Lt Gen Houghton added:

> "Given the wider political and media sensitivity, however, we should maintain our intent to deliver the planned SN2A [Snatch 2A variant currently in use] replacement as quickly as possible, increase the numbers of PM [Protected Mobility] vehicles in UORs and conduct rapid work on operational solutions to remove SN2A from outside secure bases as quickly as possible. SN3-Vixen would appear to be the fastest way of achieving this."

800. Major General Andrew Salmon, GOC MND(SE) from August 2008 to March 2009, told the Inquiry that, when he arrived in Iraq, "security was getting better".[419] The number of rocket attacks "was down to about four or five a month", compared with over 200 a month before the Charge of the Knights (see Section 12.1). There were still IEDs set on roads but "the level of violence had much reduced".

801. Maj Gen Salmon wrote in his post-tour report:

> "The determination of the most appropriate mobility platform for any environment requires a delicate balance between speed, manoeuvrability, firepower and protection. Presentational constraints over the employment of Snatch were well understood and acknowledged. Nonetheless, while offering good protection, Mastiff generated other risks: heightened profile; regular collateral damage (with associated cost to local approval) while manoeuvring in tight confines; and an inability to keep up with ISF HMMVs [Iraqi Security Forces' Humvees] in the City. This was set in the context of CG MNF-I's (Gen Petraeus) determination that troops should 'get out and walk' – in order to influence the population directly. The solution was found in a command decision to strip MiTTs down to the bare minimum and travel with Iraqi counterparts in ISF in Iraqi vehicles. The ability to mentor improved immediately and markedly and the level of protection afforded by ISF paintwork arguably exceeds that of CF protective technology. It worked well."[420]

802. Maj Gen Salmon said that that was a "defining decision" for building relationships but that "the UK political sensitivities over any trade off between protection and manoeuvre should not be underestimated". He added: "Strategic risk aversion over casualties was a real planning consideration that routinely shaped tactical operations."

FRES AS A DISTINCT REQUIREMENT

803. On 23 July, a note about FRES highlighted the capability gap that would remain until FRES was delivered:

> "PPVs do have some utility … but not in areas where they are likely to have to operate within the range of enemy medium or heavy forces. PPVs do not meet the protection, capacity, or tactical mobility requirements of FRES as a whole, although it is possible that they could meet part of the requirement in the FRES BCU [Basic Capability Utility] family …"[421]

804. The note added:

> "Current operations show that we need to use a combination of armoured vehicles … and PPVs … to operate in different roles, in different areas, to meet different circumstances. However, PPVs are particularly important at the moment because, in many cases, we have to use them where we would use FRES if it were available. Therefore if FRES was in service now we would need to deploy fewer PPVs."

805. In its review of defence equipment for 2008, the House of Commons Defence Committee outlined a number of concerns about the ongoing delays to the FRES programme.[422] It asked the Government to set out how the acquisition of Mastiff vehicles for Iraq and Afghanistan had impacted on the FRES requirement.

806. In response, the MOD stated that there was "no impact on the FRES programme resulting from the procurement of Mastiff".[423] The department had "a coherent two track approach" to AFVs which made "a clear distinction between the urgent, short term need for Protected Patrol Vehicles, such as Mastiff, designed for peace support operations" and AFVs needed to "provide an effective FRES capability across the full spectrum of future operations". The MOD stated that Vector and Mastiff were designed to address the risks faced by service personnel in the short term; FRES was always seen as a longer-term requirement.

807. Sir Peter Spencer told the Inquiry that there had been a difficulty in specifying a requirement for PPVs as the threat developed; and that "one of the major problems the Army had had for over a decade was deciding what it wanted its new fleet of armoured fighting vehicles to be".[424]

808. When asked about the procurement strategy for PPVs, Sir Peter referred to the FRES programme: " … a hugely ambitious programme which was never going to be delivered in this decade … There were very difficult requirements stated for mobility and protection and weight."[425]

809. The Inquiry asked Sir Peter whether the issues with FRES had made it harder to deal with PPVs. He replied:

> "… the difficulty became in the amounts of money which were available and if you were going to use money from the capital equipment programme to deal with the short term … then that had a fratricidal effect on your ability to move the FRES programme forward."[426]

810. Lt Gen Fulton told the Inquiry that FRES and the replacement for Snatch were "two completely different questions".[427] He said that "to put something in" to the Defence programme, "something ha[d] to come out"; the resources had to be balanced out. Lt Gen Fulton did not think that created a reluctance to give a Snatch replacement a high priority.

811. Lt Gen Figgures told the Inquiry that "FRES had been used as a regulator for the defence programme. Money had actually been taken out of the FRES programme in order to attempt to balance the programme."[428]

812. Mr Hutton told the Inquiry that, if it had gone ahead on the original timescale, some of the equipment from FRES would have been available for deployment in Iraq.[429]

813. In Mr Hutton's view, the problem had been:

> "We couldn't settle on the specification. We changed our mind about certain aspects of how we wanted to go ahead with the procurement. We started, we stopped."

814. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry that the FRES programme was "overcomplicated and overcomplex".[430] He said that the "critical battleground" was the need to "interact with the population". That required "smaller and lighter vehicles"; "commanders need a wide range of vehicles". FRES "would not have solved the problems that we had been facing in Iraq and Afghanistan, with, perhaps, one exception, which is the Scout variant … our top priority at the moment … to replace the CVR(T)".

815. Gen Jackson told the Inquiry:

> "As the situation deteriorated in southern Iraq of course the vulnerabilities of the Snatch Land Rover became tragically more and more apparent, and we then enter a difficult and muddled story as to the replacement, or the addition of better protected vehicles into the deployed army's inventory, and the whole FRES story comes into this as well.
> "… there is a limit to the amount of metal you can stick on a vehicle … and the ability of the opposition to up the kinetic energy that can be applied can go rather faster than our ability to withstand that. So the amount of metal on a vehicle is important but it is not the complete answer, and you would finish up with a vehicle which is far too large often to go down small streets in an urban area. So again the picture is not black and white, and there is not some sort of fence you can jump over and all of a sudden you have a vehicle which is immune to whatever your opponents may try to do."[431]

816. Gen Dannatt suggested to the Inquiry that FRES had been delayed by the MOD so that funding originally allocated in the Equipment Programme for the FRES in 2007-2009 could be used for other priorities.[432]

817. Gen Dannatt referred the Inquiry to the ECAB meeting in January 2006[433] where the Board was informed that there would be further delays to the FRES programme:

> "What we decided to do was to persuade Lord Drayson, then the Defence Procurement Minister, that we had a major problem, and it was decided to lay on equipment demonstration on Salisbury Plain and get him to come and see it on the basis seeing is believing, and then come to Headquarters Land and discuss the issues. As Commander in Chief I was given the task to put that together.
> "We took one of everything that we had and Lord Drayson saw what we had and saw what we didn't have and quite clearly what we didn't have was anything in that medium bracket … on the one hand we had these good heavy equipments, on the other hand some good light equipments. In the middle we had nothing.
> "In the car on the way back from Salisbury Plain to Headquarters Land he said to me, 'I didn't know the army had a problem. Since I have become Minister of Defence Procurement I have been focusing on jets and on aircraft carriers. I didn't realise the army had a problem'. To his great credit he then realised we had a problem and began to put some leadership and energy into it."[434]

818. Mr Brown told the Inquiry that FRES was the programme "that was interesting the military the most", but his understanding was that "even if it had been carried out in full", it would "not have given us the right vehicles … for Iraq".[435]

819. The Inquiry asked Lord Drayson about the concerns about FRES expressed by Generals Jackson and Dannatt, and the relationship between progress on FRES and concerns about Snatch.[436] Lord Drayson replied:

> "The FRES project had become delayed, partly because the experience on operations … led to repeated changes to the specification, and partly because the user requirement had become much too complicated …
> "The project to improve/replace Snatch was always separate … The Generals stressed the urgent need to replace the ageing fleet of Army Fighting Vehicles as a whole when voicing their concerns over delays to FRES … Snatch was a Protected Patrol Vehicle rather than an AFV … In terms of augmenting Protected Patrol Vehicles such as Snatch the focus in early 2006 for the Army was … Vector which in March 2006 I was told was General Dannatt's highest priority …
> "Progress on FRES and concerns about Snatch should not have been connected in theory … In reality however, I believe the Army's difficulty in deciding upon a replacement to Snatch was in part caused by their concern over the likelihood of FRES budgets being cut to fund a Snatch replacement vehicle.

"The impression I gained was the delivery of FRES by 2012 was a higher priority for the Army than finding funding for Snatch from the core equipment budget. I was concerned that the Army were focusing on the Vector … for Afghanistan and upgrading the FV430 (Bulldog) and that no requirement had been identified for a new medium weight protected patrol vehicle.

"The push to replace Snatch or to procure a new medium weight PPV so that commanders would not have to use Snatch came from Ministers, not the military …"

820. General Sir Michael Walker, CDS from 2003 to 2006, told the Inquiry that there was no difficulty in securing funding for Iraq UORs but that the spending round in 2004 threatened longer-term "big ticket items".[437] He said that there was "a list of stuff" where decisions had to be made but he could not recall what was included.

821. Gen Walker told the Inquiry that the procurement process for the FRES programme had been "horrid" and a "sorry saga of debates and delays; delays because of the lack of money":

"… it was not as advanced as many other projects, it seemed to me to get delayed and delayed and delayed, time after time, because the funding, and … if we had gone with it originally, we might well have saved ourselves quite a lot of pain and agony and death by having a vehicle that we could have used in the appropriate circumstances in places like Afghanistan."[438]

822. Lord Drayson was explicit that the decision to fund the Mastiff programme as a UOR had been an important factor in reaching agreement on the requirement for a medium weight PPV:

"There was concern that the FRES programme would be delayed or lose resources as a result of buying a new vehicle. Ministers ensured that the funding … came from a new UOR funded separately by the Treasury thus ensuring that the purchase … had no detrimental impact on the FRES project."[439]

823. Lord Drayson wrote that there was resistance from within the MOD to reprioritisation of the core Equipment Programme to support current operations:

"… because the Services were concerned that their long term programmes would be cannibalised and lose funding to short term operational needs … it was quite unusual for core equipment funding to be redirected to operational needs. This only happened when the military had a strong desire for it – for example with Vector …"

CALL FOR A PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO THE USE OF SNATCH

824. On 7 November 2008, Hodge Jones & Allen solicitors wrote to Mr Hutton on behalf of Ms Susan Smith, requesting a public inquiry into the use of Snatch Land Rovers in the Iraq and Afghanistan conflicts.[440] Ms Smith's son, Private Phillip Hewett, was killed on 16 July 2005 in an IED attack in al-Amara whilst travelling in a Snatch Land Rover.

825. Treasury Solicitors replied on 15 December, enclosing a letter from Mr Hutton to Ms Smith.[441] Mr Hutton's letter said that, "after thinking very carefully about what has been said on this issue … a public inquiry would not be the right way to proceed". He would be issuing a Written Ministerial Statement the following day but had wanted to write to Ms Smith personally.

826. Mr Hutton explained that the reasons for not holding a public inquiry into the use of Snatch were:

- The clear advice from military commanders, unanimously endorsed by the Chiefs of Staff, was that Snatch vehicles were "essential to the success of operations in both Iraq and Afghanistan".
- Heavier vehicles such as Warrior or Mastiff could not replace Snatch because they could not "be used for all purposes" and were "simply unable to access" the necessary places to deliver the UK's objectives.
- Better armoured vehicles, which tended to be larger and heavier, were "viewed by the local population as aggressive and intimidating". That made it more difficult for the military to engage with local people and win their confidence. The larger vehicles also could cause "serious damage" to local infrastructure such as roads, buildings and drainage systems. Those factors could "inflame local opinion against UK troops" and increase the threat level overall.

827. Mr Hutton said that that meant "a critical requirement" for a light PPV such as Snatch remained. He referred to the "number of technical enhancements" to Snatch since its first deployment to Iraq in 2003. He stated that the introduction of its new variant, the Snatch Vixen, along with the procurement of additional Mastiff vehicles, would enable the UK "to continue reducing the scope of the Snatch 2A vehicle's role until it is used only within [UK] camps".

828. In his Written Ministerial Statement on 16 December, Mr Hutton referred to the "widespread public concern over the thirty-seven deaths of British servicemen and women in Iraq and Afghanistan as a result of injuries sustained while using Snatch Land Rovers".[442]

[442] House of Commons, Official Report, 16 December 2008, columns 103WS – 104WS.

829. Mr Hutton repeated the reasons he had provided to Ms Smith as to why he had decided not to hold a public inquiry into the matter. He said it was "also important to be clear" that it could not be assumed that the 37 servicemen and women would have survived if they had been in more heavily armoured vehicles. Any vehicle could be overmatched and armour was only one part of the tactics, techniques and procedures that were used to protect troops.

830. On 10 July 2009, Ms Smith won a right to a judicial review, on limited grounds, of the Government's decision not to hold a Snatch Inquiry.[443]

831. A letter from the Treasury Solicitors to Ms Smith's solicitors on 15 September stated that that had prompted a "fresh decision" by Mr Bob Ainsworth, who became the Defence Secretary in June 2009. He had again considered the question of whether an inquiry should be held and decided that an inquiry would be an inappropriate use of public resources given the extent to which the subject had already been examined.

Legal action taken by families over the use of Snatch Land Rovers

On 19 June 2013, the Supreme Court ruled that relatives of three soldiers killed in Iraq, and two others seriously injured, had a right to sue the Government for negligence and pursue damages under human rights legislation.[444] In doing so, the Court rejected the MOD's arguments that the principle of combat immunity applied; the MOD had a duty of care over soldiers regardless of whether they had left the British base in the line of duty.

The proceedings concerned three sets of claims, one of which was brought by Ms Smith (the mother of Private Phillip Hewett) and the relatives of Private Lee Ellis over the MOD's alleged breach of Article 2, the Human Right to Life, in the preventative measures available to protect the lives of troops travelling in Snatch vehicles. Private Ellis's relatives also brought a claim of negligence against the MOD.

The case against the Government for damages and negligence was still continuing at the time of the Iraq Inquiry's publication.

The Iraq Inquiry has considered material provided by Hodge Jones & Allen solicitors and has taken account of that when putting questions to witnesses during the public hearings and when drafting its Report.

SNATCH AFTER IRAQ

832. Ridgback entered service in June 2009 in Afghanistan. It was not deployed to Iraq.

833. On 6 March 2010, the BBC reported that Mr Brown visited troops in Afghanistan and said that 200 new patrol vehicles would arrive in late 2011 to replace the Snatch Land Rover.[445]

834. That new patrol vehicle was the Foxhound, which arrived in Afghanistan on 17 June 2012.[446] The MOD's announcement about its arrival did not refer to the Snatch Land Rover, or any other PPVs.

835. The MOD told the Inquiry:

> "The Foxhound is a Protected Patrol Vehicle. It underwent final testing in the Helmand desert before being deployed on operations. Foxhound was specifically designed and built in Britain to protect against the threats faced by troops in Afghanistan, but it is an agile and versatile vehicle which will be a mainstay in the Army for years to come. Being lighter and smaller than other protected vehicles, Foxhound brings a new capability to the Army and is ideal for soldiers operating in mentoring and partnering roles."[447]

836. The Snatch 2 Land Rover remains in service with the British Army.[448] The British Army's website states that it is "deployed for general patrolling in low threat areas" and is "being extensively replaced by Vector and Mastiff".

The impact of Afghanistan on the equipment available in Iraq

837. In June 2004, the UK had made a public commitment to deploy HQ ARRC to Afghanistan in 2006, based on a recommendation from the Chiefs of Staff and Mr Hoon, and with Mr Straw's support. HQ ARRC was a NATO asset for which the UK was the lead nation and provided 60 percent of its staff. That decision is described in Section 9.2. By October, that decision had become an important factor in considering resources for Iraq.

838. In July 2005, the DOP agreed proposals for both the transfer of the four provinces in MND(SE) to Iraqi control and for the deployment of the UK Provincial Reconstruction Team then based in northern Afghanistan to Helmand province in the South, along with an infantry battlegroup and full helicopter support – around 2,500 personnel. That decision is described in Section 9.4.

839. On 26 January 2006, the UK announced that it would be deploying 3,300 troops to Helmand province.

840. This Section describes the provision of ISTAR and support helicopters to Iraq leading up to, and after, the decision to deploy UK troops.

Existing capability gaps before 2006

ISTAR

841. Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR) is a key military capability that generates and delivers specific information and intelligence to decision-makers at all levels in support of the planning and conduct of operations.[449]

842. In 2008, the House of Commons Defence Committee defined three broad categories of ISTAR:

- strategic – including systems that provide early warning of ballistic missile threats to the UK and the Nimrod R1 system that provided Manned Airborne Surveillance (MAS);
- operational – systems that can operate from naval platforms or land and provide air and surface surveillance using a mix of sensors; and
- tactical – man-portable and vehicle-mounted systems that provide electronic surveillance for land forces.[450]

843. ISTAR is delivered through "two distinct but inter-related capability areas":

- "The collection side – which aims to provide capabilities that can gather accurate and timely information across the environments and can detect, track and identify enemy, neutral and friendly entities within a defined area, day and night, and in all weathers.
- The direction, processing and dissemination side – which aims to provide capabilities that can direct collection effort and then process and disseminate derived information and intelligence to all levels in national and coalition operations."

844. An Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV) is an important means of collecting ISTAR information.

845. The Strategic Defence Review (SDR) in 1998 had emphasised the importance of ISTAR assets, "not only to maintain a qualitative edge in combat but to facilitate the often rapid decision-making needed in complex political circumstances".[451]

[451] Ministry of Defence, The Strategic Defence Review, July 1998.

846. The SDR stated that a range of advanced systems were planned or already entering service, including the airborne ground surveillance radar, Astor, and a battlefield unmanned target acquisition vehicle, Phoenix.

847. The Strategic Defence Review: A New Chapter in 2002 reiterated that ISTAR was a key element of the MOD's network-centric capability.[452] It stated that the US had demonstrated in Afghanistan the effectiveness of such systems in providing persistent surveillance without putting aircrew lives at risk: "Our Watchkeeper project has the same purpose; and we intend to accelerate the programme."

848. The Watchkeeper programme was initiated to address the capability gap for a tactical UAV that could provide operational commanders with a persistent, all-weather ISTAR capability.

849. On 7 January 2004, Lt Gen Fulton told the House of Commons Defence Committee that Watchkeeper was "due in service in 2005-06".[453]

850. The Government's Response to the Committee's report on 8 June stated that the main investment decision was "due later in 2004", at which point a formal In Service Date (ISD) would be set.[454]

851. That date was provided in the National Audit Office (NAO) report on the MOD's Major Projects in November 2004.[455] The target date for Watchkeeper's Main Gate approval was December 2004 and the internal planning assumptions for its entry into service was November 2006.

852. A minute from Lieutenant General Andrew Ridgway, Chief of Defence Intelligence, on 22 June 2004 indicated that Phoenix was the only UAV in service in 2003.[456] It had been procured in 1988 against a requirement to support operations in north-west Europe, predominantly as a target acquisition system. The system was subsequently used in the Balkans and in Iraq.

853. Lt Gen Ridgway wrote that it had been described as "battle winning equipment" during the invasion and had successfully been deployed on wider surveillance roles in addition to providing target acquisition information. Phoenix had not, however, been designed "to operate in the extreme heat of Iraq".

854. On 28 April 2003, MND(SE) produced a USUR for an "enhanced enduring ISTAR capability for the UK land component".[457] It explained that Phoenix had been supporting Phase III operations at "rates far greater than previously foreseen in sustainability planning guidance, and in temperatures exceeding the design specification".

855. The USUR noted that experience in Bosnia and Kosovo had demonstrated that ISTAR systems that were "flexible, responsive, not manpower intensive, and with a low ground footprint" were key to maintaining the Commander's situational awareness and protecting UK forces. In those areas, "with small AORs", Phoenix had been used "to great effect".

856. The USUR stated that 75 Phoenix UAVs had been deployed or moved into theatre since operations started. By 15 April 2003, only 29 of those were still "fit" for use in theatre. Seven had been lost to hostile action and 24 had crashed because of a fault in the Phoenix's system.

857. There was no explanation of what had happened to the remaining 15 UAVs.

858. Without "corrective action", the USUR stated that current attrition rates meant that there would be no Phoenix UAVs left in theatre by 6 May (without deploying War Maintenance Reserve (WMR) stock), or that stocks would reduce to zero by 10 June (if the WMR stock was fully deployed).

859. A package of measures were "in train" to fix the fault causing Phoenix crashes and to increase its availability in high temperatures. Neither set of measures would, however, increase its endurance or the range at which it could be used. While Phoenix would continue to be used in Iraq "by necessity", there was an operational requirement for an ISTAR system to support the duration of Op TELIC "with the required levels of persistence, flexibility, responsiveness and in all climatic conditions, with the required resolution to be able to identify and monitor difficult and often fleeting targets".

860. An initial operating capability was required "as soon as possible" with full operating capability "not later than mid October 2003".

861. The covering minute, sent on behalf of Major General Graeme Lamb, GOC MND(SE), recorded:

> "The GOC sees provision of an enhanced UAV capability as essential to mitigate reduced force structures in an extensive and complex AO [Area of Operations]. CJO [Lt Gen Reith] was briefed on this requirement during his visit to the Division on 26 April."

---

[457] Minute MND(SE) [junior officer] to PJHQ, April 2003, 'USUR for an Enhanced UAV' attaching Paper, MND(SE), 28 April 2003, 'Urgent Statement of User Requirement for a UK Land Component Enhanced Enduring ISTAR Capability'.

862. An email exchange between PJHQ officials on 2 May stated that Major General Peter Wall, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations (Operations), had "now approved the progression of this" and the USUR should proceed as soon as possible.[458]

863. The UOR update to Lord Bach on 9 May highlighted the urgent requirement for "a longer-range, more persistent UAV platform" and such a UAV was "seen as an enduring requirement that would allow a reduction in force levels".[459]

864. A footnote stated:

> "To date Phoenix losses on Op TELIC have been 20 airframes lost in action and a further 16 damaged beyond local repair (with a further three reported missing in the last few days). This attrition rate leaves a capability gap of at least 36 air vehicles against medium scale operations until Phoenix OSD [Out of Service Date]. Phoenix is still being deployed therefore the attrition rate could rise."

865. At Lord Bach's UOR meeting on 12 May, it was reported that options being considered to meet the UAV requirement included "an off-the-shelf solution" and bringing forward the Watchkeeper programme.[460]

866. AM Stirrup's UOR update to Lord Bach on 30 May included a progress report on the UAV UORs from the ISTAR Directorate of Equipment Capability (DEC(ISTAR)).[461]

867. It stated that, prior to the USUR being articulated, "a number of possible solutions" had been identified that "could be delivered within six months, including advancing certain hardware elements of Watchkeeper, but stopping short of providing an early Watchkeeper capability".

868. The DEC also explained that UOR action had previously been "put on hold" while an engine modification for Phoenix was pursued, to try and improve its performance in extreme temperatures.

869. The DEC proposed a "layered" system to meet the requirement:

- Nimrod Mk2 would be used to provide wide area surveillance;
- "other air-based assets (such as fast jet tactical reconnaissance) would provide medium/low level surveillance"; and
- a "small UAV system" would be procured to provide "low level 'through the window' surveillance". That could be implemented, "at least in part, almost immediately".

870. The DEC's proposal would "relieve some of the pressure" on the Phoenix Out of Service Date (OSD) but there was a risk of a capability gap between the Phoenix OSD and the Watchkeeper ISD:

> "An analysis of the availability of Phoenix for future operations (whatever they may be) when considered in light of the introduction of Watchkeeper, has indicated that there is a risk of a capability gap developing. We will not be able to quantify this fully until the repair situation on Phoenix is better understood. However, work is in hand to look at options for mitigating this risk, including re-opening the Phoenix production line …"

871. AM Stirrup warned Lord Bach that the DEC's update must be "put in context", noting the "considerable success" of UAVs during combat operations and indicating that the capability gap had arisen because UK forces had entered a new phase in operations.

872. On 25 June, the House of Commons Defence Committee took evidence from Lord Bach, Sir Peter Spencer and Lt Gen Fulton on the progress of the MOD's Equipment Programme.[462]

873. Asked why the Watchkeeper programme could not be accelerated, Lord Bach said that "some elements" would be in service by "late 2005". Concern was expressed by the Committee that the MOD should not put its "head in the sand", delaying the introduction of Watchkeeper to the extent that "by the time it comes out, the concept has already moved on".

874. The Chairman finished the line of questioning by saying that the project should be watched closely "because the military requires it and requires it to be done pretty damned quickly".

875. In its subsequent report, the Committee stated that the Watchkeeper and FRES programmes both exemplified the MOD's efforts to "bring important new capabilities into service more quickly". They also highlighted that, in conflict with the desire to speed up progress, the MOD had maintained a cautious approach in both with a view to reducing project risks. That demonstrated that the MOD was still finding it difficult to balance "increased agility against decreased risk".

876. On 26 June, the DMB endorsed a paper from Mr Colin Balmer, MOD Finance Director, on investment priorities for 2004's Equipment Programme (STP/EP04).[463] Network-enabled capability and deployable ISTAR were two areas of "vital ground" that Mr Balmer suggested that the DMB should protect.

877. An annex to the paper stated that enhancement of Intelligence Surveillance Reconnaissance capability had emerged as "a priority Op TELIC lesson".

878. On 1 September, MND(SE) produced a Forces and Resources Review to examine the resources required in MND(SE), for both short-term and enduring operations.[464]

879. The Review reiterated the requirement for greater surveillance capability. It stated:

> "The evolving threat from terrorism in Basra City leads to the urgent requirement for airborne surveillance of urban areas. Force protection measures limit the ability to observe a situation from the ground, or to track vehicles/people along busy streets, or to observe the situation remotely. Airborne surveillance would clearly enhance both force protection and the ability to catch or kill terrorists … A surveillance capability … could be fitted to the existing allocation of helicopters on Op TELIC."

880. On UAVs, the Review cited the USUR submitted to PJHQ in May. It added:

> "The increasing significance of the international borders and the need for pylon line surveillance has re-emphasised the importance of this capability. In addition, counter-terrorist operations in urban areas and more focused operations against both border activity and organised crime indicate that HQ MND(SE) will confirm the value of redeploying Phoenix once the weather becomes sufficiently accommodating in the Autumn."

881. The Review also identified a protected mobility requirement which is addressed earlier in this Section.

882. Major General Robin Brims, the Deputy Chief of Joint Operations, provided a written update to the Chiefs of Staff on the Forces and Resources Review on 2 September.[465] He wrote that one of the "key elements" was the enduring requirement to "increase force protection, commence ICDC [Iraqi Civil Defence Corps] training and to improve the ISTAR capability in MND(SE)".

883. Maj Gen Brims recommended the Chiefs agree that "DEC(ISTAR) should do all that is possible to accelerate the introduction of a new UAV, Desert Hawk, not currently believed to be available until Dec 03 at the very earliest". Phoenix UAVs would be deployed in the interim when the weather conditions became "appropriate".

884. On 4 September, Mr Hoon's Private Office sent a letter to Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, informing him of the outcome of the Forces and Resources Review.[466]

[466] Letter Williams to Rycroft, 4 September 2003, 'Iraq: UK Forces and Resources Review'.

885. Gen Jackson visited Iraq from 12 to 15 September.[467] His report to General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), stated that the Coalition was finding it difficult to "obtain a cohesive picture" of the various threats it was tackling. He wrote that he believed it was "time to reprioritise some of our intelligence gathering assets".

886. Gen Jackson recommended switching the focus of in-theatre intelligence gathering assets from weapons of mass destruction to counter-terrorism.

887. On 1 October, the DMB endorsed a paper from Mr Ian Andrews, MOD Second Permanent Under Secretary, that identified potential savings of £300m across the DLO and DPA.[468] That is described earlier in this Section in the context of savings made against FRES.

888. ISTAR was also an area identified for savings and included:

- £4m to delay the practical experimentation of UAVs by six months, which would delay the "de-risking activity necessary to inform Watchkeeper and other ISTAR and network-enabled capability related programmes"; and
- delaying the Watchkeeper Assessment Phase, due to be concluded in April 2004, by six months. The interim operating capabililty would consequently be delayed by a year to 2007.

889. On 6 October, Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote to No.10, confirming that Mr Hoon would be implementing £500m of savings across the Defence budget and where some of those savings would fall.[469] He highlighted that the MOD would delay ISDs for "new equipments such as the Watchkeeper (a key SDR New Chapter capability)".

890. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote:

> "These measures would not directly impact on the operations in Iraq, but would begin to cut into the training and support needed for motivated Armed Forces capable of sustaining the operations there, especially if the situation on the ground escalated, or in responding to new crises."

891. Maj Gen Lamb's post-operation report on 30 January 2004 stated that, in October 2003, the Joint Helicopter Force (Iraq) (JHF-I) was "augmented by three Gazelle and two Puma for ISTAR operations".[470]

892. A later report stated that Gazelle had subsequently been withdrawn from theatre because it had "proved too vulnerable to ground attack".[471]

893. On 18 November, Mr David Williams, MOD Director of Capabilities, Resources and Scrutiny, wrote to Mr John Dodds, Head of the Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence Team in the Treasury, seeking advice on how to take forward new force protection measures within the agreed UOR "ceiling".[472] Mr Williams flagged a new requirement for £22m of UOR funding for area surveillance. Mr Williams' request for the funding of electronic countermeasures is addressed earlier in this Section with regards to protected mobility.

894. Mr Williams described the need for air surveillance assets as "effectively a 'force multiplier' in that a greater effect could be achieved by cueing and focusing fewer ground assets than by maintaining large bodies of troops in static guarding roles". The existing arrangement, whereby UK military personnel were guarding key sites within MND(SE), had prevented troops from being employed in more "proactive, deterrent or offensive security tasks" and raised more suspicion than would be the case with more remote surveillance, such as helicopters and UAVs.

895. Mr Williams wrote:

> "The potential solution to the requirement is to seek area surveillance capabilities since our forces lack UK-dedicated, persistent (in terms of time/duration over the areas/targets we wish to watch) near real-time and long-range capabilities, suited to the differing requirements in urban and rural areas, that can produce pictures …"

896. Mr Williams stated that, to date, the MOD had deployed a combination of assets in its inventory but only as an interim solution and this had not been effective for urban areas. In addition, the interim systems would suffer in spring when the weather became hotter and some aircraft would be required to return to Northern Ireland.

897. Mr Williams wrote that this was being addressed by:

- a surveillance solution based on a UAV that would cost approximately £10m for which three potential suppliers had been sent an Invitation To Tender;
- potentially using Lynx helicopters with a surveillance pod for the urban requirement; and
- a manned surveillance platform for the "pan-Iraq" requirement.

898. Further work was being done to develop business cases for the latter two options.

The impact of savings measures between 2004 and 2005 on ISTAR provision

On 26 February 2004, the Defence Management Board (DMB) agreed a large number of service enhancements and savings measures that should be offered as part of a Spending Review.[474]

The DMB considered a paper by Mr Trevor Woolley, MOD Finance Director, which detailed all the measures.[475] It proposed cutting the budget of £33m for the practical experimentation of UAVs over the following two financial years, which would retain a team to conduct trials and inform future CONOPS development but:

> "… there would be significantly reduced pull-through to programmes addressing capability gaps in the persistent deep ISTAR of land and close or complex terrain. This option is entirely dependent on the deferral of £4m from 03/04 …"

That measure was one which the DMB felt needed further consideration because of the impact on other programmes.

On 26 January 2005, the DMB discussed proposals in a paper by Mr Woolley on the 'Future Defence Programme'.[476]

On network-enabled capability and ISTAR, Mr Woolley wrote that it had been "necessary to assume significant savings" within the Equipment Programme, despite attempts to mitigate them "as far as possible". Those savings would require "careful consideration" and included the decision to defer Watchkeeper by one year, "but with a planned limited interim capability to support deployments from 2006".

The minutes from the DMB meeting recorded that the measure to defer Watchkeeper would incur additional short-term costs for supporting "older, less capable equipment" but those had been allowed for.[477] The measure was approved.

900. On 30 January 2004, Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces, was advised that a UAV capability gap remained.[478] Phoenix was due to be withdrawn from theatre in April because it struggled to operate in the heat of the summer months.

901. To provide "a stand alone UK capability", officials had investigated procuring either the US Predator UAV system or the Hermes 450 UAV system but both options had been ruled out because of "unacceptably high risk". That risk was not explained.

It was noted that pursuing the Hermes system could also potentially "disrupt" the Watchkeeper programme because it could involve the same contractor.

902. Mr Ingram was advised that a third option had emerged: the creation of a Joint Predator Task Force with the US, using US equipment but drawing on UK manpower to support an additional US Predator in the UK's Area of Responsibility (AOR). It was viewed as "the most promising option" in terms of performance, cost and time.

903. As training on the Predator took at least 40 days, it had already been agreed that RAF personnel would begin the next available course starting on 2 February.

904. Mr Ingram received an update on what became the Combined Joint Predator UAV Task Force (CJPTF) on 30 April.[479] An official wrote that a drawback of the proposal had been "the inability to provide a full capability until the turn of 2004/05", largely because sufficient Predator ground stations were "not available until then".

905. While the US expected, "depending on the circumstances", to allocate increasing amounts of existing Predator time to the UK AOR as the UK's participation in the CJPTF grew from June 2004, "there would be no immediate solution to the existing capability gap".

906. The official wrote that it had "therefore been agreed" to provide an interim solution by fitting a datalink to five Nimrod MR2 equipped with the necessary sensors. The datalink equipment would be loaned by the US and would "enable the Nimrod to provide near real time imagery to ground stations in a manner very similar to Predator".

907. That solution could not be sustained "beyond the turn of the year" because all five Nimrods required "major servicing" and the official accepted it was not a cost-effective solution to the capability gap.

908. On 22 June, Lt Gen Ridgway wrote to Mr Hoon, at his request, with advice on ISTAR capability in Iraq.[480] He wrote:

> "We currently have no aerial surveillance capability available in theatre – this is a significant capability gap."

909. Lt Gen Ridgway asked Mr Hoon to note that:

- Phoenix had performed well but had been withdrawn for the summer months.
- Nimrod MR2 was providing "some" photographic capability.
- Desert Hawk, the mini UAV, was non-operational for technical reasons. That was being investigated and it was possible that Desert Hawk would become operational again later that year.

[480] Minute CDI to APS/SofS [MOD], 22 June 2004, 'ISTAR Provision to Op TELIC – UK UAV Operations'.

- The CJPTF would "provide some capability" at the end of the year and in the meantime a number of Predators had been assigned to MND(SE). The use of Italian Predators within the CJPTF was being investigated.

910. Lt Gen Ridgway warned that, despite those initiatives, "this major capability gap" was likely to prevail until "end 04 with a particular shortfall over the summer months".

911. In considering solutions, the provision of a new UK UAV system had "been discounted". That included options provided by the Watchkeeper contractors and the loan of a number of Predator systems from the US because:

> "Detailed work identified that current MOD policy for airworthiness and safety for UAV systems would not allow the use of a new system or the use of Predator under UK regulation in a timely and cost-effective manner."

912. Lt Gen Ridgway wrote that the Watchkeeper programme was expected to proceed to Main Gate later that year, with "an element of capability to be available from 2006".

913. Mr Hoon's Private Office replied on 23 June that Mr Hoon had:

> "… noted that we currently have no aerial surveillance capability in theatre, and the steps that are being taken to close this capability gap. He notes, however, that despite these initiatives the capability gap is likely to continue until the end of this year."[481]

914. On 13 July, Major General Andrew Stewart, GOC MND(SE) from December 2003 to July 2004, wrote in his post-operation report:

> "Dedicated UK airborne ISTAR assets have been a pretty sorry tale with availability described as fragile at best. For operations of this nature a stand-off covert airborne system is critical to success, and something close to 24 hour coverage is demanded. For the UK only Nimrod MR2 offers a truly covert capability and it has been superb for endurance over wide land areas. More of this sort are needed."[482]

915. Maj Gen Stewart added:

- "Phoenix has given outstanding service long into the heat of the summer but its overall utility became severely constrained beyond April."
- "Desert Hawk has been a joke."
- "Access to US ISTAR capabilities have, as expected, been subject to perceived far higher priorities outside the Division's AO [Area of Operations] and have therefore been unreliable."

- "The conclusion is that the UK needs an all-weather airborne UAV in sufficient numbers to guarantee availability in operations of this nature."

916. In October, there was a suggestion that the Apache attack helicopter should be deployed to Iraq as an additional ISTAR asset but it was decided that the attack helicopter programme was not of sufficient maturity and there was no immediate operational requirement for such a measure.[483]

917. In his post-operation tour report on 4 December, Major General William Rollo, GOC MND(SE) from July to December 2004, wrote:

> "There is a constant demand across the Division for airborne imagery. NIMROD MR2 does an excellent job, but it is in short supply due to a finite number of aircraft and insufficient flying hours. P4 [Puma] is available and in high demand, but is difficult to maintain and although there is a surge capacity to use two, it is constrained by lack of spares. Phoenix can only fly from November to April due to temperature restrictions. It is also restricted to rural areas. Predator is technically available, but only if the division has a mission of sufficiently high priority … This means that there is a continual shortage of overhead ISTAR within the Division resulting in operations being planned around ISTAR availability, rather than ISTAR being available for operations. There is a requirement for more airborne reconnaissance platforms with greater endurance to allow for observation of pattern of life of both people and places and to assist asset tracking."[484]

918. On 22 February 2005, the MOD's Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC) produced its second volume of 'Operation TELIC Lessons', to cover the period from 1 August 2003 to 30 November 2004.[485] The preface stated:

> "Military activities within a continuum of operations have varied widely, but after an upsurge in the level of violence, the campaign has become a unique Counter-insurgency (COIN) operation – an evolution that fits no neat recent historical or doctrinal model."

919. The report highlighted ISTAR as one of the five key lessons for the Chiefs of Staff to consider:

> "Future ISTAR procurement strategies should recognise the UK's limited capability to find and track targets, and obtain post-attack Battle Damage Indications from the air, particularly in urban environments and extreme climatic conditions. This lesson represents the most significant capability shortfall on Operation TELIC Phase IV and is likely to remain an enduring requirement, particularly for asymmetric warfare."

920. The report stated:

"UK forces lack sufficient ISTAR capability to provide persistence and the ability to stream imagery in real time and cross-component, over a wide range of climatic conditions … This capability shortfall has been highlighted on all recent UK operations … Some rotary platforms have proved too vulnerable to ground attack, and whilst the covert characteristics of UAVs make them well suited to the ISTAR role, the Phoenix UAV can only operate for half the year in-theatre due to temperature restrictions."

921. The report highlighted that use of US Predator and "several UORs" to increase manned airborne surveillance capabilities had helped to alleviate the capability gap.

922. The Chiefs of Staff discussed the DOC Report on 22 February.[486]

923. The minutes recorded that "connectivity was key to bridging the ISTAR capability gap and enhancing the overall operational agility". Lt Gen Fry had advised that "a layered review" had already been undertaken to assess the overall ISTAR programme. ACM Bagnall undertook to arrange an ISTAR update for the Chiefs of Staff.

924. The ISTAR update was provided to the Chiefs of Staff on 22 March, with two presentations: one about the UK's existing assets and one about the capability gap and ISTAR strategy to 2020.[487]

925. The minutes recorded:

"… it was emphasised that the ISTAR architecture that had been illustrated … represented a significant step forward in connecting the many previously stove-piped collection assets into a coherent ISTAR plan. Much work was still required and three key investment decisions were identified:

- The balance of investment between ISTAR and other military capabilities.
- The apportionment of investment between collection, data management and dissemination of information.
- The degree of overlap required from different ISTAR assets in order to provide multi-source verification."

926. Sir Kevin Tebbit "highlighted the importance of investment decisions in EP07 and emphasised that given the uncertainty surrounding the availability of resources in the future, the ISTAR architecture would need to be sufficiently robust to develop incrementally as resources became available".

[487] Minutes, 22 March 2005, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

927. The Chiefs of Staff also placed emphasis on ensuring that the correct structures were in place to disseminate intelligence effectively to commanders on the ground.

928. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that a further ISTAR report would be produced in early 2006.

SUPPORT HELICOPTERS

929. During operations, the role of a support helicopter can involve transportation of personnel and supplies, surveillance or medical evacuation. That is different from the role of an attack helicopter which delivers fire support to troops on the ground. This Section focuses on support helicopters and how they complemented the land operation in Iraq.

930. The term "battlefield helicopter" can cover both types but in the material that follows it appears to refer largely to support helicopters.

931. The UK's campaign in Iraq, following the invasion, was classified as a medium scale operation in terms of MOD planning assumptions. The MOD told the Inquiry that, in 2003 for a medium scale ground operation, the maximum number of helicopters would be:

- 21 heavy support helicopters;
- 41 medium support helicopters; and
- 44 light support helicopters.[488]

932. The MOD told the Inquiry that the UK's support helicopter fleet in 2003 comprised a "forward fleet" of:

- 31 Chinook Mk2/2a;
- 18 Merlin Mk3;
- 33 Sea King Mk4; and
- 34 Puma Mk.[489]

933. Those aircraft were supported by Gazelle and Lynx light helicopters.

934. An MOD report published in July 2003 stated that 137 helicopters were deployed as part of the combat operations between 19 March 2003 and 15 April 2003.[490] Those figures are broken down in Table 2.

935. On 11 June 2003, Mr Hoon updated the House of Commons on the drawdown of forces.[492] He stated that "some 80 helicopters" had returned to the UK and that the Joint Helicopter Force (JHF-I) retained a "balanced rotary-wing presence, 18 helicopters comprising Chinook, Sea King, Puma and Gazelle".

936. The DMB was advised on 26 June that the recuperation of helicopters deployed on Op TELIC could place rotary wing support to operations and training "at risk".[493] Measures for contracting out inspection and maintenance for those helicopters were being considered.

937. On 30 September, the DMB was told that the recuperation process would not be complete until FY 2006/07.[494]

938. On 29 January 2004, Mr Hoon requested a short note from each of the Single Service Chiefs on the impact of maintaining the current and forecast levels of military commitment.[495]

939. Gen Jackson replied on 3 February.[496] He wrote that, on equipment:

> "… in meeting essential short term operational demands we must take care not to prejudice our ability to meet longer term rebalancing goals … Measures in the EP threaten our ability to meet our strategic objectives in the longer term … Reductions in rotary aircraft are also a particular concern as they are such a vital force multiplier, allowing a modern army to generate the high tempo required for success."

[491] The report suggested that some of the Royal Navy's helicopters were deployed until May and August.

940. On 6 February, Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, the Chief of Air Staff, replied:

> "The RAF can sustain its current commitments, but with the likely increased involvement in Afghanistan our air transport, support helicopters and possibly RAF Regiment forces will be seriously stretched."[497]

941. The minutes of the DMB on 26 February 2004 agreed a large number of service enhancements and savings measures as part of the Spending Review.[498]

942. The DMB recognised that rotary capability "had been a constraint for some time". Helicopters were "used everywhere, and were one of the key ingredients of lower intensity operations". On that basis, several proposed measures affecting "key operational enablers (Puma, Gazelle, Sea King, Chinook) had already been reprieved" but a number of remaining measures reduced DLO support capability.

943. The DMB considered a paper by Mr Woolley which detailed all the measures.[499]

944. Mr Woolley wrote: "The Army's current and planned operational tempo exceeds Defence Planning Assumptions." His paper had taken into account work from commitments and programmes staff, in conjunction with Front Line Commands and PJHQ, to assess the UK's current and likely future military commitments over the following 30 months. That assessment was:

- Iraq would continue to be a medium scale operation until the end of March 2006 when it would downsize to a small scale operation.
- The Afghanistan commitment would remain small scale until January 2005 when it would increase to a "small(+) to medium scale(-)" until the end of January 2006. It would become a small scale operation from the end of January 2006.

945. Mr Woolley wrote that Land Command had previously taken a number of measures into its core programme to contain expenditure within control levels, including the reduction of rotary environmental training by 25 percent which had "impaired battlefield helicopter readiness and constrained operational flexibility in Northern Ireland". There had been further reductions in rotary wing activity in Northern Ireland as part of a deliberate switch in operational focus to Iraq.

946. Mr Woolley wrote:

> "Collectively, these measures have already started to erode the Army's core competencies in war-fighting at formation level, and overall readiness levels. The cumulative effect of this will be to progressively degrade the effective delivery of force elements within the Land component."

947. The recommended savings measures included further reductions in rotary wing activity that would "restrict the support to Land collective training to 60 percent of the requirement, impacting directly on operations and tour intervals for pilots". Mr Woolley added:

> "This conflicts with an increased rotary wing requirement to support the likely uplift in operations in the Balkans and Afghanistan over the next two years."

948. The MOD told the Inquiry that, until 2004, it had been planning to replace its Puma and Sea King fleets through the Support Amphibious Battlefield Helicopter (SABR) programme.[500] The Initial Gate business case in late 2003 had suggested that "the most likely solution" was the procurement of 50 to 60 additional Chinook aircraft with the first six expected in 2012/13 and the full order by 2025.

949. The MOD told the Inquiry that, during the planning round in 2004, as part of a broad departmental affordability exercise, a £1.4bn saving was taken from the total helicopter programme.

950. The MOD abandoned the SABR programme and, following a revision of the wider helicopter procurement strategy, created the Future Rotorcraft Capability (FRC) programme.

951. The Inquiry asked the MOD whether the £1.4bn referred to in its statement was the result of the savings measures proposed in Mr Woolley's paper. It replied:

> "Not quite. The paper presented by [Mr] Trevor Woolley … explored ways of removing costs from the first two years of the Defence Programme. Among the proposals it recommended were measures intended to save some £420m from helicopter acquisition and support. These savings were spread across the ten year equipment programme and the four year equipment support programme but … were heavily weighted towards the years 2004/05 and 2005/06. Separate work, known as the Medium Term Workstrands, looked at ways to balance the defence programme against available resources in the years beyond 2005/06. The outcome of this work was presented to the Defence Board in April 2004. It included recommendations to reduce spending on helicopter acquisition and support by a further £1bn. The £1.4bn saving mentioned in our statement of 1 March 2011 therefore arose from two separate but closely related exercises."[501]

952. On 26 January 2005, the DMB discussed proposals on the 'Future Defence Programme' in a paper by Mr Woolley.[502] The background to that paper is addressed earlier in this Section, including that no specific provision had been made for the "extra equipment costs required to support the possible deployment of a UK brigade to Afghanistan alongside the ARRC HQ".

953. For battlefield helicopters, Mr Woolley wrote that "planned activity levels over the next two years remain at or above the maximum concurrency assumed in provisional DPAs". Commitments were only being met by compromising the Harmony Guidelines[503] and using crews and key support staff at tour intervals of "1on/2off or less" instead of "1on/4 off".

954. Mr Woolley concluded:

> "Increasing significantly the size of rotorcraft fleet and training more crews are not realistic options, nor in the short term is reducing the level of operational commitment. The only viable strategy is to accept a reduced harmony ratio of 1on/2 off over the next two years, requiring careful management of key personnel. The Puma and Chinook fleets are currently under the greatest pressure."

955. The £3.2bn across 10 years for investment in the FRC programme had also been affected, with £60m from the first eight years having been re-profiled. Mr Woolley wrote that "considerable effort" had gone into identifying the consequences of that decision for existing helicopter fleets and "the most significant risk" would be sustaining Puma and Lynx through to the introduction of their replacements. Additional funding had been allocated to Lynx to extend its time in service until its replacement was available, albeit at a reduced fleet size of 66 (from 82).

956. The DMB agreed that a measure to reduce Joint Helicopter Command (JHC) activity levels should be offset by measures to restore Chinook and Puma funding because "it was felt that these additional costs were an acceptable financial risk, given the significant operational benefits".[504]

957. A proposed reduction in Gazelle activity was rejected, with compensating savings to be found elsewhere in the land budget. The activity reductions for other helicopters "although unwelcome, were acceptable".

958. The MOD told the Inquiry that it withdrew its Chinook helicopters from Iraq in 2005 in order to prepare for operations in Afghanistan and replaced them with the Merlin helicopters.[505] The MOD stated that was because Chinook helicopters were better suited to the challenging conditions found in Afghanistan.

959. In a statement to the Inquiry, ACM Torpy explained:

> "… as confidence in Merlin grew it was possible to withdraw Chinook from Iraq to allow the force to recuperate from a prolonged period on operations. It also gave the force the opportunity to prepare for operations in Afghanistan, where the hot and high conditions and heavy lift requirements singled out Chinook as the obvious favourite to support operations in this demanding environment."[506]

960. On 4 May 2005, Mr Hoon was briefed that the JHF-I comprised eight Sea Kings, four Merlins, and four Lynx.[507]

961. In Iraq, the developing threat in MND(SE) meant that ground movement had become restricted, increasing the demand for support helicopters to move personnel and supplement surveillance.

962. The impact on civilian personnel is addressed in Section 15.1.

963. On 5 July, General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, the Vice Chief of Defence Staff, asked General Sir Kevin O'Donoghue, the Chief of Defence Logistics, to assess the "logistics related factors" affecting flying hours and operating fleet size for support helicopters.[508]

964. On 27 July, the minutes from the Chiefs of Staff meeting stated:

"Following the recent attacks in Maysan, procedures have been modified to counter the threat … The current cycle of attacks had 'fixed' CF [coalition forces] in the area and, as a result, progress on SSR had stagnated; PJHQ had therefore asked for an urgent review of UK SH [support helicopters] priorities, to see if further assets could be allocated to MND(SE). Given that SH were always in short supply, DCDS(C) [Lt Gen Fry] highlighted the need to ensure that current asset availability was maximised."[509]

965. Air Vice-Marshal Kevin Leeson, Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Logistic Operations) (ACDS(Log Ops)) was asked to review the current availability of support helicopters within theatre.

966. On 8 September, MOD officials provided Gen O'Donoghue with an estimate of what increases in output were available from the existing support helicopter fleet.[510] The officials advised that, "given appropriate funding", there was potential to increase both flying hours and the operating fleet size for all types of support helicopter, with the exception of Merlin.

967. The officials advised Gen O'Donoghue that several factors had to be taken into account, including that any increase in operational flying would require an increase in Deployable Spares Packs (DSPs), the lack of which had been a recognised issue recorded in the Land Equipment Capability Shortfall Register.

968. The MOD officials wrote that "for some platforms deployability and sustainment on operations would be enhanced through the provision of sufficiently ranged, scaled and supported DSPs; for those platforms currently deployed on operations, CPF [Conflict Prevention Fund] claims mechanisms and Urgent Sustainability Requirements are already in place".

969. Gen O'Donoghue wrote to Gen Granville-Chapman about those findings on 14 September to say that the MOD was "currently missing a clear statement of the operational requirement for SH – both readiness and sustainment".[511]

970. Gen O'Donoghue wrote that a paper was being produced for a meeting on 7 October. It was "an extensive piece of work" which was expected to clarify the requirements. Gen O' Donoghue wrote that he would "therefore concentrate this minute on the art of the possible and focus on what can be 'sweated' from our current fleet".

971. There were three groups of factors which had to be addressed to deliver improved availability:

- "depth maintenance and support", including the need to accelerate Repair and Overhaul (R&O) output and better utilisation of the sustainment fleet;
- "forward logistic factors" such as DSPs and maintenance manpower; and
- aircrew availability and requirement, which was "an issue for the FLCs [Front Line Commands]".

972. On 12 September, the Private Office of Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, sought confirmation from Gen Walker whether, "in the event of a slower than expected drawdown of UK forces in Iraq", the planning assumptions for deployment to Afghanistan would be achievable.[512]

973. Gen Walker's Office replied on 19 September.[513] The "short answer" was "yes" but with the warning that "such a situation would lead to some pain and grief". In particular:

> "The hoped for easement of pressure on our current 'pinch points', especially helicopter support … would be delayed."

974. On 19 September, two UK soldiers were involved in what became known as "the Jameat incident"; an incident where they were arrested and mistreated by Iraqi Police Service (IPS) personnel and only released after a second rescue operation was successful. That incident is covered in detail in Sections 9.4 and 12.1, along with its implications for security in Basra.

975. A paper considering those implications, produced jointly by the FCO, the MOD and DFID on 30 September, stated that UK police training teams would need "improved access to helicopters in order to move beyond Basra city" and that "greater use of existing theatre helicopters, if feasible, should assist this".[514]

976. An air bridge would be required for FCO, DFID and other government personnel to operate out of Basra from the British Embassy Office based at Basra Palace to Basra airport. The paper stated:

> "We will need to allocate more resources, which may include military resources, to security. The next weeks, and possibly months, are likely to be rough. Attacks on us are becoming more sophisticated. We will need to protect our staff."

977. On 14 October, Air Marshal Chris Nickols, Assistant Chief of the Defence Staff (Operations),[515] wrote to PJHQ, agreeing to provide additional Merlin helicopters.[516]

978. AM Nickols also agreed an uplift of 180 Merlin hours per month for JHF-I until mid-December. He cited JHC's declaration that the previously agreed support surge commitment had to end by 5 December for "fleet sustainability issues". The longer-term requirements should be identified "as early as possible" through PJHQ's Force Level Review.

979. AM Nickols wrote that, in the meantime, he was tasking the Director of the Directorate of Joint Capability[517] to lead a wider battlefield helicopter review to provide "a clear and early understanding of our options/impact should surge requirement endure".[518]

980. A note to Dr Reid on 17 October explained that the additional Merlin was found by reducing MOD support to capability demonstrations in the US.[519]

981. Gen Jackson visited Iraq from 10 to 13 October.[520] His account of the EFP threat is covered earlier in this Section. He also wrote that a number of issues had been raised by MND(SE), "all relating to our ability to sustain expeditionary operations". He wrote:

> "… our Support Helicopter Fleet is creaking badly. JHF-I [Joint Helicopter Force – Iraq] is struggling to meet its tasks even with rigorous prioritisation … Serviceability, flying hours and crew numbers … are all factors, but the overall picture is one of an SH [support helicopter] force ill-matched to support current operations."

982. On 24 October, Maj Gen Wall sent Major General James Dutton, GOC MND(SE), the Terms of Reference for an aviation Force Level Review that had been directed by AM Torpy because of the heightened IED threat.[521] Its aims were to identify aviation requirements in MND(SE) between December 2005 and April 2006 and recommend how to meet them. It would also identify "broad resource requirements" between May and November 2006.

983. The planning assumptions for the Review included:

- "threat levels remain broadly constant at current levels";
- "a mandate for Coalition presence will endure into 2006"; and
- "development of ISF [Iraqi Security Forces'] capability will proceed to projected timelines".

984. Following the Review, on 17 November Maj Gen Wall recommended to AM Nickols that:

- Only one of the two surge Merlin deployed in October 2005 (to support Security Sector Reform (SSR) in Maysan) be returned to the UK after the December elections, leaving a total of five in theatre. That should "reduce the risk of road movement" for certain tasks.
- The surge Sea King remain in theatre as an enduring requirement but a utility Sea King be withdrawn after the elections leaving five utility variants.
- Three [Helicopter Broadsword][522] would also remain in theatre.[523]

985. The seventh Merlin had already been withdrawn following the completion of the troop rotation but it was likely that another short-term surge of helicopter capacity would be required for the following troop rotation in April 2006.

986. Maj Gen Wall wrote that "a significant proportion of aviation" was used for "administrative movements within theatre" and for "wider ISTAR tasking". He stated that the Review had highlighted "a range of potential procedural, technical and tactical measures" to reduce the demand for helicopters but this was "subject to further work".

987. The steady state requirement for helicopters was therefore:

- five Merlin;
- five Sea King
- four Lynx; and
- three [Helicopter Broadsword].

988. Gen Walker visited Iraq from 22 to 24 November.[524] His visit report recorded:

"… levels of consent from MNF presence were slowly declining throughout the AOR [Area of Operations]. When considering military activity in the AOR, broadly 60 percent of our effort was devoted to force protection and sustainment of the UK laydown, 30 percent to SSR [Security Sector Reform] and just 5 percent or so to UK COIN [counter-insurgency]. Notwithstanding the planned reduction in British infantry companies, the AOR geography and operational situation meant that there could not be a proportional reduction in enablers, particularly support helicopters and ISTAR …"

989. On the JHF-I, Gen Walker wrote:

"… the weight of force protection and administrative tasking was such that the JHF-I was unable to achieve any significant stabilisation or security tasking; the position was exacerbated during the two months of the TELIC roulement when the JHF-I had no spare capacity; it was questionable whether this fixing of precious support helicopter (SH) capability made tactical, operational or logistical sense."

990. In his Hauldown Report on 12 December, Maj Gen Dutton wrote to AM Torpy:

"Helicopters have always been important in this area, half the size of England and Wales, but the EFP threat has made them essential. I have been grateful for the readiness to support us with extra when required and we have reciprocated by readily agreeing to a reduction when the immediate crisis passed. However this should not disguise the national lack of helicopters to service the operations that we are now conducting. Massaging airframes and hours can only go so far: the simple fact is that we need more helicopters (and aircrew) urgently."[525]

991. In his post-tour report on 18 January 2006, Maj Gen Dutton reiterated the point:

"The hours available to the aircraft in theatre are simply inadequate to reduce routine administrative ground movement in a period of heightened IED threat and to conduct helicopter-borne operations. The GOC has to personally authorise coach moves and the FP [force protection] measures required for even the short move between BAS [Basra Air Station] and SLB [Shaibah Logistics Base] requires several Coys [companies] to deploy to minimise the risk of a mass casualty attack … This is exacerbated by an increasing number of aviation tasks in support > of civil organisations supporting the IZ [International Zone] election process and civil reconstruction such as the UN (who will only fly) and DFID. Having received a temporary increase in Merlin hours and an additional airframe … this uplift was withdrawn following the aviation FLR (Force Level Review) in early Nov. To compound the problem of flying hours the Div seldom has sufficient aircraft serviceable to actually match the required tasklines due to problems with the ageing Sea King fleet."[526]

The availability of ISTAR and support helicopters from 2006 onwards

992. In January 2006, Cabinet approved the decision to deploy to Helmand. Dr Reid announced that the UK was "preparing for a deployment to southern Afghanistan" which included a Provincial Reconstruction Team as "part of a larger, more than 3,300-strong British force providing the security framework".[527]

993. The impact of that decision was summarised neatly by Gen Walker as:

> "Militarily, the UK force structure is already stretched and, with two concurrent medium scale operations in prospect, will soon become exceptionally so in niche areas."[528]

994. On 31 January, Lieutenant General Robert Fulton, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Equipment Capability) (DCDS(EC)), wrote to Gen Walker outlining the options for getting "better operational utilisation" from support helicopters.[529] He stated:

- Work to increase the utilisation of existing support helicopters was already under way as part of a Chinook Operational Effectiveness Study. That represented the only short-term option to improve the availability of support helicopters within existing resources.
- "Utilisation of a simpler, cheaper aircraft", such as the recovered Sea King Mk6, to meet non-operational tasking had some potential to alleviate pressure on the operationally-equipped fleet. Equipment Programme funding could be "made available to begin recovery of some of these old aircraft from 2009" but there would be some "significant" problems managing an expanded "two-speed" fleet and the additional running costs would be unaffordable under existing Short Term Plan (STP) plans.
- Recovered Sea King Mk6 aircraft could prove to be a worthwhile "gap-filler" until new helicopters were procured to replace the ageing Puma fleet that had an Out of Service Date (OSD) of 2010.

[529] Report DCDS(EC) to PSO/CDS, 31 January 2006, 'The Utilisation of Operationally Equipped Support Helicopters'.

995. Lt Gen Fulton advised Gen Walker that the view of "Customer Two", the Front Line Commands, was that the problems in managing a larger number of recovered Sea King would "probably outweigh any advantage". They thought the best way to "leverage better performance" was to continue seeking to "fly the existing aircraft harder by improving servicing, processes and spares delivery".

996. Customer Two was keen to explore the potential merits of "running on either Puma or Sea King" to achieve the Equipment Programme "stagger required to introduce, in affordable tranches, a future new helicopter".

997. In his post-operation tour report on 18 January 2006, Maj Gen Dutton wrote:

> "The importance of ISTAR platforms within this theatre cannot be overstated."[530]

998. Maj Gen Dutton referred to helicopters fitted with Broadsword capability. He stated that [Helicopter Broadsword] was good but suffered availability limitations as with all aircraft in theatre. Nimrod was also good but orientated towards [UK theatre forces][531] and therefore not dedicated to MND(SE). He highlighted the need to maintain and possibly increase ISTAR coverage as the UK moved towards Operational Overwatch.[532]

999. Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton succeeded AM Torpy as CJO in March 2006. On 3 March, he wrote to Gen Walker with the results of a Force Level Review.[533]

1000. The aviation support to MND(SE) was provided by: five Merlin, five Sea King, three [Helicopter Broadsword] and four Lynx. Lt Gen Houghton wrote that there was a requirement for Merlin and Lynx to remain throughout Operational Overwatch but changes to tasking lines and servicing routines enabled a reduction of two Sea King as an "efficiency measure". He highlighted the possibility of further helicopter reductions following the anticipated transition to Provincial Iraqi Control in Maysan, Muthanna and Basra provinces.

1001. On ISTAR, Lt Gen Houghton stated that "Full Motion Video" (FMV) capability was provided by Nimrod (Iraq-wide), [Helicopter Broadsword] (MND(SE)-wide) and Phoenix (locally).

1002. Phoenix would again be withdrawn for the summer months and would not be replaced with any UAV as Desert Hawk had proved "unsuitable". There remained a shortfall in persistent Intelligence, Surveillance and Reconnaissance (ISR).

[531] A cipher has been used here for national security reasons.
[532] Operational Overwatch was a phase of transition where the UK would operate from a reduced number of MNF bases to reduce profile while providing reinforcement to Iraqi forces. That is addressed in Section 9.4.
[533] Minute CJO to PSO/CDS, 3 March 2006, 'Op TELIC Force Level Review – Feb 06'.

1003. On 8 March, the Chiefs of Staff discussed and endorsed the Force Level Review.[534] The minutes recorded that one of the points highlighted by Lt Gen Houghton was that, despite the withdrawal of two helicopters, helicopter flying hours would be "sustained by the more efficient use of other assets".

1004. The Chiefs of Staff noted that "the withdrawal of Phoenix would leave an ISTAR deficit" and MND(SE) had "already been tasked to review its ISTAR requirements". Possible "mitigation was by the availability of unused Nimrod MR2 hours and the possibility of negotiating US Predator tasking". Gen Jackson would explore the possibility of using Islander aircraft from Northern Ireland to provide Manned Aerial Surveillance.

1005. On the same day, Dr Reid was informed that "minor adjustments" were being made to the number of support helicopters "through increased efficiency".[535]

THE DOC'S THIRD REPORT, 4 APRIL 2006

1006. On 4 April, the DOC published its third report of Op TELIC lessons to cover the period from 1 December 2004 to 28 February 2006.[536]

1007. The report contained a section on "National Issues" described as "issues that warrant MOD's attention due to the impact on operational capability". Such issues affected "not only Iraq but may have a wider significance for other operations, including Afghanistan". Those issues included: counter IED capability (as addressed earlier in this Section with regard to protected mobility), ISTAR, helicopters, air transport and force protection engineering.

1008. On ISTAR, the DOC stated that within Iraq there remained "a serious gap in current ISTAR capability – particularly in urban areas". That was "a regular DOC observation that has been highlighted on all recent operations".

1009. The report cited "a specific problem with surveillance generally and with UAVs specifically", referring to the "identified gap" between the Phoenix OSD and Watchkeeper ISD of two years. That situation "had changed again" and the Watchkeeper ISD had slipped to "Not to Extend (NTE) beyond January 2011".

1010. The MOD Investment Approvals Board (IAB) had directed that the gap should be viewed in two parts: theatre-specific in Afghanistan from 2006 to 2008, and the generic contingent war-fighting tactical UAV capability from 2007 to 2010. There was the additional, shorter-term problem that Phoenix could only operate in winter, and Desert Hawk was incompatible with electronic countermeasures. The Combined Joint Predator UAV Task Force (CJPTF) provided "limited coverage of MND(SE)".

[534] Minutes, 8 March 2006, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

1011. The DOC recommended:

> "… we should reconsider addressing the ISTAR capability requirements, particularly in addressing surveillance generally and UAVs specifically."

1012. On battlefield helicopters, the report stated that their capacity to support operations had "become parlous at times during 2005".

1013. The DOC added:

> "The requirement for an air bridge between Baghdad International Airport and the International Zone because of the increases – and sustained – threat on Route Irish, and the requirement to provide enhanced IED 'top-cover' have together compounded the situation. The matter is compounded further by shortcomings in the contracted servicing of mission critical equipment … JHF(I) has struggled to meet its tasks even with rigorous prioritisation. There are several factors that exacerbate the problem but it is apparent that the UK's BH [battlefield helicopter] force is stretched to meet the requirement of the current operation."

1014. The DOC quoted Maj Gen Dutton's assertion from his Hauldown Report that more helicopters were urgently needed in theatre and added that, with the "significant deployment to Afghanistan", that situation was "predicted to worsen throughout 2006". That highlighted "the serious overall shortcomings in the UK's battlefield helicopter capacity".

1015. The DOC report stated: "There is an urgent requirement to assess and improve our BH capacity as an operational priority in the short and medium term."

Force Protection Engineering (FPE)

The Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC) report on 4 April 2006 stated that FPE should be viewed in relation to investment in protected mobility and counter IED. It highlighted data from PJHQ that indicated that 24 percent of all attacks had been against camps and other static locations, resulting in 44 percent of all wounded in action.

The DOC explained that, to that date, FPE expertise had resided largely in Northern Ireland. Technical designs and construction standards had then been provided to other theatres (including Iraq) for implementation. Additional FPE Research and Development (R&D) was funded by the Equipment Capability Customer but the two strands were "not co-ordinated".

There was "an enduring need to provide security forces (and other government departments when required) with secure and protected operating bases from which they can effectively control the ground and interface with the indigenous population". The need for an "appropriately resourced FPE capability (for the Land environment)" had been endorsed by the Executive Committee of the Army Board.

The DOC recommended: "Short term action is required to fill the funding gap for FPE development and in the longer term, policy must be developed to ensure that FPE is brought into core business post Northern Ireland 'Normalisation.'"

1016. The Chiefs of Staff discussed the DOC Report on 4 April 2006.[537] The lessons about counter IED, ISTAR and air transport capability were repeated in the minutes.

1017. The Chiefs discussed ISTAR further, the minutes recording that if the report's identification of a serious ISTAR capability gap was "true", it would need "to be addressed, possibly through the UOR process, but perhaps more realistically by reviewing and adjusting as necessary the overall surveillance plan".

1018. The minutes stated that not only was ISTAR critical for operations in Afghanistan, but "a lack of surveillance capability had constrained operations in MND(SE) and would be critical for maintaining situational awareness in MND(SE) during strategic overwatch". In the meantime, the US was "being pressed to provide the UK with a proportional share of their Predator surveillance output, given that the UK contributed a significant amount" of the operating costs.

1019. In discussion the Chiefs of Staff agreed that:

> "… appropriate priority and resources were being given to the development of national Counter Improvised Explosive Device capability … including the possible use of the UOR process, the criticality of gaps in the UK's surveillance plan for both Iraq and Afghanistan … required further analysis, and CDS [Gen Walker] asked VCDS [Gen Granville-Chapman] to scope the issue."

1020. As "a first step", Gen Granville-Chapman wrote to Lt Gen Houghton and Lt Gen Fulton on 7 April.[538] He requested Lt Gen Houghton's ISTAR assessment for Iraq and Afghanistan, including:

- "What is the requirement now, what are the shortfalls, how critical are they, and what is being done to ameliorate them?"
- Given the shift to Operational Overwatch in Iraq and the UK's enduring commitment in Afghanistan, what was the "projected requirement likely to be" and might it even increase when there were fewer boots on the ground? What plans were in place to address these?
- "How coalition/alliance assets may realistically be able to assist."

1021. Looking at how gaps could be filled, Gen Granville-Chapman suggested Lt Gen Houghton should consider "the full range of potential solutions", including Merlin Mk1F and attack helicopters.

1022. Gen Granville-Chapman wrote that ISTAR had also been raised during a meeting about Afghanistan on 4 April and Gen Walker had "accepted that any new substantial request for UOR funding in relation to Predator B should not be pursued for the moment".

[537] Minutes, 4 April 2006, Chief of Staff meeting.
[538] Minute VCDS to CJO, 7 April 2006, 'Quantifying ISTAR Shortfalls on Current Operations'.

1023. Given that discussion, Gen Granville-Chapman asked Lt Gen Fulton to consider what could realistically be delivered "to address known and projected shortfalls in the timescales we are talking about".

1024. Gen Granville-Chapman sent a copy of the DOC report to Mr Ingram on 21 April, noting that the Chiefs of Staff's discussion of the report was based "almost exclusively around the issue of re-addressing our operational ISTAR capabilities".[539]

1025. Gen Granville-Chapman wrote that it would have implications in both Afghanistan and Iraq and that "resolution of this issue always came back to operational priorities within a limited Departmental budget". Despite that, ISTAR remained an "enduring" lesson that had been raised in all three DOC reports.

1026. On 10 May, Air Commodore Nick Gordon, Director Directorate of Equipment Capability (ISTAR), advised Gen Granville-Chapman on the possibility of using Predator B to address shortfalls in UK ISTAR capability.[540]

1027. Air Cdre Gordon stated that from "a standing start" it would take 24 months before a Predator B could be fielded in theatre. In 2005, the DEC ISTAR team had investigated procuring a demonstrator for trial in Afghanistan but, at a cost of around £60m, it was deemed unaffordable within the available equipment funding. He also advised that "alternative approaches" to procurement and platform operation could reduce cost and time boundaries.

1028. Lt Gen Houghton produced his assessment of ISTAR shortfalls on operations on 18 May.[541] He explained that FMV was "probably the most widely sought" ISR capability in Iraq and Afghanistan.

1029. For both theatres, Lt Gen Houghton explained that the UK operated within a coalition management process that afforded the UK "relatively low priority" for the allocation of ISTAR assets. The agreement to provide MND(SE) with "12 hours of daily Predator Feed" had been a "recurrent topic of bilateral discussion over the past few months" but it was unlikely that there would be any significant change to the UK's apportionment. Any allocation of US Predator should be regarded as "a bonus" and, if the UK concluded it was needed, it should aspire to acquire its own.

1030. Lt Gen Houghton stated that MND(SE) had sought to offset the lack of US Predator support by generating other FMV feeds. The FMV requirements were satisfied in part with theatre-level manned platforms but MND(SE) could not fully exploit that capability due to a lack of ground terminals to download the data.

[541] Minute CJO to VCDS, 18 May 2006, 'Quantifying ISTAR Shortfalls on Current Operations'.

1031. FMV coverage therefore remained "the most significant ISR gap in MND(SE)". In "general terms", the UK was "50 percent" short of the requirement across both theatres.

1032. Addressing Gen Granville-Chapman's specific questions on attack helicopters and Merlin Mk1, Lt Gen Houghton stated that attack helicopters would have "some utility as an ISTAR platform" but could not distribute imagery to other users. The Merlin Mk1 would be a capable platform, with some modifications, but "these debates" needed closure in the context of "a comprehensive analysis of our aviation capability gaps".

1033. In the short term, Lt Gen Houghton would pursue an extension of Nimrod MR2 support for Afghanistan and support the procurement or loan of terminals from the US to receive FMV feeds in theatre. His staff would continue to "press for greater access to Predator coverage" and he believed "we should look again at bridging the gap between Phoenix OSD and Watchkeeper ISD, potentially with an extension of the former".

1034. Lt Gen Houghton stated that the identification of ISTAR requirements and critical shortfalls for the medium term had proved "more problematic". It was clear that the UK was "only beginning to develop a full understanding of the national ISTAR requirements for transition in both theatres" and the ways in which they could be met. Lt Gen Houghton wrote:

> "I am led to the judgement that the complexity of a Coalition and national ISTAR architecture requires a dedicated MOD led ISTAR review to fully examine emerging requirements … Such a review should draw together a pan-agency solution to address our current shortfalls and define our long term goal for the provision of a coherent Defence-wide ISTAR capability."

The Lynx helicopter crash, 6 May 2006

On 6 May, a Lynx helicopter crashed in Basra, killing all five personnel[542] on board.[543]

At the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 10 May, it was noted that "the FCO had suspended flights by its personnel whilst the cause of the helicopter crash was investigated but military flights continued subject to the revision of tactics, techniques and procedures".[544]

The Board of Inquiry into the crash concluded that the helicopter had been shot down by a surface-to-air missile (using a Man Portable Air Defence System – MANPAD), fired from the ground.[545]

Brigadier James Everard, Commander 20 Armoured Brigade, explained the effect this had:

> "The successful attack on the Lynx … resulted in the cessation of all daytime … movement over Basra City. Critically, the Brigade was therefore unable to conduct enduring surveillance ops during daylight hours without Nimrod MR2 – an asset shared with both [UK theatre forces] and Op HERRICK."[546]

1035. Lt Gen Houghton visited Iraq from 13 to 15 June. He reported:

> "… I do have some concerns as I look ahead over the balance of the year … If we are to match the wider campaign desire for a decisive six months we need to balance ourselves accordingly."[547]

1036. The elements of that balancing included protected mobility and ISTAR. He wrote:

> "Resolve the issue of ISTAR. A plan that depends upon intelligence-led precision detention operations is neutered if we do not have the dedicated ISTAR (Full Motion Video) for pattern of life studies, target development and operational queuing."

RE-ALIGNING ASSETS AND UNDERSTANDING THE SHORTFALLS

1037. On 17 May, the JHC provided Lord Drayson with advice on the numbers of helicopters deployed on operations.[548] The advice listed the helicopter numbers available to Op TELIC as:

- four Lynx AH7 from a JHC total fleet of 95;
- eight Sea King Mk 4 from a JHC total fleet of 37; and
- seven Merlin Mk3 from a JHC total fleet of 22.

1038. The House of Commons Defence Committee visited Iraq from 4 to 8 June.[549] The MOD's record of the visit stated:

> "The Committee was interested to know whether the UK had sufficient air capability, and in particular whether it was felt that MOD had prioritised funding and capabilities appropriately, for example was there sufficient helicopter numbers to meet the requirement in Iraq and Afghanistan …"

1039. On 12 June, Lt Gen Houghton wrote to Gen Granville-Chapman summarising the operational requirement for battlefield helicopters in Iraq and Afghanistan.[550] While there was an endorsed requirement for an uplift in support to Afghanistan, on Iraq he wrote:

> "At present there is no endorsed requirement for an increase in BH [battlefield helicopters] support to Op TELIC, but operations have been constrained at times by a lack of available BH support. This is partly related to the limited performance and reliability of the Sea King Mk4 when compared with larger and more modern BH. Any potential benefits from transition in Op TELIC may be fully absorbed by emerging requirements to support Operational Overwatch and OGDs [Other Government Departments]."

1040. Lt Gen Houghton added that the withdrawal of Italian forces in Iraq "could present an additional requirement for battlefield helicopter lift and ISTAR in Dhi Qar Province". Further work was being done to define that.

1041. Lt Gen Houghton concluded:

> "With no reductions on the horizon in Op TELIC and escalating requirements in Op HERRICK, our national aviation requirements now need departmental scrutiny to determine the concurrent requirement to resource both theatres and define how our national aviation resources should be realigned."

1042. Air Chief Marshal Sir Joseph Stirrup became CDS in April 2006. A record of ACM Stirrup's "O Group" meeting on 16 June stated in relation to Iraq:

> "The UK required its own persistent surveillance capability if it was to deliver mission success. CDS' clear preference was for an 'off the shelf' solution which could be delivered quickly. VCDS [Gen Granville-Chapman] had work in hand addressing this shortfall which was due to report in mid Jul."[551]

1043. On 21 June, Gen Jackson wrote to General Sir Richard Dannatt, Commander in Chief Land Command, stating:

> "It is probably worth re-emphasising the lack of 'flying hours' for our operational helicopter fleets is an issue that is gaining momentum up here in the Main Building. In my view the current problems are merely symptomatic of the broader lack of investment in our 'lift' capability. However – and this is my concern – people up here seem fixed solely on providing a palliative for the current symptoms, rather than really tackling the Defence-wide balance of investment decisions that need to be taken if we are to have forces appropriately structured for what they are actually being asked to do (expeditionary Land based operations) rather than what they might have to do (force on force operations across all three environments)."[552]

1044. On 29 June, Air Commodore Brian Bates, Director Directorate of Joint Capability, produced two papers for Gen Granville-Chapman; one on rotary wing operational shortfalls and one on ISTAR operational shortfalls.

1045. The paper on rotary wing shortfalls stated:

"The Department's BH [battlefield helicopter] capability is a finite resource that is required to support a number of concurrent Military Tasks overseas and a variety of Standing Home commitments. Currently the BH force is heavily committed on operations and is recognised as a Defence pinch point …"

"A range of factors have contributed to the current pressures on the BH force; not least, a legacy of underinvestment in BH sustainability and the fact that a significant proportion of BH fleets are operating in excess of DPAs [Defence Planning Assumptions]. The enduring nature of today's operations, allied to a presumed need for BH during any drawdown or overwatch period, suggests that this situation is unlikely to change in the medium term. Other complicating factors include: … the increased IED threat that had led to a tendency to revert to the use of helicopters as the default option for protection where other means, such as properly protected road moves, may be possible; and, a paucity of ISTAR assets, leading to an increased demand on BH platforms."[553]

1046. The paper went on to summarise the operational requirements in each theatre. For Operation TELIC it stated:

"Five Merlin …, three Sea King .., four Lynx …, and 3 [Helicopter] (Broadsword [ISTAR]) are currently deployed on Op TELIC. The CABHWG [Capability Area Battlefield Helicopter Working Group], drawing on PJHQ-led AFLRs [Aviation Force Level Reviews], has established that current support is sufficient for the task. This was subsequently confirmed by CJO, although circumstances that could necessitate an increase in BH have been identified. The early stages of transition to Operational Overwatch (OOW) may free up some lift but this is likely to be absorbed by emerging tasks in support of OOW forces, OGDs and the need to maintain situational awareness …"

1047. The ISTAR paper stated that the key shortfall in FMV was "likely to increase rather than diminish" with the move to Operational Overwatch and the evolving concept of operations in Afghanistan.[554] Without additional resources, the opportunities to make substantial improvements to the delivery of ISTAR on operations were limited to "process enhancements" or securing greater access to coalition assets.

[552] Letter Jackson to Dannatt, 21 June 2006, [untitled].

> "ISTAR issues are often inextricably linked to a multitude of other lines of development or capabilities, which may, in turn, also be pinchpoints and subject to considerable pressure; helicopters are a prime example. Equally, the solution may not be equipment based. Rather it might be process or enabler specific. For example, access to existing information, bandwidth or capability through exploitation of frequency, downlink or a particular National/Coalition product or database."

1049. The options for mitigating short-term shortfalls were broken down into five areas, recognising that getting ISTAR right required more than a suite of dedicated ISTAR assets, but that it relied upon "all aspects of the network-enabled capability":

- Improving processes for collecting, storing and processing intelligence.
- Improving access to coalition capability such as the CJPTF. Lt Gen Houghton had been tasked separately with improving apportionment, co-ordination and liaison with US and other MNF forces.
- Re-apportionment of national assets including: the deployment of Northern Ireland based Islanders to Iraq or Afghanistan; increasing the number of Defender aircraft; increasing the number of Nimrod MR2, although those were unlikely to become available before November 2006; UOR action to bring Merlin Mk1 up to "theatre-entry standard"; and redeploying Phoenix to Iraq after the summer – an option that would have "painful implications" for a UAV regiment in Afghanistan.
- Extant and emerging UORs: a USUR had been submitted and endorsed by PJHQ for the provision of a "long range, long loiter, real time FMV surveillance system" in May. That was similar to the USUR produced in April 2003 that led to the CJPTF. Further action was awaiting the outcome of Lt Gen Houghton's work on getting greater access to coalition capability. Other UORs were in train to address the lack of ground terminals able to downlink ISTAR data.
- New capabilities: options included fitting additional Defender aircraft with the necessary sensors and downlink capability; further increasing the number of ground ISTAR terminals; using commercially owned UAV systems such as the US had done with Scan Eagle which could deliver capability quickly ("within about nine months") but did raise liability issues; advancing commercial off-the-shelf UAVs such as Predator B under the DABINETT programme or leasing Hermes 450/Hermes 180 air vehicles. There was no potential to bring forward elements of the Watchkeeper programme.

1050. Future equipment programmes would deliver improved ISTAR effect within the next few years, but none before November 2006.

1051. The MOD told the Inquiry that Phoenix was withdrawn from theatre in June 2006 and, although it had been suggested that it might be redeployed that September, it did not re-enter service.[555]

1052. In July, Gen Dannatt wrote to Gen Jackson about "four major concerns" he had as "the Force provider".[556] His "first and overriding concern" was protected mobility which is addressed earlier in this Section. Two of those other concerns related to ISTAR and battlefield helicopters.

1053. Gen Dannatt wrote that he shared Gen Granville-Chapman's concern about ISTAR support for land operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. He stated that there was "an urgent need for a full estimate process to ascertain the requirement" and judged that "such an estimate would identify the need for an easily deployable UAV capable of operating beyond the line of sight, under the control of the tactical ground commander, and responsive to his information requirements".

1054. Gen Dannatt saw this "as complementary to the more immediate re-allocation of current resources and longer-term Equipment Programme solutions. Such a capability was always within the original vision for the Watchkeeper programme; the need is now acute."

1055. Gen Dannatt acknowledged that the paper on battlefield helicopters would be considered by the Chiefs of Staff that week but wrote that he "would be remiss if I failed to stress the importance of resolving this issue as a matter of urgency". He stated:

> "Operational experience continues to drive home the inextricable linkages between ISTAR, protected mobility and BH. When the two former capabilities are under stress … we invariably place a higher call on the latter, a call that we find increasingly difficult to meet, given the limited resources at our disposal. The issue is one of flying hours as well as the provision of sufficient numbers of aircraft and their spares. The key and developing role of AH [attack helicopters] on operations in Afghanistan, coupled with significant shortfalls in support funding, brings this into even sharper focus."

1056. Gen Dannatt wrote that action was urgently needed to continue operations and "minimise casualties to our soldiers". He stated: "Process must not be allowed to stand in the way."

1057. On 4 July, the Chiefs of Staff discussed the papers on rotary wing and ISTAR operational shortfalls.[557] AM Nickols emphasised that both were "immature and had been produced to a tight timescale to allow COS to take a view on what action was required now".

[555] Letter Duke-Evans to Hammond, 4 February 2016, [untitled].
[557] Minutes, 4 July 2006, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

1058. The minutes of the meeting recorded:

> "In the short term, pressure on Rotary Wing (RW) assets in Afghanistan and Iraq could only be alleviated by releasing assets from other tasks, or by extracting more from the assets in theatre. The situation was complicated by differences between helicopters in lift and Defensive Aids Suites (DAS) … In addition the paper recognised that any increase in helicopter flying hours would be limited by the availability of spares, crew hours and harmony guidelines …"

1059. In discussion, ACM Stirrup stressed that the Chiefs of Staff "needed to focus on the problem they faced between now and the end of the year. The UK was fighting a war in two theatres which demanded urgent innovative work to deliver capability quickly, rather than waiting for a 100 percent (or even 80 percent) solution over a longer timeframe."

1060. Amongst the measures agreed by the Chiefs of Staff were taking greater risk on other operations to release assets for use in Iraq and Afghanistan and taking "further action with our Allies" to ensure that their helicopter assets remained in theatre, specifically the US and Italians.

1061. The Chiefs of Staff also agreed that additional resources were to be identified in the next planning round to deliver an improved rotary wing capability. That would include:

- the "fix to field" requirement for the eight Chinook Mk3s (see Box, 'The eight modified Chinooks');
- the provision of Defensive Aids Suites across the deployable helicopter fleet so that it was "adaptable to the changing threat";
- support helicopter lift over the next five years; and
- support helicopter and attack helicopter sustainability over the next five years.

1062. On ISTAR the Chiefs agreed:

- Merlin Mk1 should replace Nimrod in Oman, freeing Nimrod to "ameliorate ISTAR shortfalls elsewhere";
- Predator B "represented the most coherent ISTAR capability for the UK's needs" and should be procured "as soon as possible" for use in Afghanistan, but without prejudice to the Watchkeeper programme; and
- a PJHQ-led ISTAR Task Team should identify theatre-specific ISTAR requirements and how the UK might better utilise the entire coalition theatre ISTAR process. Air Marshal Stuart Peach, Chief of Defence Intelligence, would lead that work with a view to informing the EP/STP07 by 1 October 2006.

1063. ACM Stirrup asked Gen Granville-Chapman to produce an action plan to deliver the measures agreed on rotary wing and ISTAR "as a matter of urgency" by 7 July.

1064. Gen Granville-Chapman produced those plans on 7 July.[558] His covering minute stated:

"a. Nothing is to get in the way of achieving the timetables shown, whatever the hours – we are at war in two theatres and lives depend on the capabilities being delivered on time. If seemingly insuperable issues arise I am to be informed immediately.

b. Planning aficionados will spot that we are departing from the programme in some areas – intentionally. Less than perfect solutions are sometimes required to attend to immediate needs, albeit at the expense of other projects.

c. In the slightly longer term context of EP07 we shall need to make adjustments to reflect the current scene, notably in the RW (DAS for far more of the fleet) and ISTAR realms – DCDS(EC) [Lt Gen Fulton] will handle this and will issue guidance by the end of this month."

1065. The plan to address helicopter shortfalls included releasing assets by "rationalising aviation support" to counter-terrorism operations in the UK and releasing helicopters from other theatres, both of which were planned to be complete by the end of July 2006. Equipping all battlefield helicopters to "theatre-entry standard" was listed as a 2007 Equipment Programme measure.

1066. The plan to address ISTAR shortfalls included:

- fully replacing Nimrod MR2 with Merlin Mk1 in Oman by the end of September;
- delivering Predator B to Afghanistan by 1 May 2007 (noting the potential loss of other projects within the Equipment Programme);
- assessing the requirement for a short-range tactical UAV by the end of July and exploring options to meet any confirmed requirement by 15 September 2006;
- reviewing the output of CJPTF by 31 July;
- deploying Oakbank[559] to Iraq by 15 August;
- expediting delivery of 26 ground terminals to receive coalition FMV feed, 18 of which were to go to Iraq, between July 2006 and March 2007 depending on the time needed to obtain an export licence; and
- capturing the national requirements via an ISTAR Task Team by 31 August. It would cover Iraq and Afghanistan but also take account of other commitments – an 80 percent solution would suffice.

1067. Gen Granville-Chapman visited Iraq and Afghanistan between 9 and 13 July.[560] In Iraq, he reported that ISTAR and helicopters remained "the key focus" for equipment.

1068. In July 2006, in his post-operation tour report, Maj Gen Cooper wrote that, in relation to the UK's understanding of militia groupings:

> "The paucity of specialist ISTAR capability is also a concern. In order to prosecute routine operations more effectively and specific strike operations accurately we need better or additional UAV capability, full-motion video [and] geo-location equipment … capabilities are available on the market and would be real value for money."[561]

1069. Major General Richard Shirreff, the new GOC MND(SE), wrote in his first report on 21 July about two recent "significant operational successes".[562] He stated:

> "… we have been lucky not to take more casualties … The message is that we cannot rely on luck and that the critical shortage of key enablers exposes our soldiers to significant risk. Despite the good work done by the Nimrod MR2 and the two [Helicopter] Broadsword, we are woefully short of airborne surveillance capability. We are unable to strike with precision from the air, which we emphatically need to do, without attack helicopters or a similar capability."

1070. Forwarding the report to No. 10, Mr Browne's Private Office wrote that it raised:

> "… a number of issues that have subsequently been discussed in the Defence Secretary's weekly Ministerial. Work is in progress to consider these issues and further advice will be provided should any significant changes in approach be required."[563]

1071. On 26 July, the Chiefs of Staff "noted the immediate requirement for national ISTAR assets that would enable the successful prosecution of detention operations within MND(SE)".[564]

MR BROWNE'S CONCERN

1072. In August, Gen Granville-Chapman and Maj Gen Rollo briefed Mr Browne on the UK's helicopter force.[565]

1073. On 11 August, Mr Browne's Private Office wrote that he remained concerned that the UK had "a shortfall that needs to be addressed" and requested a "formal assessment" of how some of the options discussed at the meeting could increase capability over the next 12 months.[566]

1074. Gen Granville-Chapman responded on 7 September.[567] He wrote that it was worth recognising that the UK was operating above concurrency levels "(which did not envisage two medium scale enduring operations over extended LOCs [Lines of Communication] and did not plan for a helicopter fleet to match)". He also stated that the MOD had "postponed rectifying the acknowledged 15-20 percent helicopter shortfall until at least 2010" when it had taken £1.5bn of savings against the Future Rotorcraft Capability (FRC) programme in 2004.

1075. Gen Granville-Chapman wrote that Lt Gen Houghton's "current battlefield helicopter requirements in Iraq and Afghanistan" were being met by the deployment of additional aircraft and the resourcing of additional flying hours in both theatres. That increased level of activity was, "on the face of it, sustainable" and the requirement had been confirmed by the recent Force Level Review.

1076. In Iraq, there was little potential for reducing the "aviation bill" in the short term.

1077. The nature of both campaigns required a "critical theatre entry standard" to be imposed, principally the fitting of DAS and long-range secure communications. That meant, even with UORs to date, 65 percent of the battlefield helicopter fleet was "not deployable". Planned UORs would reduce that figure to 40 percent.

1078. Gen Granville-Chapman stated that flying hours were limited by the availability of trained crews as much as airframes. The demand was being met by "redistributing airframes and sweating the assets to the maximum degree" but, he warned:

> "There is not likely to be any let-up in BH tempo for at least the next five years which leaves us with virtually no capacity to meet increased or new demands and a real 'harmony' problem for our BH people."

1079. Four options to add capability were considered:

- Leasing – an option with "limited mileage" because the resolution of indemnity and financing issues, coupled with delivery timescales meant that significant new deployable capability would take at least a year but more likely three. Leased civilian helicopters in the UK could be used for training but would not generate competent crews for operations.
- Contracting – using contractor aircraft flown by civilians was an option but the aircraft were not "DAS'd to our standards".
- Further developments to the existing fleet – Puma was scheduled to go out of service in 2010 and Sea King Mk4 in 2012. To keep both models going beyond those dates would cost £155m. Options were being considered to make some Merlin Mk1s "dual capable as BH" and to make other aircraft into "a basic SH".

[567] Minute VCDS to SofS, 7 September 2006, 'Helicopter Capability'.

- Advancing the FRC programme – an additional £225m "in the early FRC years" would enable the earlier procurement of Chinook helicopters to meet the heavy lift requirement. An extra £650m across the Equipment Programme period would allow the medium support helicopter purchase "(type not yet known)" to be brought forward by five years to 2012 and "obviating the need to extend the ageing Puma and Sea King fleets".

1080. Gen Granville-Chapman wrote:

> "All of these options are being tested now … In October DCDS(EC) [Lt Gen Fulton] will chair a series of Joint Capabilities Boards to decide which of the options I have described should be pursued and when. But there are real affordability problems in the early EP [Equipment Plan] years and the levels of contractual commitment means that it will not be easy to shift significant investment away from other capabilities and into helicopters in this round. I suggest we return to this issue in late October when we shall know better the worth of options."

1081. Mr Browne circled both references to October in Gen Granville-Chapman's note and wrote: "No: it should happen tomorrow!"[568]

1082. On 11 September, Mr Browne's Private Secretary wrote to Gen Granville-Chapman requesting an "urgent" meeting to discuss his advice.[569] Mr Browne was:

> "… concerned to ensure that officials are giving appropriate priority to measures to improve helicopter availability and have considered, and exhausted, every possibility, including those which they believe Ministers would find unpalatable."

1083. The areas Mr Browne particularly wanted to explore included:

- the proposal to convert maritime Merlin helicopters to a battlefield support role;
- "a radical rethink" on the eight grounded Chinook Mk3 aircraft that were not considered airworthy (see Box below, 'The eight modified Chinooks'); and
- leasing and contracting further aircraft.

1084. Mr Browne and Lord Drayson met Gen Granville-Chapman on 14 September.[570]

1085. On 15 September, Gen Granville-Chapman wrote that Mr Browne was "keen to explore a number of options for short term relief" for crews in theatre. Those included "what sum of money" would yield "significant improvement in aircraft availability in the next six months" in relation to Chinook, whether additional Merlin Mk3 could be bought from other countries, and the programme intended to make the eight Chinook Mk3 airworthy.

The eight modified Chinooks

In 1995, the MOD ordered 14 Chinook Mk2a helicopters from Boeing: six were retained as Mk2 but eight were modified as Mk3 to meet a longstanding requirement for special operations.[571] Those eight helicopters cost £259m and were delivered to the MOD in December 2001.

Although Boeing had met its contractual obligations, the avionics software fell short of UK military airworthiness standards and the helicopters were left in storage while solutions were considered.

In 2004, the Public Accounts Committee described it as "one of the worst examples of equipment procurement" that it had seen.

Following increases in troop numbers to Afghanistan, the MOD started looking for ways to increase its helicopter capacity. As a result, in March 2007, Mr Browne took the decision to "revert" the Chinooks back to the Mk2 standard to make them available for use in operations as quickly as possible.

In March 2009, the Public Accounts Committee described that decision as having been made in haste in "a matter of days".[572] The MOD did not consult Boeing about the risks, costs and timescales which ultimately led to a 70 percent increase in the cost of the project. The final cost for the helicopters on entering service would be £422m, or £52.5m each.

The first successful test flight of one of the modified Chinooks was completed in July 2009.[573]

1086. On 10 October, Gen Granville-Chapman wrote to AM Nickols with actions from a meeting with Mr Browne and Lord Drayson the previous day.[574] The focus of the meeting was helicopter availability in Afghanistan, following a recent visit from Lord Drayson. Iraq was not mentioned in the minute but Gen Granville-Chapman concluded:

> "There is a wider capability point emerging about the extent to which capability requirements are being anticipated in theatre and the right levers are being pulled. I shall be tasking CJO separately."

1087. That point is addressed in a note from Lt Gen Houghton on 27 October and is also addressed earlier in this Section with the consideration of how capability gaps were articulated.

1088. On 11 October, Gen Granville-Chapman produced an update on helicopter and ISTAR shortfalls.[575] The updates that involved Iraq were:

- Four additional Nimrod MR2 would be deployed in "Iraq/Afghanistan" from 1 November 2006 to 30 April 2007.
- A business case for a mini-UAV was being developed to provide surveillance capability at "company/battlegroup level" by June 2007. In parallel, MND(SE) was running trials on Raven, a US system, to inform the choice.
- MND(SE) had produced a USUR for a tactical UAV. DEC ISTAR had already received proposals from engagement with industry and was in the process of selecting the most appropriate option. The initial operating capability depended on the system selected but was "likely to be around by June 2007".
- The installation of a "layered and networked surveillance" capability at fixed sites was moving forward.

1089. Further meetings and discussions took place in October with a clear focus on increasing helicopter availability, primarily in Afghanistan.[576] The only action discussed in relation to Iraq was the possibility of using two of the six Danish Merlin that the UK was intending to purchase to replace Sea King, with a view to modifying and redeploying those Sea Kings to Afghanistan.[577]

1090. On 24 October, Mr Jonathan Lyle, Director Air and Weapons Systems, wrote to Lord Drayson advising that acquiring six Danish Merlin aircraft would increase the fleet of Merlin support helicopters to a total of 28 aircraft, "enabling an enduring deployment of 7 Merlin and an uplift of 40 percent on those currently deployed to Op TELIC".[578] That would provide a "more robust and enduring capability than, for example, modifying Merlin Mk1 aircraft".

1091. Mr Lyle wrote:

> "Merlin is a success on Op TELIC and is the aircraft of choice for Iraq. To minimise the logistic footprint within JHF(I), the JHC favour an all Merlin force in Op TELIC. Subject to addressing the ISTAR requirement, such a deployment would release Sea King to … Afghanistan …"

1092. Mr Lyle mentioned that options for replacing the Sea King being used for Manned Airborne Surveillance in Iraq were also being considered.

1093. On 26 October, Lord Drayson and Mr Ingram wrote to Mr Browne with a joint proposal on how to increase helicopter availability.[579] Their minute highlighted that the issue had arisen on "the assumption that there was a shortfall of lift capability in Afghanistan" but there had been "very few occasions when tasks could not be supported", and theatre had not requested additional assets.

1094. Despite that, the Ministers said that the UK was "currently breaking crew harmony guidelines", and the current level of operations was unlikely to be sustainable in the medium term so even if forces were not increased in Afghanistan, "action taken now will improve the current situation".

1095. The measures proposed by the Ministers included:

- increasing Chinook flying hours in Afghanistan;
- procuring new blades for Sea King Mk4s to enable them to fly in Afghanistan conditions;
- procuring six Danish Merlin to backfill the Sea Kings deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan; and
- "leasing/buying" eight US Chinooks for Afghanistan.

1096. Mr Browne approved the increase in Chinook flying hours on 10 November, agreeing that the most likely requirement was for Afghanistan and for heavy lift in particular.[580]

1097. Mr Browne wrote that more information was needed on the other proposals to clarify how they would meet the capability gap in the short and medium term. Discussions on the Danish Merlins should "slow down" until it was clear what the requirement was and how it would be funded.

1098. On 15 December, Brigadier James Everard, Commander 20 Armoured Brigade, wrote in his post-operation tour report:

> "With the exception of Merlin conducting IRT [Incident Response Team] operations, aviation was not available between 1200-1800 hours during this period. The availability of the avn [aviation] fleet especially SK [Sea King] was poor, largely due to age, and often affected operations meaning that the no-fly contingency plan had frequently to be activated."[581]

1099. Lord Drayson told the Inquiry that he had asked Mr Browne to authorise him "to explore whether helicopters could be found quickly and to worry about how they would be funded after we had identified a possible solution".[582]

1100. Lord Drayson wrote:

> "I held a series of meetings with the military to try to reach agreement on the requirement and then I pursued a number of paths to try and obtain additional helicopters as quickly as possible. This included the decision to revert the Chinook Mk3s to Mk2s following my review of the project, asking the Pentagon and other allies if they had spare Chinooks we could lease or purchase and negotiating to take over the contract for new Merlins built for Denmark …"

1101. Addressing the effectiveness of the MOD's response, Lord Drayson added:

> "The Department's response was mixed. Great efforts were made to provide enhanced flying hours through the provision of trained crews, rotor-blade improvements, improved defensive aid suites etc but it was difficult to get the Department to agree on which type of helicopters were needed. The Joint Helicopter Command suffered from not being 'owned' and therefore championed by any particular service."

1102. Officials in the Private Offices of Mr Ingram and Lord Drayson wrote to Lieutenant General Andrew Figgures, DCDS(EC), on 19 December 2006 to thank him for his work investigating the helicopter requirement.[583] The minute concluded:

> "Separately, the Ministers remain concerned regarding the lack of robustness of the Support Helicopter fleet given the UK's current operational commitments. They would be grateful if you could ensure that options to make the fleet more robust, such as the acquisition of the Danish Merlins, are considered in the EP/STP 07 discussions."

1103. On 31 January 2007, Mr Blair met Air Chief Marshal Glenn Torpy, Chief of the Air Staff.[584] A record of the meeting from No.10 to Mr Browne's Private Secretary stated that ACM Torpy had said:

> "The air transport force was … under real pressure, with an aging airfleet, and new A400 that would only come on stream in 2010/11. There was also a shortage of helicopters. Sir Glenn noted the poor procurement processes and software problems for the Chinook Mark 3. More was needed on intelligence and surveillance. The Predator UAVs would be a major innovation."

THE INCREASING THREAT OF INDIRECT FIRE ATTACKS

1104. The deterioration of security in Iraq from August 2003 is referred to earlier in this Section and in Section 9.2. In addition to the introduction of IEDs, there were also indirect fire (IDF) attacks on Coalition Forces, using mortars, man-portable surface-to-air missiles and small arms fire.

1105. The solution was considered to be a combination of hardening structures and improving surveillance.

1106. Concerns about the safety of civilian personnel as the IDF risk increased are detailed in Section 15.1.

1107. In his post-tour report, Major General Andrew Stewart, GOC MND(SE) from December 2003 to July 2004, stated:

> "We have been extremely fortunate that we have not suffered casualties in bases from indirect fire. Attacks against them are sure to increase. Hardening, in some form or other, has to take place."[585]

1108. The MOD provided accommodation to personnel in theatre according to one of three types, depending on the capability required:

- Tier 1 tented structures;
- Tier 2 cabin structures; and
- Tier 3 hard structures made from concrete, steel and masonry.[586]

1109. On 14 March 2005, Air Marshal Glenn Torpy, CJO, advised General Sir Michael Walker, CDS, that CITADEL, a hardened form of accommodation, should not be introduced to Iraq and that the risk of IDF should be managed through a combination of continued enhancement of accommodation compartmentalisation and force protection Tactics, Techniques and Procedures (TTPs).[587]

1110. AM Torpy explained that, since June 2003, UK camps in Iraq had suffered attacks from mortars and rocket IDF. The attacks tended to occur without warning and between "1200 and 0300 hrs local". They had led to 43 UK casualties but no fatalities.

1111. AM Torpy continued that, following an increase in threat to UK camps, force protection trials had been initiated to analyse the effectiveness of compartmentalisation and to test the design for CITADEL.

[587] Minute CJO to PSO/CDS, 14 March 2005, 'Force Protection of UK Camps in Iraq'.

1112. There were four "bands" of physical protection that could be added incrementally to camps to counter the IDF threat:

- Compartmentalisation – found in "most camps" in Iraq and undergoing "enhancement work". Its effectiveness was partially restricted by the layout of camps but overall offered 10 to 80 percent lower casualty rates.
- Ballistic refuge shelter – for personnel to occupy when a warning of attack was given and used as accommodation during the height of the August 2004 attacks. It was assessed that the shelters were "of little value" in the current improved security situation.
- Hardened temporary accommodation – provided permanently occupied, purpose-built but improvised sleeping accommodation with air conditioning and lighting. CITADEL was an example. Providing CITADEL for all UK troops in Iraq would cost £35m, would take "in excess of 12 months" to complete and would require significant amounts of logistical and construction assets. The quality and comfort of CITADEL would be "significantly lower than that currently occupied" and the investment in the first two bands of accommodation would be wasted.
- Purpose-built protected building – not considered appropriate for use in Iraq because of "cost, time to build and permanence".

1113. AM Torpy wrote that it was "possible to mitigate against the likelihood and significance" of IDF attacks "through a package of mutually supporting TTPs and engineering force protection measures". He stated that events had shown that the level of attacks would "oscillate". Compartmentalisation was "suitable" protection "in light of the risk across Iraq" but those measures should be "constantly reviewed" in relation to changes in or development of the threat.

1114. Gen Walker introduced AM Torpy's paper at the Chiefs of Staff meeting on 23 March.[588] The Chiefs were invited to consider the recommendation not to introduce CITADEL "in view of the risk to our forces and the degree of additional protection that might be afforded by CITADELs; the length of time that UK forces will remain in Iraq; the cost of procuring and setting up CITADELs; the message that might be sent by building CITADELs this far into the campaign; and the consequences of an AIF [anti-Iraqi forces] attack similar to that which the US have experienced".

1115. The Chiefs of Staff noted that:

> " … in view of the potential to draw down to SS ["steady state"] by mid-05, providing CITADELs would mean fortifying our camps just as troops were ready to leave Iraq; only if the campaign were to be drawn out would this investment be worthwhile. It was also considered that fortifying camps at this stage would send the wrong message to all parties and run counter to any announcements on drawdown. The unanimous view was that compartmentalisation and active force protection measures would provide a significant reduction in the risk to UK forces but that the provision of CITADELs would not be of great benefit at this stage of the campaign."

1116. Gen Walker directed AM Torpy to prepare a Ministerial note on the force protection of UK camps with "a clear explanation of both compartmentalisation and the CITADEL concept" and with the statistical analysis from the trials.

1117. On 30 March, a PJHQ official sent a slightly revised copy of AM Torpy's paper to Mr Hoon, asking him to note the Chiefs of Staff's decision.[589]

1118. The official advised Mr Hoon that the improved level of protection afforded by CITADEL had been weighed against:

- "the relatively low frequency of and threat from indirect fire attacks";
- the hazards inherent in implementing CITADEL, such as the large number of predictable road movements to transport materials to each UK camp;
- the "perceived diminution in the quality of life that would result from insisting that our troops adopt a CITADEL solution";
- the investment in existing accommodation; and
- the "fact that protection is only provided […] one third of the day".

1119. On presentation, the official advised Mr Hoon that there was "a risk that, in the event of a sudden and unexpected upturn in violence", the MOD "could be accused of not having done 'everything possible' to ensure the safety of our personnel". The official wrote that "no measures" could offer "an absolute guarantee of safety" and that force protection consisted of TTPs as well as physical measures:

"In this case, as with most aspects of operations, we have to make a judgement on what is sensible and practicable."

1120. Mr Hoon endorsed the minute the following day.[590] He asked for press lines to be prepared to defend the MOD's position "against the accusation that this decision was taken on cost grounds rather than balanced and pragmatic advice".

1121. The issue of hardening accommodation arose again in September 2006 after a gradual increase in the number of IDF attacks.

1122. General Sir Richard Dannatt, CGS, visited Iraq from 26 to 28 September 2006.[591] In his visit report to Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, CDS, he wrote that difficulties with the Iraq Ministry of Interior would benefit from greater UK assistance but that was determined by the physical security risk to civilian staff. He wrote:

> "Given that the indirect fire threat seems to pose the greatest risk … our Counter Indirect Fire (C-IDF) measures assume even greater importance. Hardening accommodation is … one important aspect … but by no means a panacea. What is more important is to deter or defeat those who would prosecute these attacks rather than rely on mitigating the consequences. And to do this we need greatly improved ISTAR.
> "This is hardly new. We have known about the paucity of UK ISTAR in both operational theatres for some time now and I welcome the steps we have made with Predator. But this is far from being the complete answer. We need an integrated and layered approach, which provides dedicated manned and unmanned surveillance capability at battlegroup, brigade and divisional level. It is imperative, therefore, that we do not let the Project Watchkeeper ISD slip further to the right and we should investigate the possibility of an interim contracted solution to cover the next four years. Rotary wing MAS [Manned Airborne Surveillance] is equally important and we should ensure Project Stockwell[592] remains adequately funded. I urge early decision and action in this area."

1123. The record of actions from ACM Stirrup's "O" Group meeting on 3 October stated:

> "While 'Tier 1 Enhanced' was an acceptable level of immediate Force Protection, every effort needed to be made to establish hardened bases in those areas of Basra where our presence was likely for the medium term, and to minimise manning commensurate with the tasks in hand."[593]

1124. On 10 October, a PJHQ official advised Mr Browne, at his request, on the implications for force protection if troops were moved to Basra Air Station (BAS).[594]

1125. Operational analysis had indicated that there was a "negligible difference in the threat posed to a larger base". A single base would allow a concentration of anti-IDF resources and reduce the need for vulnerable road moves that currently placed a drain on other valuable assets, "particularly aviation".

1126. The official explained that there was a combination of Tier 1, Tier 2 and Tier 3 at BAS, all of which were vulnerable to overhead attack. Trials of an overhead system that "may partially mitigate against shrapnel" from an overhead blast continued but in the "immediate term" it was "most important to contain the lateral threat from IDF".

1127. According to the official, this was achieved through a programme of "compartmentalisation" which was under way and should be in place within seven weeks for all personnel at BAS or Shaibah Logistics Base (SLB). It was estimated that that would reduce the overall threat by 60 percent.

1128. It would cost "approximately $130m" to replace all tented accommodation with containerised accommodation throughout MND(SE) and it would take "about 12 months" to complete. That would also have implications for the timeframe within which the UK could withdraw from SLB. The official advised that it was "arguable whether it would result in net reduction in risk to our people (though it might overcome some presentational issues)".

1129. The official stated:

> "In the longer term, anticipating an increasingly serious IDF threat and recognising quality of life, we are also examining the options for providing Tier 2 or Tier 3 accommodation for the enduring proportion of the force (beyond 2008). Initial work indicates that hardened accommodation for a reduced force would cost some $60m to implement."

1130. The official wrote that there was a need "to keep the threat posed to date by IDF attacks in perspective to the wider challenges faced by MND(SE)". There had been two UK personnel[595] and one US State Department employee killed by IDF, all since 1 August 2006, compared with 25 fatalities by direct fire and 27 by IEDs. IEDs were still considered "to be the greatest challenge". The official advised that, despite that, "recent experience" had suggested IDF attacks were "becoming more accurate".

1131. The official concluded that the incremental force protection plan in hand would:

> "… ameliorate but not eliminate the risk. More could be done, but would mean delay and significant additional cost. There is a case to be made for hardened accommodation for our longer term residual presence, and work is in hand to define this."

1132. A manuscript comment on the paper indicated that Mr Browne noted the advice provided by PJHQ.[596]

1133. The MOD told the Inquiry that in October 2006 US National Guard attack helicopters were deployed to Basra for an extended period to provide a deterrent to the increasing levels of IDF being experienced.[597]

1134. On 29 November, Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, CJO, briefed the Chiefs of Staff on "continued efforts" to counter the IDF threat in Basra.[598] The level of IDF in Basra amounted to "harassing fire" by theatre standards but it had "assumed strategic significance following the events at Abu Naji[599] and the civilian drawdown from Basra Palace".

1135. Lt Gen Houghton reported that accommodation now had "lateral" protection in place but that overhead ballistic protection would not be complete until the end of June 2007 because of "a capacity issue".

1136. The ongoing efforts to counter IDF included:

- increased patrolling;
- ISTAR and the use of attack helicopters;
- the surging of [UK theatre forces]; and
- the potential use of a US "Sense and Warn" system.

1137. In discussion the Chiefs of Staff noted:

> "The long term corrosive effect of IDF on coalition operations in Basra, and the difficulty in quantifying the potential impact of counter IDF measures in the near to medium term; the critical impact of the threat on the future civilian force posture in the city; and the potential opportunity afforded by planned force withdrawals from Basra … to leverage local deals to reduce the IDF threat."

1138. Lt Gen Houghton was tasked with investigating options to improve the procurement timelines for fixed force protection in theatre.

1139. Gen Granville-Chapman visited Iraq and Afghanistan from 27 November to 2 December 2006.[600] One of the points about Iraq highlighted in his visit report was:

> "The indirect fire threat needs urgent attention, not only to save life, but also because it is probably a pre-condition for PIC [Provincial Iraqi Control] and an essential information operations issue if the opposition is not to claim it has bombed us out of Basra … Action is in hand."

1140. Separately, General Sir Redmond Watt, Commander in Chief Land, visited Iraq and the Al Udeid air base in Qatar from 27 to 28 November.[601]

1141. In Qatar, Air Commodore Clive Bairsto, Air Officer Commanding 83 Expeditionary Air Group, told Gen Watt that he had "made the case" for more manned airborne surveillance, particularly in Iraq where current and planned UAV deployments were "more limited than Afghanistan".

1142. In Iraq, Gen Watt met Maj Gen Shirreff and reported:

> "Richard also commented that some are making too much of the indirect fire attacks in Basra, which skews perceptions in Whitehall. We should encourage other government departments to see these attacks for what they are – harassing fire – and get on with redevelopment …"

1143. Gen Watt also remained "concerned about the paucity of ISTAR assets":

> "Everywhere I went I was briefed that a lack of ISTAR asset availability was constraining operations. As we move towards PIC and over-watch the problem will become more acute."

1144. On 14 December, a PJHQ official advised Mr Browne that three 105mm Light Guns[602] would be deployed to Basra from early January 2007 at Maj Gen Shirreff's request.[603] That was in response to "a heightened and sustained IDF threat against Multi-National Force bases in Basra City" which had resulted in the temporary withdrawal of FCO and DFID personnel from Basra Palace.

1145. The Light Guns would significantly enhance Maj Gen Shirreff's options in "the ongoing counter-IDF operation, augmenting the support already available such as helicopter and fast air capabilities".

1146. The movements associated with the move to BAS would "temporarily increase MND(SE)'s vulnerability to insurgent attack". The official wrote: "Of critical concern are the IDF threat, and the perceptions thereof of both the Iraqi people, and the MNF chain of command."

1147. The official wrote that although the deployment of the guns was an enduring requirement, there were no immediate resource implications.

1148. Further advice from PJHQ on 20 December stated that Counter Rocket Artillery and Mortar (C-RAM) "Sense and Warn" systems loaned from the US would deploy to the BAS Contingency Operating Base (COB) in "late January/early February".[604] Again, that was following a request made by Maj Gen Shirreff.

1149. The system "comprises a network of radars working together to provide early warning of IDF". The DEC was investigating options to provide a UK C-RAM system that could combine UK assets and UORs.

1150. On the same day, a USUR for an "active interdict capability" was generated from theatre, which was endorsed by PJHQ on 29 December.[605]

1151. On 15 December, Brig Everard wrote in his post-operation tour report that "the IDF threat to base locations remained substantial throughout the tour".[606]

1152. Brig Everard also wrote:

> "Despite considerable effort we failed to win the Counter-Indirect Fire (C-IDF) battle, with strategic implications as OGD [other government departments] reduced their footprint."

1153. On 19 January 2007, Maj Gen Shirreff wrote in his post-operation tour report:

> "… we have missed the boat on the ISTAR front. I commented in my first weekly letter six months ago: 'it beggars belief, that after 3 years here, the British Army possesses no tactical UAV capable of flying in the heat of the summer.' I was told no more staff effort could be put into resolving the problem, but despite this it will be sometime before anything is in service in theatre. Contrast this grindingly slow and ponderous response to the Americans' generous support with Raven or the Australians who have shown the agility and forethought to lease 6 Scan Eagles from Boeing, together with 3 ground stations … It took a couple of weeks to clear the decision, two weeks to train the soldiers and Boeing technicians have deployed to maintain the systems. As a result, contrast what we know about events in As Samawah with what we do not know about al-Amarah. As for strike operations, more than anything else, this battle is about day and night long loiter capability … tracking the target – for days if necessary … then striking to detain him. This has been a critical factor in the successful battle against AQI [Al Qaida in Iraq] and until we have the same capability we will continue to strike relatively blind against militant JAM.
> "If our procurement system were capable of similar agility we would have UAVs on station tracking targets now."[607]

1154. On IDF, Maj Gen Shirreff wrote that attacks in Basra had "increased throughout the year, approximately doubling every 2 to 3 months". He added later in the report that protection against IDF had "become a primary concern".

1155. Lt Gen Richard Shirreff told the Inquiry that he thought the ability to see and identify indirect fire threats and strike them quickly was "the critical problem" that UK forces faced in Iraq.[608] He said that that required "a series of capabilities which we simply didn't have".

1156. Lt Gen Shirreff said that the Americans had those capabilities, as did the UK, but the UK did not have them in MND(SE).

1157. On 8 February, Lt Gen Houghton provided ACM Stirrup with an Op TELIC force protection assessment.[609]

1158. Lt Gen Houghton asked ACM Stirrup to note that there was a "presentational difficulty" around the move to the COB because it only provided Tiers 1 and 2 level protection, but that the risk should be viewed "in the context of the aggregate threat". That threat included IDF, surface-to-air missiles, IEDs, direct fire and the ability of the enemy to gain information about UK vulnerabilities. The move to BAS would lead to a "safer overall force posture" because UK forces would "become less exposed to the most effective means of attack", IEDs, and would allow a concentration of resources to ameliorate risk.

1159. Lt Gen Houghton wrote that the "most likely" way insurgents would disrupt operations from the COB was through IDF. The frequency of attacks was increasing and the likelihood of a successful attack had "increased to an estimated 95 percent probability within the next three months".

1160. Lt Gen Houghton suggested that the most effective ways of reducing the potential scale of a successful IDF attack was through physical compartmentalisation of communal areas, and procedures to limit the number of people in "any given area". Existing construction work would conclude in June, but "only a move to suitable protected structures" would offer "a notably higher level of protection".

1161. The priority was for Tier 3 infrastructure in communal areas:

> "… we have decided in principle to provide hardened dining facilities (estimated at $14m and 20 months to complete) and to begin expansion of our Tier 3 footprint (current estimate additional $60-70m and an additional 10 months) … We should now form a judgement on the cost/benefit of proceeding with a more extensive Tier 3 build in the context of our enduring Overwatch posture."

1162. The use of C-RAM promised (subject to proof of capability trials) to provide "a significant enhancement" to force protection, although there would be some integration issues to overcome.

> "We are not fully confident the requirement for increased persistency of ISTAR coverage around the COB and over Basra City can be achieved. The UOR programme to deliver TUAV [Tactical UAV] is on track to deliver an ISD of July 2007, although the funded provision may not fully meet our original statement of requirement …"

[609] Minute CJO to PSO/CDS, 8 February 2007, 'OP TELIC – Force Protection (FP) Assessment'.

1164. The programme to deliver the Scan Eagle UAV (see Box, 'An interim solution – Scan Eagle') by April was "progressing well" and it was intended to expand ISTAR capability "through further TUAV or Scan Eagle support which may involve UOR action". Lt Gen Houghton wrote that it made "no operational sense to be parsimonious in the provision of ISTAR" when it was such an important element of force protection.

1165. Lt Gen Houghton concluded:

> "We cannot guarantee absolute FP [force protection] integrity or the complete mitigation of the array of dynamic threats that face us. The enemy only requires one lucky day. It is our judgement however that reposturing at the COB will allow us to further exploit the technical advantages of improvements to ISTAR and infrastructure as well as the opportunities of centralised location and the layered FP that the Op ZENITH[610] force posture allows us … "

An interim UAV solution – Scan Eagle

On 17 January 2007, Vice Admiral Charles Style, DCDS(C), briefed the Chiefs of Staff on his impressions from a recent visit to Iraq, including that the "critical lack" of tactical UAVs in MND(SE) "could have a significant effect over the forthcoming period".[611]

On 12 March, VAdm Style gave Lord Drayson an update on attempts to address the tactical UAV capability gap as part of advice to the Minister ahead of his visit to Iraq.[612]

Following discussions with the Australian Department of Defence, a solution had been agreed whereby the UK would lease Scan Eagle from the Australian Defence Force. It would be available from April 2007 to 30 June 2007 at a cost of £4.12m and the option to extend the contract beyond June remained open.

Leasing additional UAV capability through Scan Eagle had been identified as "the only option" that would deliver ahead of the initial operating capability of Hermes 450 and avoid the delays associated with other options.

A minute to Lord Drayson on 19 April confirmed that the Scan Eagle initial operating capability was achieved on 15 April 2007 and PJHQ had endorsed the requirement to extend the contract until November 2007.[613] Lord Drayson was advised:

> "The original requirement … to provide Operational and Formation level airborne ISTAR capability for MND(SE) remains extant and is not met or replaced by this proposal. In order to meet pressing requirements and cover operations during the intervening period, PJHQ have endorsed an MND(SE) addendum to the original USUR [Urgent Statement of User Requirement] which seeks to fill the capability gap between now and Jun 07 with sub-optimal but available capability."

1166. On 16 February, Mr Stephen Smith, Deputy Command Secretary at PJHQ, sought Mr Ingram's approval to deploy additional weapons on counter-IDF operations, in addition to the Light Guns and C-RAM systems.[614] He wrote that IDF was responsible for "inflicting the second highest number of casualties against the UK after IEDs" and the threat was likely to increase when UK forces re-postured to the COB.

1167. Physical protection measures were "approaching their practical limit" until a Tier 3 solution was delivered and Maj Gen Shirreff had reported that IDF was "having a detrimental psychological effect on our troops".

1168. Mr Ingram replied on 19 February, agreeing that the extra weapons could be deployed.[615]

1169. In a Force Level Review on 26 February, Lt Gen Houghton advised that there was "scope to re-task" up to two Sea King helicopters to other operations by mid-June because of "MND(SE) force dispositions and Merlin SH capacity".[616]

1170. Lt Gen Houghton suggested that the four remaining Sea King helicopters would be dedicated to ISTAR, but it might be possible to withdraw some of them with the arrival of other UAVs anticipated later in the year, including Hermes 450 in mid-June.

1171. Lt Gen Houghton wrote that "the very best case ISD" for the UK C-RAM capability to protect the COB was 31 May and it seemed "highly likely" to slip. He added: "The battle procedure to deliver this is ongoing and the system will require up to 100 personnel to support it."

1172. On 7 March, Mr Browne sent "a personal memo" to Mr Ingram and Lord Drayson about IDF.[617] He wrote:

> "IDF is an issue we have all been aware of, and striving to address, for some months now."

1173. Mr Browne noted that "significant improvements" had been made but "also, with real concern, the new estimate of the likelihood of a successful indirect fire attack" and its consequences:

> "IDF must be one of our very highest priorities. I am not convinced that our current plans are ambitious or decisive enough."

1174. Mr Browne acknowledged that, for more to be done, "people need some guidance within which to work, particularly in relation to timescales and force levels". He suggested agreement on the following assumptions:

- current plans for force levels and posture will hold for the next six months;
- for the period 6-12 months from now we will be at 4,500 in COB only;
- for the period 12-24 months from now we will be at 3,000 in COB only."

1175. Mr Browne wrote:

> "I would welcome rapid agreement from all parties on this. Once agreed I am content we programme on this basis, including finance, accepting that it is a planning assumption for the purposes of this exercise alone."

1176. Mr Browne questioned whether hardened accommodation for communal areas could be delivered earlier than the estimated timescale of 16-20 months and whether shorter-term improvements could be made in the interim: "3-6 months, preferably sooner". Options for different timings and costs should be provided quickly, "disregarding bureaucracy and standard assumptions about financial constraints".

1177. Mr Browne wrote that the Phalanx capability[618] was "a major step in the right direction" and that they should do "everything in our power, including Ministerial intervention with the US" to meet the May timescale. He asked whether that should be pursued for Basra Palace as well as the COB.

1178. Lord Drayson visited Iraq on 8 March and discussed various equipment issues in theatre, including force protection.[619] His report is detailed earlier in this Section with regard to how the UOR process worked in Iraq and protected mobility.

1179. Lord Drayson was informed by 19 Light Brigade that Merlin was performing well, "although it was not yet hot". The Lynx helicopters were unable to fly in the summer heat in Iraq and the top cover role they provided for convoys could be filled with a UAV.

1180. The visit report stated that, after visiting Basra Rural South Brigade:

> "It was made very clear that the IDF was having a significant impact on the morale of forces based at the COB … The element of chance in where IDF landed significantly increased stress level, and two people had already been sent home as a result."

1181. Lord Drayson had been told that there was no off-the-shelf design for hardened accommodation that could be applied and that there were challenges to building in Iraq. If "process impediments" were removed, then the first hardened buildings could "probably be in place in around 10 months". The US presently took 7-8 months to build hardened accommodation.

[619] Minute APS/MIN(DES) to PSSC/SofS [MOD], 26 March 2007, 'Minister(DES) Visit to Iraq'.

1182. In the meantime, theatre was about to subdivide dining areas, which would reduce the threat of a mass casualty event, and the US Sense and Warn system was "seen as a real positive" for the warning time it provided.

1183. Lord Drayson had been told how FMV surveillance was "crucial to situational awareness and counter IDF operations" but the UK was reliant on US assets. The US had recently withdrawn Apache helicopters from Basra as they had not "been used kinetically".

1184. Lord Drayson's report stated:

> "Overall there was a clear perception in theatre that UK MOD was not taking account of the rate of change. UORs too often sought to deliver a perfect capability, but in doing so delivered so late the requirement had changed or theatre were without any capability for too long. It was suggested that if there were greater dialogue between theatre and the ECC/ABW [Equipment Capability Customer/Abbey Wood[620]] on individual UORs then trades … could be made. The example quoted was of UAVs. Hermes was seen as a Rolls Royce solution to a requirement that would now be met (in a bridging capacity) by Scan Eagle, and might better have been met sooner in that way. Equally deployment of the Desert Hawk UAV was being delayed by the UK approach to airworthiness,[621] and the Raven system might have been bought more quickly. It was felt that more visits from DECs and IPTs would help …"

1185. Lord Drayson met the Commander of JHF-I and the aircrew:

> "This was a sobering meeting with the aircrew clearly very busy … and with a number of concerns about their equipment and the levels of support."

1186. Some of the concerns raised were:

- Sea King was fundamentally an old aircraft and the lift capability it provided declined in the summer.
- With Lynx and Merlin, there was a problem of spares supply and the DSPs for Merlin were still unfunded.

1187. The report ended:

> "Lord Drayson would be grateful for advice from DCDS(EC) on what can be done to improve communication between UK and theatre, and for him and CDM to reinforce the urgency that everyone should attach to delivering UORs."

Upgrading battlefield helicopters to "theatre entry standard"

Following his visit to Iraq in March 2007, Lord Drayson sought advice on why a proposal to equip more helicopters to "Theatre Entry Standard" had been deferred.[622]

An MOD official reported on 12 March that the Defence Management Board (DMB) had reserved decisions on a package of savings and enhancements until after the Comprehensive Spending Review was settled. The package included the option "to equip more battlefield helicopters with theatre entry equipment" at a cost of £260m over 10 years.

Further advice sent to Lord Drayson on 16 March explained that the proposal was to upgrade 10 Chinook, 3 Apache, 11 Lynx, 8 Merlin and 17 Sea King.[623] The increase in capability was estimated to take between six and 24 months to deliver.

Following the DMB's January decision, the proposal had not been developed further.

The Inquiry has seen no further references about taking the proposal forward.

1188. On 22 March, Lt Gen Houghton wrote to Lord Drayson requesting approval to adopt an "unusual contracting mechanism" quickly to deliver Tier 3 hardened structures at BAS.[624] That involved using a "single, trusted Prime Contractor and using proven nominated sub-contractors for discrete, complex elements of the work"; the contract would not go through a tendering process.

1189. The timescale for delivery was still 18 months but Lt Gen Houghton thought this was "a pessimistic figure" that could be reduced to 12 months once a detailed design had been agreed. There were no existing proven designs for structures that provided the level of protection sought, so design work was "breaking new ground". That also made it unwise to shorten the design and trials period, but time would be saved by adopting the single tender process.

1190. Costs were estimated at US$28m for hardening dining facilities and US$145m for hardening "accommodation etc" for 4,500 personnel.

1191. A note from Lord Drayson's Private Office on 26 April formally approved the contracting mechanism proposed by Lt Gen Houghton, but suggested that Lord Drayson had agreed it informally before that date.[625]

1192. On 29 March 2007, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms to outline UOR funding requirements for financial year 2007/08.[626] That included:

- an additional £15m plus for ECM (see earlier in this Section);
- £50m for a C-RAM system; and
- £87m plus for intelligence and surveillance capabilities for both Iraq and Afghanistan, including ISTAR enhancements.

1193. That request was sent amidst the discussions between the Treasury and the MOD on the sustainability of the UOR process, which is addressed earlier in this Section in the context of protected mobility, and in detail in Section 13.1.

1194. On 24 April, Lt Gen Houghton briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the security situation in MND(SE) had been "dominated" by an IDF attack against Basra Palace.[627] Work continued on IDF protection and Phalanx was scheduled to be in place at the COB by 31 May.

1195. In discussion, the Chiefs noted:

> "The critical need for measures to mitigate the IDF threat, both against people and equipment remained an issue of strategic importance. The risk to helicopters on the ground in particular was of concern, and while rear basing (where possible) could minimise the risk, the better option was to ensure that effective physical protection measures were in place. CJO was to conduct a rapid investigation into the provision of additional physical protection for helicopters at the COB."

1196. The Chiefs of Staff also noted that the C-RAM capability had been off-line during the IDF attack, undergoing repairs after an earlier attack. The introduction of Phalanx could not be advanced. It was agreed that Scan Eagle cover should be extended until Hermes was operational in theatre.

1197. On 11 May, Dr Sarah Beaver, Command Secretary at PJHQ, updated Lord Drayson on the procurement process for hardened accommodation at BAS.[628] She asked Lord Drayson to approve the first tranche of building work and to write to Mr Timms seeking the Treasury's agreement in principle that funding for the project could be met from the Reserve.

1198. The proposals received from the contractor quoted "some £95m" for the work, excluding VAT. The build would be done in three tranches: the first providing dining and welfare facilities for 4,500 personnel and the later two providing sleeping accommodation for up to 2,000, a hospital and gym facilities.

[627] Minutes, 24 April 2007, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

1199. The first tranche could be delivered between 31 May and 31 August 2008 and would cost £40m. The date for overall completion of the project was estimated as "by December 2009". Achieving those timescales was dependent on "long lead items" for the first tranche at a cost of £14m. That expenditure would be at risk on the core Defence budget unless the Treasury approved a call on the Reserve.

1200. Mr Browne wrote to Mr Timms on 21 May.[629] He stated that the MOD was proceeding with the £14m purchase of long lead items but would not commit further without Treasury agreement to fund from the Reserve. He added that the MOD would "negotiate a contract with suitable break clauses to allow us to reduce the project should circumstances allow and keep the overall requirement under review".

1201. Mr Timms replied on 30 May.[630] He agreed that the £14m could be taken from the Reserve but added:

> "In considering further funding, the business case for the project will need to demonstrate the continued requirement for the build once current UORs that seek to address the same indirect fire issue … are deployed and operational in the COB. In addition, we will need to be convinced that the long construction time for the project is coherent with the UK strategic timeline for maintaining troops in Iraq, and the concept of operations for troops in the COB after withdrawal from Basra City.
> "… We should treat this initial funding as a net additional cost of operations, but it is explicitly not a UOR, and should not be classified as such, given that it is investment in infrastructure and not equipment …"

1202. A Land Command paper produced on 31 August 2010 stated that, between June and September 2007, the three months before Basra Palace was handed over in September 2007 (see Section 9.6), it received over 1,000 rounds of IDF.[631]

1203. On 5 June, Lt Gen Houghton briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the next six to eight weeks would see the introduction of a number of additional C-IDF capabilities:

- UK C-RAM at BAS would reach full operating capability by 10 June.
- The US had agreed to loan five AH64 attack helicopters for an initial period of 30 days starting on 10 June.
- Counter-battery fire would be enhanced by the arrival of capability in mid-June.[632]

[632] Minutes, 5 June 2007, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

1204. Lt Gen Houghton was asked to provide the Chiefs of Staff with an analysis of the effectiveness of the counter-IDF measures one month after the UK C-RAM became fully operational.

1205. On 12 June, Lord Drayson was advised that initial operating capability for Hermes 450 would be achieved in Iraq on 25 June.[633] Additionally, 45 ground terminals had been delivered to theatres in Iraq and Afghanistan to enable FMV viewing.

1206. An annex on ISTAR UORs stated that initial operating capability for Desert Hawk 3 had been achieved in Iraq on 6 June.

1207. On 9 July, an official confirmed that the Hermes 450 had reached initial operating capability.[634]

1208. On 10 July, Lt Gen Houghton briefed the Chiefs of Staff that, between April and July 2007, there had been a "marked increase" in attacks to the COB with over 200 IDF attacks in a three-month period.[635]

1209. In his post-operation tour report, Major General Jonathan Shaw, GOC MND(SE) from January to August 2007, described the fielding of UAVs as delivering a "step change in capability" although he warned that MND(SE) still required Corps level assistance.[636] He continued:

> " … the imperative is now to integrate effectively our new UK UAVs to reduce this dependency."

1210. On 4 September, the Chiefs of Staff were briefed that the US attack helicopter had returned to Baghdad but was "available if required".[637]

1211. Major General Graham Binns, GOC MND(SE) from August 2007 to February 2008, told the Inquiry:

> "By late 2007, we had a very sophisticated method of protecting ourselves against rocket attack, which was the predominant form of attack."[638]

1212. When asked about the threat of IDF, Maj Gen Binns said it had "reduced significantly" because of the improvement in surveillance:

> "Our ability to engage those who were firing rockets at us from the air improved to such an extent that we forced them back into the town and the further away they are, the more inaccurate they are. So the whole threat of indirect fire reduced.

> It was still an irritant, but the number of casualties sustained by indirect fire reduced dramatically from August onwards."

1213. In September, the DOC undertook an "extensive review and analysis" of the UK's force protection capability in order to "expose risk, provide assurance and present strategic recommendations" to the Chiefs of Staff.[639]

1214. The review is addressed earlier in this Section with regards to protected mobility but specific points were also made about countering the IDF threat.

1215. The DOC wrote that units should have access to force protection equipment prior to pre-deployment training if possible to ensure that all personnel were adequately trained in force protection procedures and equipment (particularly UOR equipment) before arriving in theatre. The "recent Treasury decision to permit UOR procured equipment to include an allocation for training" was already having an effect but it was noteworthy that "several Commands were not aware of this significant development".

1216. On accommodation, the DOC stated that the current Tier system was "based on permanence (rather than the provision of FP)" and the nature of contemporary operations suggested that that approach might be "sub-optimal" for force protection:

> "Recent experience has indicated that the decision to move from tents to more resilient steel/concrete structures tends to be delayed by the understandable desire to limit the deployed footprint, but this should be balanced against the nature of the threat and type of operation (as well as other criteria such as FPE [Force Protection Engineering] effort, cost and the logistic burden)."

1217. Considering the IDF threat, the DOC wrote that "the most effective way of reducing the potential scale of a successful IDF attack is through a mix of good ISTAR, physical compartmentalisation and infrastructure protection together with active measures such as dominating the likely firing area through regular patrols and C-RAM-type systems".

1218. The DOC recommended: "ISTAR capability should continue to be developed to provide a consistent 24/7 stream of fused intelligence to force protection decision makers."

1219. The DOC noted that investigations into the US Sense and Warn system were under way. The Phalanx system had been deployed into theatre in May 2007 and, after "initial teething problems", its performance was improving. The likelihood of IDF being a significant threat to deployed forces in current and future operations suggested that a C-RAM capability needed to be taken into the core Equipment Programme as an enduring requirement. C-RAM measures should be included in the design phase of building a deployed base.

CONSIDERING WHETHER TO DEPLOY REAPER TO IRAQ

1220. ACM Stirrup visited Iraq from 13 to 16 May 2007.[640] Considering the IDF threat, the report of his visit stated:

> "CDS believed an armed UAV would provide the ideal platform to deliver a precision, time sensitive response whilst minimising the risks of collateral damage."

1221. Lt Gen Figgures was tasked to investigate how an armed UAV might be acquired.

1222. On 25 May, Lt Gen Figgures advised ACM Stirrup that there were three options for providing a weaponised UAV in Iraq:

- extending the Reaper programme (a UK version of Predator B) to purchase extra airframes for Iraq (the funding at this time was for three airframes all to be delivered to Afghanistan);
- asserting pressure on the US to apportion a greater proportion of Predator A hours to MND(SE); or
- investigating the possibility of weaponising Hermes 450.[641]

1223. On 12 June, Air Cdre Gordon advised Lord Drayson that the option to purchase a further nine Reaper as part of the 2007 Equipment Programme had been delayed until the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review was known.[642]

1224. The Inquiry asked ACM Stirrup if there were decisions he wished had been taken differently during his time as DCDS(EC).[643] He replied that one of the difficulties had been that pressures on the defence programme and equipment plan had meant that money was taken out of areas that needed increased investment.

1225. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry that, up until 2002, funding in ISTAR had increased by 15 percent but some of that was removed in subsequent years through savings measures. He added:

> "I also felt that we were far too slow to improve our capabilities in persistent surveillance, particularly through unmanned vehicles, and when I became CDS, one of the first things I did was to stop the arguing about whether we should purchase Reaper from the United States and tell people to go and buy it, and it is now in operation as a consequence."

1226. On 12 December, a USUR for an "armed long loiter, long range capability" was raised by MND(SE).[644] It stated that existing measures to protect against IDF and IEDs were reactive:

> "MND(SE) therefore needs a pro-active SENSE capability that will also INTERCEPT IED and IDF attacks before they can launch their attack. Rapid and decisive disruption of IED and IDF teams will also be a potential deterrent."

1227. The USUR stated that between January and October 2007:

- IED attacks had caused 21 deaths and 81 casualties.
- IDF attacks had caused five deaths and 127 casualties. The rate of attacks had abated since September but the sustained level of attacks by insurgents in the first part of the year indicated "their capability and capacity to sustain high rates of fire when the intent exists".

1228. The operational requirement was:

> "… to observe insurgents and their weapon systems (IDF/IED) across the AO [Area of Operations] over long durations and long range, which is integrated with a rapid, precision capability to engage targets once identified."

1229. The solution proposed by MND(SE) was an armed Predator B UAV.

1230. The Inquiry asked the MOD to confirm that the Predator B (Reaper) was never deployed to Iraq. The MOD stated that it was "available to the UK as a Coalition asset" but was never deployed to Iraq.[645]

THE DRAWDOWN OF UK FORCES

1231. From July 2007, the further hardening of accommodation was complicated by uncertainty surrounding the UK's position in Iraq. Mr Gordon Brown, the Prime Minister, announced plans for the military drawdown in Basra in October.

1232. On 29 July 2007, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Andy Burnham, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, requesting an additional £32m from the Reserve for hardened accommodation.[646]

1233. Mr Browne explained that the estimated total cost of the work at Basra Air Station would be £186m and work would be complete by March 2011. Due to "uncertainties on future force levels", it was proposed to approve the structures in "up to six tranches".

[646] Letter Browne to Burnham, 29 July 2007, 'Tier 3 Hardened Accommodation at the Basra Contingent Operating Base'.

1234. Mr James Quinault, Head of the Defence, Diplomacy and Intelligence spending team in the Treasury, advised Mr Burnham to "hold off" replying until September, pending decisions about the scale and duration of the UK's commitment in Basra.[647]

1235. Mr Burnham replied on 11 September 2007.[648] He recognised that the case for hardening accommodation was "compelling" if UK troops were to remain at Basra Air Station for a prolonged period, but that "the scale of additional resources committed to the project" should be agreed once there was greater clarity on the UK's posture in Basra, expected at the end of that month. He concluded:

> "It is clearly desirable that you continue to take the decisions necessary to ensure that suitable accommodation can be provided as soon as possible should UK troops remain in theatre for the foreseeable future. I understand that you are currently taking such decisions at risk of around £10m to your own budget. I think this is prudent and you should be reassured that, in the event of a decision for an early withdrawal, these sunk costs will be admissible against the Reserve."

Moving JHF-I to Kuwait

On 5 October 2007, a PJHQ official sought Mr Browne's agreement for the UK to establish a logistic support facility in Kuwait.[649] It would include the relocation of JHF-I. The minute stated:

> "The proximity of Camp Buehring to Basra (around 30 minutes flying time) allows us to de-risk the force protection of our helicopters without affecting their ability to undertake their operational tasking. A forward helicopter detachment will however remain in the COB as the Incident Response Team (IRT)."

Mr Browne agreed on 9 October.[650]

1236. On 2 October, Major General James Dutton, DCJO(Ops), briefed the Chiefs of Staff that the Tier 1 and Tier 2 builds at Basra Air Station were complete and the full Tier 3 programme would be finished in December 2009.[651] The "Enhanced Personal Bunkers project, an intermediate Tier1/2 solution" had commenced on 17 September and was known as Stonehenge.

1237. On 7 December, Mr Ian Gibson, Deputy Command Secretary at PJHQ, recommended that Mr Browne write to Mr Burnham requesting a further £65m from the Reserve for Tranche 2 of the hardened accommodation programme.[652] Tranche 2 comprised a hardened medical facility and three hardened accommodation blocks, housing a total of 900 personnel.

1238. Mr Gibson wrote that force level planning for spring 2008 suggested there would be 2,830 UK military personnel, along with supporting civilians, contractors and other "multi-national military elements", bringing the total number of personnel at Basra Air Station to 5,321. A further 745 UK military personnel would be based at the Kuwait support facility.

1239. To avoid "a situation where we failed to provide protection for personnel should UK forces remain at the COB longer than we might originally have anticipated", PJHQ's work assumed an "enduring military force of around 2,500".

1240. Mr Gibson recommended that Mr Browne should also seek £30m of the £32m currently carried at risk for the first tranche and the subject of Mr Browne and Mr Burnham's correspondence in September. The £2m "delta" reflected Treasury uncertainty that an element of the dining facility protection was required.

1241. Officials in Mr Browne's Private Office replied on 12 December, stating that Mr Browne agreed with Mr Gibson's proposal and had written to Mr Burnham accordingly.[653]

1242. The reply also highlighted that Sir Bill Jeffrey had written to Mr Browne on 11 December confirming his view that to proceed with Tranche 2 was "justifiable" but the position should be considered in the New Year, with the MOD ready to "scale the plans down" if it seemed "right to do so".

1243. On 18 December, Mr Burnham agreed to fund both elements of the request but wrote:

> "We will, however, want to think together about the balance of investment decisions to be taken on this project before I can commit to further funding … We will need to be convinced that the long construction time … is coherent with the UK strategic timeline for troop levels in Iraq, and the total numbers of people … that will be based at the COB and require protection."[654]

1244. Mr Bob Ainsworth, the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, visited Iraq from 17 to 21 December 2007.[655] The visit report stated:

> "The Minister saw for himself the effect of Operation Stonehenge – the hardening of personal bed spaces. This, like C-RAM, appeared initially to have been greeted with mixed feelings but was now generally considered to be a positive development, both in terms of protection and morale."

1245. On 15 January 2008, Lt Gen Houghton told the Chiefs of Staff that Project Stonehenge had "progressed well" and would be complete by February.[656] The third tranche of the Tier 3 hardening project was progressing and 2,100 hardened bunks would be complete by 2009, although the final decision point on this for Ministers was 20 March 2008.

1246. On 20 March, Mr Gibson advised Mr Browne to place Tranche 3 of the hardened accommodation programme on hold because of uncertainty about the UK's future presence in Iraq.[657] That tranche would have brought 1,500 further hardened bed spaces, bringing the total to 2,400. He noted that the IDF threat had recently increased and provided an analysis of the options, finally stating:

> "This is a fine call, involving judgements about force levels over a year away. It represents a significant change in emphasis in our approach to this project: in essence, rather than continuing with Tier 3 until it is proven no longer to be required, we would be deciding only to proceed with Tranche 3 once it has been demonstrated that it was required, and in doing so for the first time accepting that we will not provide Tier 3 accommodation for all at the COB as quickly as possible."

1247. Officials in Mr Browne's Private Office replied on 27 March.[658] Following discussion with ACM Stirrup and Sir Bill Jeffrey, Mr Browne had noted:

- The ongoing work on future options for the UK's long-term presence in southern Iraq was unlikely to conclude before the summer.
- There were options "under consideration" which would render Tranche 3 "unnecessary".

1248. Mr Browne agreed that the Tranche 3 programme should be placed on hold until the likely UK presence in 2009 was clearer.

[658] Minute APS/Secretary of State [MOD] to Gibson, 27 March 2008, 'Tier 3 – Update Submission'.

1249. On 30 May, Mr Gibson advised Mr Browne that the MOD should "cease to plan on the basis that Tier 3 Tranche 3 will be required and take the steps necessary to reconfigure Tranches 1 and 2" to get best value for money from the project.[659]

1250. That was because the focus on training and mentoring of Iraqi Security Forces meant there was "greater confidence" that the UK would have completed the bulk of its mission in Iraq by early 2009. Against that background, it seemed unlikely to Mr Gibson that the UK would need or wish to retain a large base at Basra Air Station.

1251. While Ministerial decisions on the timing and pace of any drawdown in 2009 were yet to be agreed, approval for Tranche 3 would be needed "now" if it were to be delivered by "October-December 2009" (at the earliest). If a bid for funding was not made before the summer, the project would not be delivered until 2010.

1252. With "very limited time", it was possible to adjust Tranches 1 and 2 into "a more coherent package, perhaps consisting of two feeding halls, the hospital plus five accommodation blocks, sufficient for a force of around 1,500". Mr Gibson advised that that was "the most pragmatic, best value for money approach without taking excessive additional risk over and above the other options currently available to us".

1253. On 26 July, Brigadier Julian Free, Commander of 4 Mechanised Brigade, assessed that the completion of enhanced individual overhead protection had "markedly increased the force protection afforded to troops on the COB" but warned that the risk of a mass casualty event still remained.[660] He implied that was because not all of the communal buildings had been hardened.

1254. On 17 October, a PJHQ official advised Mr Browne that the final structure of first tranche would be complete and operational by 20 October.[661] The other structures had come into use on 14 July, 14 August and 24 September.

1255. The second tranche was "to start coming on line in March-April 2009" but, given the plans for transition, it was unlikely that the UK would "derive significant benefit from these facilities".

1256. The US had expressed an interest in taking over structures from the first two tranches as part of their plans to move to Basra Air Station in 2009. It was estimated that £4.9m could be saved from stopping the Tranche 2 programme "now" but PJHQ judged, subject to Ministerial and Treasury approval, "it would make sense to complete the structures as part of a wider arrangement with the US regarding the transfer of responsibility in MND(SE)". That would still result in a £3.5m saving.

[661] Minute PJHQ [junior official] to PS/SofS [MOD], 17 October 2008, 'Iraq: Update on the Protected Structures Programme (Tier 3)'.

1257. While hardened accommodation would no longer be provided to 900 personnel from March to April 2009 as planned, forces would be living in the existing accommodation until drawdown. Personal overhead protection was "now fitted to every military, MOD civilian and OGD civilian's sleeping bay" and the level of IDF remained "much reduced from previous levels".

1258. On 18 November, Ms Cheryl Plumridge, Command Secretary at PJHQ, sent an update on the hardened accommodation programme to Mr John Hutton, the Defence Secretary.[662] The advice sought to re-address the issues raised in the 17 October minute, which had been withdrawn following questions from Mr Hutton's Private Office.

1259. Ms Plumridge explained that the planned adjustments to Tranche 2, to create a medical facility and accommodation blocks, had been put on hold following discussions with the US who, for its own purposes, preferred the structures to be left empty.

1260. The UK would need an agreement with the Iraqi Government to reflect the transfer of any structures to the US instead of to Iraq, assuming standard terms were agreed in the Status of Forces Agreement (see Section 9.7).

1261. Ms Plumridge wrote: "Balance of risk has been at the heart of the Tier 3 project as it has developed and Ministers have previously accepted increased risk in this area." She highlighted the cancellation of Tranche 3 and stated the revised plan would now only provide Tier 3 protection for the feeding halls.

1262. It was "extremely hard to predict the impact of not having Tier 3 accommodation" and instead relying on Stonehenge. Ms Plumridge laid out the different factors that could lead to a mass casualty event occurring and stated:

> "To put this into context, as at today's date, 45 days have passed since the last indirect fire attack on the COB – so we are currently a long way from the worst-case position."

1263. Ms Plumridge proposed that PJHQ officials would seek Treasury approval for the structures to be treated as a gift to the US, in line with the arguments set out in the 17 October minute.

1264. Mr Hutton approved Ms Plumridge's proposal on 25 November.[663]

THE REMAINING LEVELS OF HELICOPTER AND ISTAR SUPPORT IN MND(SE)

1265. On 6 December 2007, Mr Browne wrote to Mr Brown with an update on "helicopter issues".[664] He stated that there would always be demands for more helicopters on operations given "the scale and intensity of our current operational commitments".

1266. One of the principles underpinning the MOD's approach to helicopters was "to rationalise our helicopters by theatre". Mr Browne added:

> "While we are clear about the imperative to provide increased support to operations in the short term, we are also concerned not to sacrifice the future sustainability of the helicopter fleet for the immediate needs of today."

1267. Mr Browne wrote that helicopter support to operations in Iraq was "generally assessed as satisfactory" and therefore additional capability for Afghanistan was the priority.

1268. The update noted that there were five Merlin and six Lynx in Basra and there were seven helicopters in Baghdad. The Sea King fleet had been withdrawn earlier than planned because of the reduction in troop levels and the helicopters were being switched to Afghanistan, four having already been deployed.

1269. The requirement for the six Danish Merlins procured to enable the release of the Sea King fleet from Iraq had "fallen away along with our reduction in force levels there" so the possibility of deploying them to Afghanistan was under consideration.

1270. Mr Browne explained:

> "It may seem counter-intuitive that, despite the fact we have so many more helicopters in our inventory, we are able to deploy a relatively small number on operations. We are limited by the need to keep our burden on our airframes, crews and ground support staff at a sustainable level over time. As a rule of thumb, it takes three or four additional helicopters to enable the deployment of a single helicopter on operations with the remaining aircraft used for training and to enable us to rotate our deployed helicopters in and out of maintenance and to carry out essential modification programmes."

1271. Mr Browne concluded:

> "To borrow a line from David Cameron, there is no 'magic pot' of money into which we can dip in order to buy all the helicopters we might like to. We do not have access to the Treasury Reserve for the procurement of such enduring capabilities, and helicopters must compete with other pressing requirements within our hard-pressed equipment programme. Equally neither are there any helicopters currently readily available on the market which would be an obvious aspiration for us; most order books are full, and the procurement of a new helicopter type would be both costly and time-consuming.
> "That said, I can give you an assurance that, while we continue to make the most of what we have got … This is not an area where we can afford complacency.

> We shall continue to seek out opportunities to improve and enhance our deployed helicopter fleets … but I believe that we are on the right path towards an enduring and sustainable capability which will allow us to fulfil our key tasks, delivering upon our important commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan."

1272. A report of Mr Ainsworth's visit to Iraq in December 2007 stated:

> "Concerns were raised with regard to ISTAR provision, which had decreased over recent months, but which would become increasingly important in the overwatch posture; there had been successes – such as Hermes 450 – but the withdrawal of capabilities such as the Danish … helicopter and Scan Eagle were significant losses."[665]

1273. Mr Ainsworth was briefed by key personnel involved in manning and operating the C-RAM system:

> "He was reassured to hear that its success rate in interdicting IDF rounds continued to improve although he noted that there was still some way to go. He was particularly struck by the extent to which the general perception of C-RAM's capability had turned around since his last visit, with personnel at all levels praising its hugely positive impact on morale."

1274. On 9 January 2008, a junior officer in MND(SE) produced a review of ISTAR capability within MND(SE) for PJHQ.[666] He explained that the move to Provincial Iraqi Control (PIC) in the UK's AOR had:

> "… necessitated a wholesale review of ISTAR capability to support the MND(SE) mission. This has occurred at a time when there is a noticeable reduction in the ISTAR assets and capabilities provided by organic and MNC-I/Theatre platforms. This is now affecting MND(SE)'s ability to prosecute operations against irreconcilable Shia extremists and will constrain MND(SE) in delivering its missions and tasks …"

1275. The officer made a number of recommendations including bringing forward the Astor and Raptor programmes, introducing an aircraft such as Defender to enable low-level support to ground forces and the introduction of a weaponised UAV capability.

1276. The officer stated that MND(SE) could find no record of "a formal ISTAR Estimate" having been conducted and "rather an iterative approach" had been adopted, "resulting in a fragmented approach to ISTAR" that had led to capability gaps.

1277. Considering the FMV capability, the officer explained that there were "a number of Corps assets" but MND(SE) was having "less success in securing these" and two assets would be withdrawn by March 2008. He described the only assets that could be "tasked with a degree of certainty":

- Hermes 450 which suffered from technical and spares issues. It was recommended that its maintenance contract was re-negotiated to expedite the release and availability of spare parts.
- Desert Hawk 3 was heavily used and any reduction as a result of drawdown work would have a significant impact.
- Iraqi Security Forces (ISF) assets which were limited.

1278. Manned aerial surveillance assets were "extremely limited". Nimrod MR2 had been withdrawn and the use of helicopters in this role had a cost to their "lift" role.

1279. An annex to the review provided a "snapshot" of the existing MND(SE) ISTAR capability:

Table 3: ISTAR availability in MND(SE), January 2008

UK	Quantity	Provision
Broadsword	3 x [Helicopter]	[…] hours per month
Hermes 450 UAV	3 (2 more expected in January 2008)	800 hours per month
Desert Hawk 3 Mini UAV	64	10 x 1hr each day
Nimrod MR2	Principally in support of Op HERRICK, not Coalition asset	Not MND(SE) dedicated

1280. On 15 January, the Chiefs of Staff were advised that the first Hermes 450 had crashed during bad weather two days earlier and the next two were not due in service until the end of January.[667]

1281. Gen Dannatt visited Iraq from 13 to 15 January.[668] He reported:

> "I am aware that CJO is conducting a comprehensive review of ISTAR but the 25% reduction of support to MND(SE) is completely counter-intuitive at a time when we need even greater situational awareness. I think the time has come for some original thinking about how to increase our RW MAS [rotary-wing manned airborne surveillance] capability – if the Danes were able to introduce the Fennec as a low cost solution within a three month period, surely we could produce a similar package?"

1282. An internal Army lessons learned report was published on 31 August 2010, known as the "Barry Report".[669] It stated that one of the lessons for future transitions was to increase, not decrease, the ISTAR requirement:

> "As transition progresses and UK boots and eyes on the ground decrease, so there is an increased requirement for ISTAR in order to maintain the same overall level of situational awareness. The Iraq experience demonstrated that once we withdrew to the COB we lost a very large part of our situational awareness. Supporting indigenous forces with our ISTAR also enhances effectiveness and commanders' prestige and thereby maintains our ability to influence."

1283. On IDF, the Barry Report stated:

> "In 2004 MND(SE) had predicted that the IDF threat would increase … the threat was acknowledged but did not seem to result in structural force protection of our bases for some time. Although some were in very robust buildings, such as Basra Palace, the majority of troops on the COB remained in tented accommodation until very late in the campaign …"

1284. The DOC's final Op TELIC lessons report was endorsed by the Chiefs of Staff on 17 March 2010.[670] It stated that there had been a lack of an enduring intelligence picture for "at least the first four years" of the campaign and that perhaps that stemmed from "the very widely held view that, up to and throughout 2006 and into 2007, there were insufficient ISTAR assets available to MND(SE), and hence by necessity they were focused on maintaining as much of the day-to-day tactical picture as possible".

1285. The DOC wrote that it had also been suggested "that rather than there not being enough, the Coalition as a whole had sufficient ISTAR assets; but that due to a lack of in-depth understanding of the capability", the effort was "mistakenly focused on requesting ISTAR platforms rather than their product". It continued:

> "The situation was exacerbated by the lack of effective engagement by MND(SE) with MNC-I via the coalition chain of command. The result was increased requests from theatre directly to the UK for additional national ISTAR assets, which were eventually provided. Had the correct engagement of the in-theatre chain of command been followed this might have delivered the required increase in ISTAR capability far sooner."

1286. The DOC report offered the following lessons:

- "When tasking limited ISTAR assets sources, consideration of the creation and maintenance of the strategic through to the tactical picture must be undertaken."
- "When operating as part of a coalition, understanding the procedures to gain access to coalition ISTAR assets are vital; defaulting to the national route, whilst potentially easier, will probably not deliver as quickly."

[670] Report DOC, 17 March 2010, 'Operation TELIC Lessons Study Vol. 4'.

1287. In his review of the land operation in Iraq, Brig Barry wrote that "there was no effective single land sponsor for ISTAR".[671] He stated:

> "There is overwhelming evidence of a comprehensive failure to generate an adequate tactical intelligence capability to meet the requirements of tactical commanders. What capability was fielded was almost always too little too late. This appears to have resulted from significant weaknesses in almost every area of intelligence direction, collection, analysis, dissemination …"

1288. Comparing the ISTAR assets across the coalition, Brig Barry wrote that senior US officers were "astonished to find the UK so lacking" in that capability. The US were able to field platforms capable of both persistent ISTAR and armed action which improved the ability to engage fleeting targets and act as deterrent "top cover" for ground troops. The UK never had sufficient assets to do the same.

1289. On the lack of UAVs, Lt Gen Shirreff told the Inquiry that he had been told that "no more staff effort could possibly be put into deploying UAVs to South-East Iraq".[672] He thought that that was not because of the intention to draw down forces, but because the MOD "was incapable of generating the drive and energy to deliver them".

1290. Maj Gen Shaw told the Inquiry that there was always a worry that UK forces would find it difficult to respond if security in MND(SE) deteriorated.[673] He said that the problem was not so much the number of UK troops available but "it was more to do with situational awareness and intelligence".

1291. Maj Gen Shaw told the Inquiry that ISTAR was "the major issue" and that "we never got as much as we wanted". While the UOR system was a responsive one, and new equipment arrived "at a remarkable rate", Maj Gen Shaw said that UAVs were "the big equipment shortage and problem".

1292. Sir Peter Spencer, Chief of Defence Procurement from May 2003 to April 2007, told the Inquiry that ISTAR was "a classic example" of where incremental procurement was necessary.[674] He stated that anybody who "tried to envisage a big bang project which will deliver everything you need will get it wrong, because the time it takes to develop will be such that during that period all of your assumptions would have been tested and some will have changed".

1293. Sir Peter said that he thought the MOD went about trying to understand the requirement "quite well", by putting "some really good people in place who concentrated on it quite hard". The testing point came where the MOD "was invited to cancel a major project platform to pay for it".

1294. The difficulty with Watchkeeper was that "it became very political".[675] Sir Peter referred to Lord Bach's evidence before the House of Commons Defence Committee, in which Sir Peter said that Lord Bach gave an In Service Date "under political pressure" and before the requirement was properly understood.

1295. Sir Peter said that "you have to be thick-skinned enough to stand up to that pressure politely, but in a way which informs Ministers that … a short term gain here is going to lead to a lot of grief later".

1296. At the time that the MOD was debating whether to bring in the Hermes 450 UAV as a "gap filler", Sir Peter said: "there were some quite hard decisions which needed to be made in London by the military customer to decide what they want to spend the money on, because they could not have both simultaneously".[676]

1297. Sir Peter concluded:

> "The compelling lesson from all of this is if you want something quickly to work, you go for something which is available apart from anything you might need to do to integrate it to work inside your own organisation, because there will be some aspects of the way we operate UK military forces which will be different, say, from the Americans."[677]

1298. The Inquiry asked Lt Gen Figgures whether, if the Reaper UAV that was sent to Afghanistan had instead been sent to Iraq, it would have made a difference to the UK's ability to defend itself against the indirect fire threat at Basra Air Station.[678] He replied that it "could potentially have made a difference. Indeed the Hermes in 2007 and Desert Hawk I think had some success."

1299. Lt Gen Fulton acknowledged to the Inquiry that the UK should have procured its own UAV sooner than the Hermes 450 in 2007.[679]

1300. The Watchkeeper UAV was never deployed to Iraq. The MOD told the Inquiry that it came into sevice in August 2014 and was deployed in Afghanistan.[680]

1301. Asked when Watchkeeper had been scheduled to come into service, Lt Gen Fulton replied that he thought a date of 2009 to 2010 was "what people had in mind", but referred to Lord Bach's evidence to the House of Commons Defence Committee in June 2003 that it would be 2005 to 2006.[681] He added:

> "I think what that showed was not so much that they got it wrong, but a reflection of the keenness to get it in, and the wish to put pressure on not only us to work > harder but equally … we were absolutely determined that Watchkeeper was one programme that was not going to get derailed by people changing their minds midway through …"

1302. Speaking about the areas of capability in which it was not possible to invest to the extent he would have liked, Lt Gen Figgures said of ISTAR:

> "Did we anticipate the requirement we would need [to] provide coverage of areas as big as southern Iraq or as big as Afghanistan? No we didn't and therefore we had to develop that."[682]

1303. The Inquiry asked Gen Dannatt about his visit report from October 2006 where he had raised the need for greater ISTAR capability.[683] He referred to the Watchkeeper programme and said that was another example of where savings were made to the programme only to be added back later as a UOR or emergency programme:

> "Once a real operational requirement for UAVs was derived for Iraq and Afghanistan, surprise, surprise, energy was then put back into the Watchkeeper programme. Money was added back into the Watchkeeper programme. Hermes 450 … was brought forward."

1304. Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry that it was difficult to have a balanced programme of capability for future when the present was "staring you very bloodily in the face".[684] He added:

> "The trick is not to be so wrong that you can't adjust when the future reveals itself. That's what I think we should be working towards at the present moment. Absolutely funding properly what is staring us in the face, which today is Afghanistan and previously was Afghanistan and Iraq. I don't think we did that."

1305. The DOC report in March 2010 also recognised "the profound and fundamental impact" that running two medium scale operations concurrently had on resources afforded to Iraq.[685]

1306. The DOC considered the impact of the UK's decision in 2005 to return to Afghanistan and stated as a key lesson that "knowingly exceeding Defence Planning Assumptions requires the most rigorous analysis".

1307. The DOC wrote that running two concurrent, enduring medium scale operations, in excess of the Defence Planning Assumptions, had a "profound and fundamental impact on the progression of Op TELIC between 2006 and 2009". It added:

[684] Public hearing, 28 July 2010, pages 71-72.
[685] Report DOC, 17 March 2010, 'Operation TELIC Lessons Study Vol. 4'.

> "The challenges of prioritising insufficient resource, in terms of personnel, equipment, funding, planning and decision making effort, between Iraq and Afghanistan, have had a direct and negative effect on the UK's ability to carry out all its tasks and responsibilities in both campaigns. These pressures of prioritising resources between the assumed, but ultimately not achieved, rapid drawdown in requirements of Op TELIC, and the increases required over and above the initial estimate of troop numbers for Op HERRICK, were significant …"

1308. The DOC stated that the growing casualty rates in Basra in 2006 and 2007 increased public pressure on politicians to devote more resources to Iraq but by that point "there was very limited scope to reverse, or even stop troop drawdown in Iraq:

> "There had been a considerable hollowing out of capability in Basra over this period, as a consequence of the need to meet the increasing demands of Afghanistan."

1309. Speaking about balancing the two commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan, General Sir Nicholas Houghton told the Inquiry:

> "I felt in Iraq, we could deliver the strategy, with risk, with the means that were available, but it became relatively quickly evident that within Afghanistan we were not militarily in a position of strategic coherence. We did not have the means to deliver on objectives, and, therefore the requirement … to make us strategically rebalanced in Afghanistan."[686]

1310. Gen Houghton said that it was not "troop numbers per se" that was the problem, but rather the "strategic and operational enablement of them through what are rare breed capabilities" such as strategic lift, ISTAR, aviation and attack helicopters.

1311. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that he was "very concerned" about the discussions in 2004 to deploy an additional force to Afghanistan because the UK was still "heavily engaged in Iraq" and was still recuperating from its large scale operation during the invasion.[687] The view of the Chiefs of Staff was that "they could do it and it was manageable" and so Sir Kevin did not press his "objections fully".

1312. The "planning assumption" was that the UK should put itself forward because "if the UK didn't come forward, nobody else was going to". If the UK came forward, it was hoped that would create "a snowball effect", with other countries providing "support forces, helicopters, the things that we were relatively lacking in". Sir Kevin recognised that it was not possible to predict at that time, mid-2005, whether the UK would secure those commitments.

1313. Gen Jackson was asked by the Inquiry whether Ministers were advised, when they took the decision in 2004 to deploy UK forces to Afghanistan, that it would reduce their options in Iraq.[688]

[687] Public hearing, 3 February 2010, pages 14-17.
[688] Public hearing, 28 July 2010, pages 65-67.

1314. Gen Jackson replied that it was "not unreasonable" at that time to have forecast the UK's drawdown "to probably a few hundred" but the difficulty was that the timetable for Iraq did not go as planned. He said it was not possible, when the timetable did go awry, to "suddenly put up our hand and say, 'We can't do this in Afghanistan'", because it would have "severely disrupted" the whole NATO effort.

1315. Gen Jackson said the fact that the Defence Planning Assumptions "were not upheld by events" and were "almost overturned by events" demonstrated how difficult it was to predict what future capabilities were necessary.[689]

1316. The Inquiry heard evidence about how running two medium scale operations concurrently had an impact on the provision of support helicopters.

1317. Lt Gen Dutton told the Inquiry:

> "Nobody wanted to deploy any more troops … or any more helicopters. In fact, I can recall a conversation with DCDS(C) [Lt Gen Rob Fry], perhaps a slightly light-hearted one which was 'Don't, whatever you do, ask for any more helicopters'. Of course, we did end up asking for lots more helicopters and we got some more helicopters …"[690]

1318. Lt Gen Dutton added:

> "Given the circumstances at the time and the helicopters that we had in the inventory, I certainly felt that they [PJHQ] … were doing their best to provide, if not more helicopters and crews, more hours because … that's just as valuable if you can fly the aircraft for longer and have the spares to allow you to do the servicing to allow that."[691]

1319. The Inquiry asked Lord Drayson what advice he had received on the ability of the UK's support helicopter force to support the operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Lord Drayson wrote:

> "I was advised that, although the UK's helicopter force was under pressure due to the decision taken in 2004 under Medium Term Workstrand to remove funding, increased provision of flying hours and the deployment of additional aircraft, the battlefield helicopter requirements in Iraq and Afghanistan were being met (e.g.VCDS minute to SofS 7 Sept [2006] refers.). This however was not the impression I gained following my visits to theatre. Again I found myself having to get senior officers together to try to reach agreement on whether there was a requirement, and if so, what it was. Even when we were in the process of strengthening our helicopter capability in 2006/7 the view of the military was there > was no requirement in Afghanistan for more helicopters at the time, just a utility to having more helicopters so we could meet future requirements. The military view was also that there was no requirement for a new small helicopter."[692]

1320. Asked if he was concerned whether the MOD had an insufficient number of support helicopters capable of being deployed in the threat environment of Iraq, Lord Drayson wrote:

> "Yes … However it was difficult to get the military to agree on the requirement. Helicopters specifically were not seen as the responsibility of any particular service and therefore suffered from the lack of a 'service champion'. It was not believed that helicopters could be procured quickly …"

1321. ACM Torpy disagreed with Lord Drayson's view on helicopter ownership and prioritisation. He told the Inquiry that the Joint Helicopter Command did have advocates and champions:

> "Actually it was owned by a single service. It was operational command CINC Land Forces … So there was an advocate for Joint Helicopter Command, and if I look at the interest that the three Chiefs took in Joint Helicopter Command it was pretty key."[693]

1322. The Inquiry asked ACM Stirrup for his view of the helicopter situation during his time as Chief of the Air Staff, from 2003 to 2006. He replied that it "was not a significant issue" in Chiefs of Staff discussions during that time.[694] There was a requirement to make modifications as lessons were learned, but "there was no sense that … we needed – urgently needed twice as many helicopters than we had, although it was quite clear that we could always have used more".

1323. ACM Stirrup told the Inquiry that, between 2006 and 2009, when he was Chief of the Defence Staff, the constraint on the helicopter fleet was twofold:

> "First was we had eight Chinooks sitting in a shed unable to fly. That is a significant percentage of the total Chinook force …
> "Secondly, we were operating in two theatres, which was well beyond our planning assumptions and although it was a strain to generate sufficient infantry battalions for the rotation between the two theatres, the really critical elements were the enablers. They were the strategic and tactical mobility. They were the helicopters, they were the ISTAR, they were all of those specialist areas that are so important for any operation, wherever it is and whatever it is."[695]

1324. The Inquiry asked Gen O'Donoghue whether increasing the flying hours of helicopters sooner would have made sure that more were available in Iraq. Gen O'Donoghue replied that it took time to do because more spares would have to be acquired to fly the helicopters and maintenance schedules had to be adjusted.[696]

1325. Gen O'Donoghue said that there were a number of factors to consider when looking at whether to procure a new type of helicopter, including the procurement cost, the cost of certifying airworthiness, what changes were necessary to meet the theatre entry standard and what was best to bring into service alongside existing models.

The £1.4bn reduction in helicopter spending

The majority of witnesses to the Inquiry said that the decision to reduce helicopter funding by £1.4bn in 2004 had not had an effect on what was available for Iraq.

Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that he did not believe that earlier funding decisions about the Equipment Programme were "relevant" to helicopter availability in Iraq.[697] That was because of the lead time for any new helicopters to come into service.

Speaking about the Spending Review settlement in 2004, Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the MOD preserved resources for Iraq and made cuts in the areas considered least likely to be called upon.[698] He said that it was "very difficult" to say that it had had a long-term impact on operations in Iraq and Afghanistan because the savings were made in forward programmes, such as with helicopters.

The Inquiry asked Sir Peter Spencer if the £1.4bn reduction in 2004 had affected the number of helicopters available in Iraq.[699] Sir Peter replied that he was unable to comment on that specifically because he was not involved in the support of those helicopters but did state that it was an example of how the MOD had to decide what its priorities were:

> "[It] goes back to the fundamental issue at the heart of all of this, which is being more realistic about what the money would actually buy you and to just accept that you can't have every toy in the shop."

Lt Gen Fulton indicated that the spending reduction did not have an impact on Iraq as it affected amphibious and light helicopter procurement rather than support helicopters which is what commanders relied upon for troop transport:

> "So for very good reasons, all the reasons you identify, whilst the £1.4bn cut to the helicopter budget was profoundly unwelcome, it had no effect at all on anything to do with Iraq."[700]

Gen Jackson said of the 2004 funding cut that he thought "some of the difficulties with helicopters stem from that decision" as well as the procurement difficulties with the eight Chinook Mk3s.[701]

In March 2011, the MOD told the Inquiry:

> "Had SABR [Support Amphibious Battlefield Helicopter programme] continued, the earliest delivery of new Chinooks would have been after the end of UK operations in Iraq, so the Department does not assess that the removal of £1.4 billion from the helicopter programme affected the availability of support helicopters for operations in Iraq."[702]

1326. The Inquiry was told that the Treasury was not an obstruction in the UOR process but there were difficulties with the flexibility of the MOD's budget.

1327. Mr Ingram told the Inquiry:

> "… everything had to be finely justified and there was constant tussles with the Treasury in all of that as to whether it was a UOR or whether it should come from core expenditure …"[703]

1328. Lt Gen Fulton told the Inquiry this process was one whereby "we had to try to find the money ourselves and if we couldn't find the money then we went to the Treasury for UORs once Iraq had started".[704]

1329. Lt Gen Figgures described a process of rigorous scrutiny of requirements which involved "some tough negotiation".[705] He told the Inquiry:

> "We were given considerable sums of money over the period of time that I filled my appointment to make that case. Whether it was helicopters or protective mobility, defensive aid suites, all of those where we made the case were funded, but it was – they were very rigorous in their scrutiny of the case we put forward, and you could as a taxpayer say, well, yes, they should be. As a soldier it was hard work producing the evidence to get past that scrutiny."[706]

1330. Lt Gen Figgures added:

> "When it came to the urgent operational requirements, if we could identify requirement, justify it, have a reasonable idea of what it might cost, deliver it in an acceptable time-frame, then the Treasury would give us the money for it …"

1331. Asked whether he had sufficient resources to fund the equipment he thought was relevant to operations in Iraq, Lt Gen Fulton told the Inquiry that the starting point was that The Strategic Defence Review was not properly funded to deliver what it was supposed to.[707] That meant that the MOD was left with "an equipment capability that existed within but did not fill the defence planning requirement".

1332. Lord Drayson told the Inquiry:

> "I actively stressed the importance of addressing the deficiencies of equipment on operations following my visits to theatre and feedback from front line reports. However the opportunities to redirect resources from core Equipment Programme were limited by the inherent resistance in the system to changes to the core Equipment Programme outside the annual planning rounds. It was very difficult to reach agreement on the re-prioritisation of resources as there was no flexibility in the budget. It required a push from me to do this. I also asked for the Department to look at rationalising the equipment programme to create a 10-15% head-room for reprioritisation to meet short-term operational requirements."[708]

1333. Asked how effective the MOD's efforts were to draw on core Equipment Programme funding to support ongoing operations, Lord Drayson wrote:

> "… the Services were concerned that their long term programmes would be cannibalised and lose funding to short term operational needs … it was quite unusual for core equipment funding to be redirected to operational needs. This only happened when the military had a strong desire for it …"

Introduction

1. This Section addresses conclusions in relation to the evidence set out in Section 14.1, including:

- where there was a failure to address capability gaps in equipment; and
- the impact of running two medium scale operations concurrently.

2. This Section does not address conclusions in relation to:

- how equipment was funded, which is addressed in Section 13.2;
- the failure to ensure that the UK was adequately prepared for post-conflict Iraq contingencies, which is addressed in Section 6.5;
- MOD operational policy, or judgements on the specific circumstances in which individuals lost their lives in Iraq; and
- the MOD's procedure for supporting those killed or injured in Iraq, which is addressed in Section 16.4.

Key findings

- Between 2003 and 2009, UK forces in Iraq faced gaps in some key capability areas, including protected mobility, Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR) and helicopter support.
- It was not sufficiently clear which person or department within the MOD had responsibility for identifying and articulating capability gaps.
- Delays in providing adequate medium weight Protected Patrol Vehicles (PPVs) and the failure to meet the needs of UK forces in Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE)) for ISTAR and helicopters should not have been tolerated.
- The MOD was slow in responding to the developing threat in Iraq from Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs). The range of protected mobility options available to commanders in MND(SE) was limited. Although work had begun before 2002 to source an additional PPV, it was only ordered in July 2006 following Ministerial intervention.
- Funding was not a direct barrier to the identification and deployment of additional solutions to the medium weight PPV gap. But it appears that the longer-term focus of the Executive Committee of the Army Board (ECAB) on the Future Rapid Effect System (FRES) programme inhibited it from addressing the more immediate issue related to medium weight PPV capability.
- The decision to deploy troops to Afghanistan had a material impact on the availability of key capabilities for deployment to Iraq, particularly helicopters and ISTAR.

Addressing post-invasion capability gaps

Defining the capabilities required

The 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR) defined the military capabilities needed by the Armed Forces. It concluded that the UK needed a more effective expeditionary capability, including "deployable and mobile" forces, with "sufficient protection and firepower for war-fighting".[1] As a result, the MOD established a requirement for a family of vehicles to replace existing medium weight armoured vehicles. That was to be delivered through the Future Rapid Effect System (FRES) programme which was expected to be in service towards 2010.

The 1998 SDR also emphasised the importance of developing an enhanced Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR) capability.

In 2002, the MOD published The Strategic Defence Review: A New Chapter; an update on the SDR's progress and a consideration of the "UK's defence posture and plans" in light of the 9/11 attacks.[2] A New Chapter again stressed the importance of ISTAR assets: the MOD would accelerate the Watchkeeper programme which was designed to deliver an Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV). That capability was expected in "2005-06".[3] There were very few similar capabilities that could be deployed in the interim. By 2003, the expeditionary capability defined by the 1998 SDR was not yet in place.

A number of witnesses suggested to the Inquiry that the MOD had not been given the resources to acquire the full range of capabilities specified by the SDR. The Inquiry has not reached a view on that point. Decisions made by the MOD on the balance of investment between immediate operational requirements and future defence programmes in delivering the capabilities set out in the SDR fall outside the Inquiry's Terms of Reference.

Countering the IED threat

3. By the end of April 2003, barely a month after the invasion, UK forces began to face a threat from Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs). In July and August, more sophisticated devices were being used with increasing frequency against Coalition Forces.

4. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) predicted that the IED threat was likely to increase and continue to evolve rapidly. That was clearly indicated in its Assessments of 3 September 2003, 25 September 2003 and 5 November 2003.

5. On 1 September, a Forces and Resources Review reported that the IED threat was being "countered by the use of stripped-down Land Rovers with top cover sentries".[4] It recommended that protection would be improved by the deployment of armoured 4x4 vehicles.

6. The Protected Patrol Vehicle (PPV) Working Group discussed how to meet that requirement on 5 September 2003. It was clear that the MOD had few options for the rapid supply of an armoured 4x4 vehicle. Large numbers of Snatch Land Rovers were already in service in Northern Ireland and were therefore available for deployment. There was no other vehicle that could be readily deployed without modification or without considerable cost. The MOD therefore decided to dispatch 180 Snatch Land Rovers to Iraq.

7. Several witnesses to the Inquiry referred to working with "what you've got" and told the Inquiry that the Snatch Land Rover was preferable to a completely unprotected vehicle. The Snatch Land Rover had not been designed, however, for the conditions found in Iraq; and by 2002 it was at the end of its planned life in service. No programme to replace it had been agreed.

8. The Snatch Land Rover was therefore not an optimal solution to the urgent requirement for an armoured PPV, but was the best available stop-gap. Given the need for rapid replacement of completely unprotected vehicles, the decision to deploy 180 Snatch Land Rovers was fully justifiable. However; this should have been recognised as no more than an interim solution. Work to find a more effective vehicle for Iraq and similar environments in the longer term should have been put in hand.

9. The Snatch Land Rover was modernised and made more suitable for the weather and terrain of Iraq in several conversion programmes. Because the chassis was incapable of carrying the weight of additional armour the enhancements which could be made to its level of physical protection were limited.

10. The hardening of a vehicle, or any other type of equipment, is only one component of its protection. Throughout Operation TELIC, the UK also deployed a suite of other measures to counter the IED threat, including aerial surveillance, electronic countermeasures, the deployment and up-armouring of heavier tracked vehicles, tactical changes and intelligence-based targeting of the perpetrators.

11. The first IED attack using an Explosively Formed Projectile (EFP) took place in May 2004. In July 2004, the Defence Intelligence Staff stated that the presence and use of EFPs in attacks against the Multi-National Force in Iraq was "a significant force protection issue".[5]

12. The MOD's Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC) concluded in February 2005 that the Snatch Land Rover conversion programme had been "a belated reaction" to the IED threat and that sustained investment was necessary to "provide sufficient protected mobility for operations in hostile environments such as Iraq".[6]

[6] Report DOC, 22 February 2005, 'Operation TELIC Lessons Study Vol. 2'.

13. By May 2005, the IED threat had increased significantly. Commanders in Multi-National Division South-East (MND(SE)) had a choice of two vehicles in which they could conduct routine patrols: the Snatch Land Rover or the Warrior Armoured Fighting Vehicle. Those two vehicles were at opposite ends of the protected mobility spectrum, with very different characteristics and availability.

14. Lieutenant General James Dutton, General Officer Commanding MND(SE) from June 2005 to December 2005, explained to the Inquiry that towards the end of 2005 all movement was conducted by air or in convoys protected by armoured vehicles. That constrained wider UK operations, including the Security Sector Reform (SSR) effort, because military personnel, police officers and civilian personnel were frequently not able to move around MND(SE).

15. The impact of limited mobility on SSR was regularly raised in meetings of the Chiefs of Staff and the reports of those who visited Iraq (see Section 12.1). The impact of protective security measures on civilians' ability to carry out their jobs effectively is described in Section 15.1.

16. In June 2006, Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, Chief of Joint Operations, reported that troops could "manage Snatch – just, but they have no inherent confidence in it".[7] Questions were asked in Parliament about what the MOD was doing to ensure the best possible protection of its troops.

17. The Inquiry recognises that there is not always a solution to an evolving threat and that, depending on the sophistication of the device and the way in which a vehicle is hit, any vehicle can be vulnerable to attack.

Requirement for a medium weight PPV

18. In June 2006, Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, commissioned a review of armoured vehicles in Iraq. The review led to the identification of a requirement for a medium weight PPV for deployment to Iraq.

19. The MOD decided to procure 108 Cougar vehicles which were modified for use on UK operations. The modified vehicle was called the Mastiff.

20. The Cougar vehicle had been in service with the US Army since 2004. The British Army had also deployed a Cougar variant to Bosnia in 2003/04.

21. The Mastiff was a wheeled PPV offering better protection than Snatch, but, because of its size, was not suitable for all patrol tasks. Although it was not an ideal solution, Mastiff was positively received by troops in Iraq. The first four Mastiffs had reached Iraq by 30 December 2006.

[7] Minute Houghton to PSO/CDS, 16 June 2006, 'Visit to Iraq 13 – 15 Jun 06'.

22. In April 2008, the Equipment Capability branch (EC) in MND(SE) (the formation of which is described below) produced an Urgent Statement of User Requirement (USUR) for an "Urban PPV". The Ridgback (which was also a variant of Cougar) was ordered to meet the requirement but did not enter service in time for use in Iraq.

23. Neither vehicle was a replacement for the Snatch Land Rover and Ministers continued to receive advice that Snatch remained "mission critical"[8] in Iraq and Afghanistan because of its profile, manoeuvrability and carrying capacity. Lt Gen Houghton considered that removing it from theatre would have a significant impact on operations by reducing patrols' situational awareness and restricting movement.

A FAILURE TO ARTICULATE THE REQUIREMENT

24. MOD officials explained to Mr Browne on 21 July 2006 that work was ongoing within the department to source a medium weight PPV and that the armoured vehicle review had accelerated the work by securing additional funding.

25. The Inquiry has considered why it took so long to fill a capability gap that was apparent from the end of 2003.

26. Within the MOD and the Armed Forces the responsibility for meeting an equipment capability gap during Op TELIC was clear: USURs for new equipment were forwarded to the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ), which retained ownership of the USUR until it was signed off.

27. What was unclear was where responsibility lay for identifying and articulating capability gaps. Because a USUR could be raised by "any user",[9] there was no single individual or team accountable if an essential USUR was not raised. That was a failure of the system. In a statement to the Inquiry, the MOD said that there was "no simple answer to the question where the primary responsibility for identifying capability gaps and raising USURs lay" during the post-invasion phase.

28. The evidence suggests that this was not a problem in every instance. When a gap was clearly identified and there was an appetite to address it, action was taken. That was demonstrated by the deployment of electronic countermeasures and enhancements for the protection of Warrior and FV430 vehicles.

29. An analysis of the land operation in Iraq published in August 2010 (known as "the Barry Report") stated that a requirement was more likely to be identified, and the subsequent Urgent Operational Requirement (UOR) to succeed, where there was "a strong coherent sponsor in the Army or MOD".[10]

[10] Report Land Command, 31 August 2010, 'Operations in Iraq: An Analysis From a Land Perspective'.

30. The Barry Report suggested that, where UORs succeeded, "some of these were the result of 'pull' from theatre, others the result of 'push' from equipment staff in the MOD. The latter was the case with Mastiff, the requirement for which was formulated in London."[11]

31. As the Box 'Attempts to articulate the PPV requirement' below describes, there were repeated references within the MOD to lack of a coherent strategy and the absence of what was known as a "Customer Two lead":[12] someone whose role it was to identify such a requirement from the perspective of a 'user'. In the absence of a strong sponsor, defining the PPV requirement failed to make progress for three years.

32. Before June 2006, the MOD's consideration of protected mobility lacked the leadership that was ultimately injected by Mr Browne's armoured vehicle review and driven forward by Lord Drayson, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State and Minister for Defence Procurement.

Attempts to articulate the PPV requirement

The 1998 Strategic Defence Review did not identify a requirement for a light or medium weight PPV for expeditionary operations.

The PPVs in service with the Army in 1998, primarily to meet the requirements of operations in Northern Ireland, were Tavern and the Snatch Land Rover. The Out of Service Date for the Snatch Land Rover was 2002.

January 2002 – A draft Urgent Statement of User Requirement (USUR) for the replacement of the Snatch Land Rover was produced (Project DUCKBOARD).

July to September 2003 – The MOD held two workshops and produced an operational analysis of the requirement but stated that further work was needed to articulate it.

February 2004 – Funding re-profiled to bring forward the delivery of 80 vehicles from 2007 to 2004.

31 March 2004 – A requirement for an expeditionary vehicle to be deployed to the "rest of the world" was identified but the MOD stated further work was needed to define it. It became known as the Type B vehicle.

June 2004 – The Executive Committee of the Army Board (ECAB) was advised of a need for a coherent plan to deliver protected mobility for both Iraq and Afghanistan.

7 July 2004 – The MOD identified a requirement for three separate vehicle projects, including the Type B vehicle, but described the way forward as "beset with unresolved issues"[13] including a lack of definition over the capabilities required and number of vehicles needed.

15 October 2004 – A strategy for delivering the three projects was produced but there was still no concept of operations or a clear Customer Two lead.

27 October 2004 – A Statement of Requirement (SOR) for all three projects was raised, including the number of vehicles required.

21 February 2005 – A revised SOR for a Type B vehicle was raised as a result of funding allocated through the Equipment Programme.

7 July 2005 – The Investment Approvals Board (IAB) approved a business case to upgrade the remaining Snatch Land Rovers to the latest variant but cautioned that it had still not seen any operational analysis to support a way forward.

November 2005 – ECAB discussed concerns about the state of protected mobility for UK forces.

January 2006 – ECAB decided to approach Lord Drayson with concerns about the armoured vehicle fleet following a meeting that had focused on further delays to the FRES programme.

3 March 2006 – A USUR and business case for the first tranche of Type B expeditionary Vector vehicles was submitted. Those vehicles were intended for deployment to Afghanistan.

26 June 2006 – Mr Browne announced an armoured vehicle review.

5 July 2006 – Lord Drayson sought clear confirmation from Lt Gen Houghton as to whether there was a requirement for a medium weight armoured PPV.

7 July 2006 – Lt Gen Houghton confirmed the requirement for a medium weight PPV. Lord Drayson sought further advice that same day about the number of vehicles necessary to meet current operational requirements.

19 July 2006 – Lt Gen Houghton produced the USUR for a medium weight PPV.

24 July 2006 – Mr Browne announced the outcome of the review.

ATTEMPTS TO IMPROVE THE PROCESS FOR IDENTIFYING REQUIREMENTS

33. The Inquiry recognises that, during the period covered by its Terms of Reference, there were a number of attempts to improve the process through which equipment requirements were identified and articulated.

34. Attempts to make improvements to the process began in 2005.

35. In February 2005, an Equipment Capability (EC) branch was created in theatre. It enhanced communication between those in need of new capabilities and those who helped to articulate the requirements, although there was some lack of clarity regarding the EC cell's precise role.

36. In November 2006, Lt Gen Houghton recognised that the UK needed "to improve our processes for identifying the EC dimension of emerging theatre CONOPS [concept of operations] which lay in the domain of the early years of the EP [Equipment Programme] rather than in the UOR process."[14]

[14] Minute CJO to MA/VCDS, 9 November 2006, 'Emerging Capability Requirements'.

37. In March 2007, the report of a visit to Iraq by Lord Drayson, then the Minister of State for Defence Equipment and Support, prompted work to improve communication channels between the MOD and theatre.

38. Lord Drayson reported that "overall there was a clear perception in theatre that the UK MOD was not taking account of the rate of change. UORs too often sought to deliver a perfect capability, but in doing so delivered so late the requirement had changed or theatre were without any capability for too long".[15] He suggested that "greater dialogue" between theatre and the Equipment Capability Customer could help to address the issue.

39. In September 2007, following an "extensive review and analysis"[16] of the UK's force protection capability, the DOC concluded that management of force protection risk must be based "on a thorough identification of strategic and operational threats to ensure that a balance of research, investment and training was achieved commensurate with the threat".

40. As a result, a force protection policy was produced in November 2007 which sought to apply a standard approach to the risk assessment of force protection and lay out the respective roles and responsibilities across the MOD.

41. The MOD told the Inquiry that the force protection policy in use in 2015 "defines risk ownership and governance more clearly than its predecessors"[17] and that the policy had been integrated into wider MOD risk management processes which had also been revised.

FUNDING AND THE FUTURE RAPID EFFECT SYSTEM (FRES)

42. Lord Drayson told the Inquiry that he believed "the Army's difficulty in deciding upon a replacement to Snatch was in part caused by their concern over the likelihood of FRES budgets being cut to fund a Snatch replacement vehicle".[18]

43. Although the Inquiry has identified issues concerning clarity of responsibility and communication, it has not found evidence to suggest that funding was a direct barrier to the identification and deployment of additional solutions to the PPV capability gap.

44. It is possible, however, that the need to preserve funding for the Future Rapid Effect System (FRES) programme influenced decisions on the requirement for PPVs.

45. The FRES programme remained distinct from meeting the requirement for an appropriate PPV in Iraq. FRES was never intended to be in service until towards 2010. However, a number of witnesses to the Inquiry made the point that, within a finite budget, resources for an additional requirement would have to be found from elsewhere in the defence programme (except when provided from UORs or USURs funded by a claim on the Reserve – see Section 13.1). Sir Peter Spencer, Chief of Defence Procurement from May 2003 to April 2007, told the Inquiry that using money from the capital Equipment Programme to deal with the short term had "a fratricidal effect"[19] on the ability to move the FRES programme forward.

46. The focus of the Executive Committee of the Army Board (ECAB) on the FRES programme may therefore provide a partial explanation for the lack of urgency in addressing the more immediate problem of the PPV capability gap. Another likely factor was an over-optimistic assumption about the timing of withdrawal from Iraq. The expectation of an early withdrawal from Iraq inhibited action on an expensive programme that might not be completed before troops left.

Intelligence, Surveillance, Target Acquisition and Reconnaissance (ISTAR)

47. The MOD was aware before 2003 that it needed to broaden the capabilities available for collecting strategic, operational and tactical intelligence. A clear capability gap for an Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV) to be directed by commanders on the ground had been identified. The longer-term solution was a programme known as Watchkeeper, expected to be introduced in 2005 to 2006.

48. From March 2003, the Phoenix UAV was available to commanders in theatre. It performed well during the invasion but could only be used between November and April because it was not designed to operate in high temperatures.

49. For the first four years of Op TELIC, the lack of ISTAR capabilities constrained military operations. The final DOC report on Op TELIC in March 2010 stated that an enduring intelligence picture had been lacking for "at least the first four years"[20] because "up to and throughout 2006 and into 2007, there were insufficient ISTAR assets available to MND(SE), and hence by necessity they were focused on maintaining as much of the day-to-day tactical picture as possible".

50. There is evidence that the MOD took two steps which did not adequately meet the capability gap:

- A "mini UAV", Desert Hawk 1, was introduced in December 2003. Because of technical limitations it was only in theatre for a very short period.
- A Combined Joint Predator UAV Task Force (CJPTF) was created with the US in January 2004 but the UK's requests for access to the capability were often not met.

[20] Report DOC, 17 March 2010, 'Operation TELIC Lessons Study Vol. 4'.

51. As Major General William Rollo, General Officer Commanding MND(SE) (GOC MND(SE)) from July 2004 to December 2004, reported at the end of his tour, the consequence of that capability gap was that operations were "planned around ISTAR availability, rather than ISTAR being available for operations".[21]

52. The DOC raised the problem in its three reports covering the post-conflict phase, each of which was discussed by the Chiefs of Staff.

53. In February 2005, the DOC stated that ISTAR was "the most significant capability shortfall" of the post-conflict phase and it was "likely to remain an enduring requirement, particularly for asymmetric warfare".[22]

54. In April 2006, the DOC stated that "a serious gap in current ISTAR capability" had been "a regular DOC observation" that had "been highlighted on all recent operations".[23] That prompted a more wide-ranging debate across the MOD about how the ISTAR capability gap could be addressed.

55. As in the case of protected mobility, the MOD was slow to respond to the deficiencies identified in ISTAR and showed a lack of understanding of the requirement for an enduring operation. The provision of ISTAR capabilities also suffered from the absence of a clearly identified sponsor addressing the capability gap.

56. Lt Gen Houghton's review of ISTAR shortfalls in May 2006 stated that the UK was "only beginning to develop a full understanding of the national ISTAR requirements" for transition in both Iraq and Afghanistan.[24]

57. Major General Richard Shirreff, GOC MND(SE) from June 2006 to January 2007, wrote in his post-operation report that the UK's response was "grindingly slow and ponderous" when compared with the US and Australia. They had shown more "agility and forethought" in identifying solutions.[25]

58. The position improved when the Scan Eagle UAV was leased from Australia in April 2007 as a temporary measure until Hermes 450 came into service in July 2007.

The pressure of running two medium scale operations concurrently

59. In 2002, an MOD review of the 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR) reaffirmed that the UK's Armed Forces were not equipped to support two enduring medium scale military operations at the same time:

> "Since the SDR we have assumed that we should plan to be able to undertake either a single major operation (of a similar scale and duration to our contribution to the Gulf War in 1990-91), or undertake a more extended overseas deployment on a lesser scale (as in the mid-1990s in Bosnia), while retaining the ability to mount a second substantial deployment … if this were made necessary by a second crisis. We would not, however, expect both deployments to involve war-fighting or to maintain them simultaneously for longer than 6 months."[26]

60. Between 2004 and 2006, the MOD regularly made reference to the impact that an additional deployment would have on key capabilities available for Iraq. Choices would have to be made in deploying a finite level of capability.

61. When the Defence and Overseas Policy Sub-Committee of Cabinet agreed in July 2005 to deploy around 2,500 personnel to Helmand province, Afghanistan, the UK was still engaged in a medium scale operation in Iraq. As set out in Section 9.8, the assumptions about when personnel might be withdrawn from Iraq were high risk.

62. In March 2010, the DOC recognised that running two medium scale operations concurrently had had a "profound and fundamental impact" on resources afforded to Iraq.[27] It concluded that "knowingly exceeding Defence Planning Assumptions requires the most rigorous analysis". The Inquiry has not seen evidence of such analysis.

63. It is difficult to determine whether or not Ministers adequately appreciated what the July 2005 decision to deploy to Helmand meant for the capabilities available for Iraq. There were discussions about the over-stretch and pinch-points in provision but those were no substitute for the "rigorous analysis" to which the DOC referred.

64. Decisions were not based on a realistic assessment of the likely duration of either operation and were consequently flawed.

65. One example was the decision not to harden accommodation for British troops in Iraq in March 2005. That decision was supported by balanced and pragmatic advice but the UK's optimistic assessment of how soon operations in Iraq would conclude affected its analysis of the requirement. That meant that the issue had to be re-opened three years later when it was too late for the matter to be addressed in an appropriate and cost-effective way.

SUPPORT HELICOPTERS

66. The availability of support helicopters in MND(SE) was constantly stretched because of two factors.

67. The first was that support helicopters were used to supplement other shortfalls. Support helicopters were needed to move personnel by air when circumstances were too dangerous for ground transport. However, the same helicopters were also required for surveillance in the absence of sufficient ISTAR capability.

68. That meant that commanders were faced with a conflict between two requirements, and the need to compromise effectiveness.

69. As General Sir Richard Dannatt, Commander in Chief Land Command, wrote, there is an "inextricable" link between ISTAR, protected mobility and helicopters: "When the two former capabilities are under stress … we invariably place a higher call on the latter."[28]

70. The second factor was Afghanistan. Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, Chief of the Air Staff, anticipated in February 2004 that support helicopters would be "seriously stretched"[29] by increased involvement in Afghanistan. His prediction was borne out.

71. Reports from Iraq in the second half of 2005 stressed the need for more helicopters. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, stated in October that the fleet was "creaking badly".[30] In December, Major General James Dutton, GOC MND(SE) between June 2005 and December 2005, wrote that "the simple fact is that we need more helicopters (and aircrew) urgently".[31]

72. The DOC wrote in April 2006 that capacity had "become parlous at times during 2005".[32] It added that the Joint Helicopter Force (Iraq) had "struggled to meet its tasks even with rigorous prioritisation" and the UK's battlefield helicopter force "was stretched to meet the requirement of the current operation".

73. In June 2006, Lt Gen Houghton stated that there was an endorsed requirement to increase helicopter provision for Afghanistan but not for Iraq. He acknowledged that operations had at times been constrained by a lack of helicopter support. Lt Gen Houghton concluded:

> "With no reductions on the horizon in Op TELIC and escalating requirements in Op HERRICK [Afghanistan], our national aviation requirements now need departmental scrutiny to determine the concurrent requirement to resource both theatres and define how our national aviation resources should be realigned."[33]

74. Mr Browne and Lord Drayson intervened in August 2006. Lord Drayson told the Inquiry that he had asked Mr Browne to authorise him "to explore whether helicopters could be found quickly and to worry about how they would be funded after we had identified a possible solution".[34]

75. An exchange between Mr Browne and General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, Vice Chief of the Defence Staff, on 7 September illustrated how Ministers injected urgency into addressing equipment shortfalls. When Gen Granville-Chapman suggested that options to add capability would be considered in October, Mr Browne responded: "No: it should happen tomorrow!"[35]

76. That prompted a review of what short-term relief could be offered to improve helicopter availability. In December 2007, Mr Browne wrote that helicopter support to Iraq was "generally assessed as satisfactory"[36] and that the priority was therefore Afghanistan. The Inquiry has not seen any evidence to suggest that that assessment was reconsidered for the remainder of Op TELIC.

Lessons

77. In deciding to undertake concurrent operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, the UK knowingly exceeded the Defence Planning Assumptions. All resources from that point onwards were going to be stretched. Any decision which commits the UK to extended operations in excess of the Defence Planning Assumptions should be based on the most rigorous analysis of its potential implications, including for the availability of relevant capabilities for UK forces.

78. At the start of Op TELIC, the MOD knew that it had capability gaps in relation to protected mobility and ISTAR and that either could have a significant impact on operations. Known gaps in such capabilities should always be clearly communicated to Ministers.

79. The MOD should be pro-active in seeking to understand and articulate new or additional equipment requirements. The MOD told the Inquiry that there was no simple answer to the question of where the primary responsibility for identifying capability gaps lay during Op TELIC. That is unacceptable. The roles and responsibilities for identifying and articulating capability gaps in enduring operations must be clearly defined, communicated and understood by those concerned. It is possible that this has been addressed after the period covered by this Inquiry.

80. Those responsible for making decisions on the investment in military capabilities should continually evaluate whether the balance between current operational requirements and long-term defence programmes is right, particularly to meet an evolving threat on current operations.

81. During the first four years of Op TELIC, there was no clear statement of policy setting out the level of acceptable risk to UK forces and who was responsible for managing that risk. The MOD has suggested to the Inquiry that successive policies defining risk ownership and governance more clearly have addressed that absence, and that wider MOD risk management processes have also been revised. In any future operation the level of force protection required to meet the assessed threat needs to be addressed explicitly.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- planning and preparation for the deployment of UK civilian personnel to Iraq;
- the recruitment and deployment of civilian personnel between 2003 and 2009;
- duty of care and protective security measures;
- recognition of service;
- support to locally engaged (LE) staff; and
- skills and seniority.

2. This Section does not consider:

- the recruitment, deployment or impact of UK police officers in Iraq, addressed in Section 12;
- the contribution of civilian personnel to the reconstruction of post-conflict Iraq, addressed in Section 10;
- the funding of civilian deployments, including the cost of protective security measures, addressed in Section 13; or
- the Government's review of the UK approach to post-conflict reconstruction and stabilisation, and the creation of a deployable UK civilian standby capability, addressed in Sections 10.3 and 10.4.

Terms used in this Section

UK-based staff. UK Government employees deployed to Iraq for a defined period, usually between six months and one year.

Locally engaged (LE) staff. Staff recruited and employed in Iraq by the UK Government. Sometimes referred to as "locally employed staff" or "locally engaged civilians".

Contractor. Used in this report for all personnel hired by UK (and US) government departments on fixed-term contracts, including those referred to in contemporary documents as "consultants".

Consultant. Usually refers to contractors providing specialist technical advice. Widely used in contemporary documents and by witnesses to the Inquiry in place of "contractor".

Personnel. All staff and contractors.

Secondee. An individual deployed temporarily to another organisation.

Civilian outreach event

3. In June 2010, the Inquiry held an outreach event for civilians who had served in Iraq between 2003 and 2009. A total of 48 people took part from a range of departments, including the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), the Ministry of Defence (MOD) and the Department for International Development (DFID). No contractors responded to the invitation.

4. Participants were divided into three working groups:

- the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) period (18 participants);
- mid-2004 to mid-2007 (21 participants); and
- mid-2007 to mid-2009 (nine participants).

5. Each working group discussed two themes: "Strategy and Delivery" and "Support to Staff".

6. Views expressed during the event appear where appropriate in this Section.

Pre-invasion planning and preparation

7. Sections 6.4 and 6.5 address the shortcomings in the UK Government's planning and preparation for a post-Saddam Hussein Iraq.

8. When the invasion of Iraq began overnight on 19/20 March 2003, there had been no systematic analysis of the availability of civilian personnel to meet the UK's likely obligations in post-conflict Iraq.

9. Factors shaping the Government's pre-conflict approach to civilian deployments included:

- inadequate planning machinery;
- the absence of a comprehensive strategy for post-conflict Iraq, which could have informed a cross-Whitehall assessment of the civilian requirement;
- an assumption that, after a short transitional phase led by the US, the post-conflict administration and reconstruction of Iraq would be run and staffed by the international community, led by the UN, allowing the UK to limit its contribution to provision of financial resources and targeted advice delivered by a small number of civilian specialists;[1]
- DFID's limited operational capacity;
- concerns about the legal status of UK secondees working for the US-led Office for Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA) in Iraq; and
- failure to decide whether the UK should assume overall responsibility for a geographical sector of Iraq.

10. In the months before the invasion, the UK Government made preparations for civilian deployment to Iraq in four areas:

- cross-government support to ORHA;
- DFID humanitarian support to the UK military and international organisations;
- FCO staff for the British Embassy Baghdad; and
- MOD civilians supporting Operation (Op) TELIC.[2]

[2] Operation TELIC was the codename for the involvement of UK Armed Forces in the military campaign in Iraq from 2003 to 2011.

ORHA

11. ORHA was created by the US in January 2003.[3] It was led by retired US Lieutenant General Jay Garner and reported to the Department of Defense (DoD).

12. The UK's approach to ORHA in the weeks before the invasion of Iraq is described in Section 6.5. UK concerns during that period included:

- DoD's assumption of responsibility for all US post-conflict planning and the marginalisation of the State Department;
- the limited time available to ORHA to plan and prepare for the post-conflict phase of operations;
- persistent shortcomings in those preparations;
- legal concerns, in the absence of a UN mandate for the administration and reconstruction of Iraq, about the compatibility of certain post-conflict activities with the rules of military occupation, and the implications for any UK secondees serving with ORHA; and
- a shortage of information about ORHA's staffing requirements and, as a consequence, the contribution that should be made by the UK.

13. The UK Government's response to those concerns and the evolution of its policy towards ORHA during March and April 2003 are addressed in Sections 6.5 and 10.1.

14. In February 2003, the Government seconded a small number of officials and military officers to ORHA. The Inquiry has seen little evidence of formal inter-departmental discussion of the appointment process.

15. The first UK secondee, appointed in February 2003, and the senior UK member of ORHA was Major General Tim Cross.[4]

16. Maj Gen Cross had recent and relevant experience of planning for conflict in Iraq. In the second half of 2002 he had worked as Logistic Component Commander of the Joint Force being prepared for possible operations against Iraq. He returned to the UK in late 2002.

17. Maj Gen Cross told the Inquiry:

> "I had been back only a short time at my desk, where I was the Director General of the defence supply chain, a couple of weeks and the phone rang literally out of the blue, and they[5] just said we want you to go. To be honest, I wasn't surprised."[6]

[5] Maj Gen Cross was unsure whether he had been phoned by the Military Secretary (Major General Peter Grant Peterkin) or the Chief of the General Staff (General Sir Mike Jackson).
[6] Public hearing, 7 December 2009, page 10.

18. The record of the FCO Iraq Morning Meeting on 4 February 2003 stated that the US had requested "a broader UK team (in addition to our MOD representative [Maj Gen Cross])".[7] FCO officials would check Personnel Directorate's[8] progress in identifying "an FCO representative". DFID was also considering sending a representative.

19. Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, was reluctant to second DFID officials to ORHA in the absence of a UN mandate for reconstruction (see Section 6.5). On 20 February, Ms Short agreed that one DFID representative should work with, but not in, ORHA "on a temporary basis" to "influence and help with the planning of the Office".[9]

20. A DFID official was appointed "temporary humanitarian adviser" to Maj Gen Cross later in February.[10]

21. The record of the FCO's Iraq Evening Meeting on 27 February stated: "ORHA needs strengthening – we are looking for a volunteer."[11]

22. On 27 February, Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the US, warned that ORHA was "woefully understaffed".[12] He suggested that officials earmarked for the British Embassy Baghdad should be sent to help.

23. On 6 March, Maj Gen Cross informed the MOD, the FCO and DFID that he expected the requirements for Lt Gen Garner's "Top Team" to become clear the following week.[13] In the meantime, he believed that two UK military officers might be able to join him from the US Central Command (CENTCOM) in Tampa. He reported that, on the civilian side, DFID's humanitarian adviser continued "to explore how ORHA's humanitarian plans are developing" and an FCO official had been identified as UK liaison officer for ORHA's back office in the US.

24. The record of the FCO Iraq Morning Meeting on 10 March stated that ORHA had been "strengthened with three further UK officers", two from the FCO and one from British Trade International (BTI).[14]

25. The British Embassy Washington reported on 16 March that five UK secondees had deployed with ORHA to Kuwait: Maj Gen Cross, a second military officer and the three civilians from the FCO and Trade Partners UK (TPUK), the division of BTI responsible for promoting UK exports.[15] DFID had also agreed formally to second an official to ORHA's humanitarian assistance division.

26. On 17 March, an official in the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec) informed Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of OD Sec, that Maj Gen Cross had asked whether a suitable UK official was available to improve ORHA's capacity to handle Arabic-language media.[16]

27. Concerns about the adequacy of the UK contribution to ORHA began to grow soon after the start of the invasion and are addressed later in this Section.

DFID humanitarian advisers

28. On 3 February, DFID officials recommended to Ms Short that DFID second six civil/military humanitarian advisers to the UK military and ORHA, in order "to take further forward our objective of refining the military planning options to ensure the humanitarian consequences of any conflict in Iraq are fully addressed".[17]

29. The Inquiry has not seen Ms Short's response to the advice, but DFID did second a number of staff over the following weeks.

30. On 7 March, DFID informed Mr Blair that, in addition to the DFID presence in ORHA, there was now a DFID staff presence in the 1st (UK) Armoured Division (1 (UK) Div) in Kuwait, with further deployments to the region and UN agencies imminent.[18]

31. DFID officials sent Ms Short an outline 'Humanitarian Strategy and Immediate Assistance Plan' for Iraq on 12 March (see Section 6.5).[19] The single page describing DFID's "Operational Plan" explained that: "In view of DFID's limited resources, we will retain maximum flexibility to respond to changing scenarios and needs". Actions planned or under way included:

- "Information Management". Staff from the Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department Operations Team (CHAD OT) would be deployed to Kuwait and Jordan to collate, analyse and disseminate field information. DFID was also evaluating the need to send staff to Turkey, Iran and Cyprus, and would retain a limited capacity to deploy assessment teams to localised crisis points.
- "Direct Support to the UN". DFID was seconding specialists to support the co-ordination and information activities of the UN's Humanitarian Assistance Centre (HIC) and Joint Logistics Centre (UNJLC).

- "Advice to the Military/Coalition". Two DFID secondees were advising 1(UK) Div and one DFID official was in ORHA, all contributing to DFID's "information gathering system". A DFID secondment to the National Component HQ in Qatar was under consideration.

32. On 21 March, two days after the start of the invasion, DFID reported that it had deployed seven humanitarian and civil/military advisers:

- a two-person team to Kuwait City;
- two advisers to join 1(UK) Div;
- one to join ORHA in Kuwait; and
- one each to Amman and Tehran.[20]

The British Embassy Baghdad

33. In September 2002, the FCO began preparations for the reopening of a British Embassy in Baghdad.

34. On 27 September, Mr Peter Collecott, FCO Director General Corporate Affairs,[21] briefed Sir Michael Jay, FCO Permanent Under Secretary (PUS),[22] on plans for reopening the British Embassy:

> "Based on the Kabul experience, we are planning for an Embassy of, initially, 11 FCO staff (plus 6 from OGDs [other government departments] and 12 Close Protection Officers). We have begun the process of identifying possible staff. On the technical side … we have likely volunteers."[23]

35. Mr Collecott emphasised the importance of committing immediately to the capital expenditure required, including for "armoured vehicles, portable accommodation and ICT equipment". The lead time for armoured vehicles in particular was very long: 20 weeks, which would mean delivery in late February or early March 2003.

36. On public presentation, Mr Collecott advised:

> "Our major, and most visible, expenditure will be on equipment for Baghdad. That is defensible on the grounds that this is prudent planning; re-establishment in Baghdad does not necessarily imply a military campaign or indeed regime change; and that we have a commitment to the FAC (Foreign Affairs Committee) to have a rapidly deployable Embassy for use anywhere."

The Permanent Under Secretaries and Permanent Secretaries are referred to collectively as Permanent Secretaries.
[23] Minute Collecott to Jay, 27 September 2002, 'Iraq Contingency Measures'.

37. The recruitment of staff for the new Embassy was part of a wider redeployment of FCO staff in response to developments in Iraq.

38. On 20 March 2003, Sir Michael Jay informed Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, that "almost five percent of FCO staff in London" had been redeployed:

- 51 staff had been redeployed to the main Emergency Unit;
- 119 had been redeployed to the Consular Emergency Unit;
- the Iraq Planning Unit (IPU) had been established;
- the nucleus of a mission in Baghdad had been prepared; and
- FCO staff had been seconded to ORHA and "other bodies".[24]

39. The creation of the IPU, based in the FCO, and the activation of the two FCO Emergency Units in London is addressed in Section 6.5.

40. Mr Collecott updated Mr Straw on preparations for the new Embassy on 21 March:

> "Plans are in place for a two-phase re-occupation of the site [of the former British Embassy] as soon as hostilities are over, and military ordnance personnel have declared the site safe … These plans have had to be made on the basis of worst case assumptions – an insecure environment; no secure office buildings or accommodation available off-compound; no available utilities."[25]

41. Mr Collecott explained that, in phase one, five specially converted containers would arrive in Kuwait on 26 March to be transported to Baghdad as soon as the route was safe. The containers would provide living and office accommodation for a team of four, led by Mr Chris Segar, a senior FCO official, and would be self-sufficient in power and water. Mr Segar's team would have secure communications from the outset.

42. Phase two would begin in the first week of May and involve installation of a protected prefabricated flat pack Embassy, with its own water, drainage and power supply, and secure living and working accommodation for 44 staff, including close protection officers. Construction of the Embassy would take 12 weeks.

43. Mr Collecott explained that the timetable was based on transport by sea and land. The FCO would be exposed to "a very awkward period" if Baghdad returned to "relative normality" quickly and pressure mounted rapidly to expand the UK presence. Two or three weeks could be saved if the flat pack containers and other equipment were flown into Baghdad. The FCO was "keeping open the option of calling in a debt with the Americans by asking them to transport the flat pack equipment and containers to Baghdad. (The RAF are not at all sure they can help.)"

[25] Minute Collecott to Private Secretary [FCO], 21 March 2003, 'A British Embassy in Baghdad'.

44. On 11 April, Mr Charles Gray, Head of FCO Middle East Department, told Mr Straw that the plans were on course.[26] FCO Personnel Directorate was identifying a pool of staff at all grades willing to serve in Baghdad in the medium to long term. The aim was to deploy staff for one year "to avoid the rapid and disruptive turnover experienced in the early days of our redeployment to Kabul". When permanent quarters were found, the flat pack Embassy would be returned to the UK for use elsewhere.

45. Mr Gray advised that security was a priority. Staff could not be put into a situation in which the FCO could not fulfil its duty of care. Before Mr Segar's party and the close protection team travelled, the MOD and Assessments Staff needed to conclude that the situation was calm enough in the city as whole, not just in the area immediately surrounding the compound.

46. Mr Gray added that it had not been decided how to secure the compound perimeter. Relying on the US military or a private security company would be politically unacceptable and locally engaged (LE) Iraqi guards would not be a realistic option in the short term. The British Army was the only realistic alternative. The MOD was considering the issue, but would "take some persuasion to redeploy to Baghdad from the South in what would in effect be a full company, even for a short deployment (and the cost to the FCO will be high)".

47. On 30 April, Mr Gray reported that planning for opening the mission in Baghdad, under the provisional name of "The British Office", was in its final stages.[27] The staff, the flat pack Embassy and four armoured vehicles were scheduled to arrive in Baghdad on 5 or 6 May.

48. The British Office Baghdad was established on 5 May.[28]

MOD civilian support to Op TELIC

49. The MOD deploys civilians in a wide range of support roles for military operations. A 2007 list of 15 different roles routinely performed by MOD civil servants on deployed operation, not specifically linked to Op TELIC, included:

- "Policy and Political Adviser (POLAD)" to the deployed Commander at brigade level or higher;
- "Civil Secretary (CIVSEC)", the senior financial officer in theatre;
- "Finance Officer";
- "Commercial Officer", responsible for contracts and services with local suppliers;
- "Media Adviser";
- "MOD Police"; and
- "Defence Fire and Rescue Service", part of the force protection service.[29]

50. In Iraq, the MOD also deployed civilians in advisory roles outside Op TELIC, including in the CPA and the UK's bilateral diplomatic missions.

51. On 14 February 2003, Mr John Pitt-Brooke, MOD Director General Civilian Personnel, reported that the MOD had been "successful in getting people lined up for quick deployment into theatre".[30] There were about 25 Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ)-sponsored civilian posts across the Middle East. Some individuals had already deployed; others would do so over the following weeks. Other parts of the MOD would be deploying specialist staff to their own timetable.

52. Mr Pitt-Brooke expressed concern that the approach to deployments across departments within the MOD had not been as consistent or coherent as it should have been. Key issues were:

- Management information: there was no central record of those deployed, "which we need for tracking people in theatre, providing the appropriate medical and welfare support, etc. We are working on gripping this quickly".
- Risk assessment: individuals needed more clarity about potential risks. A single source of guidance needed to be published urgently.
- Training: the approach had been inconsistent.
- Availability of equipment: current arrangements were "less than the individual has a right to expect".
- Briefing and travel allowance arrangements.
- Medical, welfare and insurance issues: "The lack of consistent, readily available advice on medical issues … and the lack of a single point of contact for advice may be aspects that we could improve upon."

53. Mr Pitt-Brooke advised that a new "focal point" had been set up in PJHQ to address those issues. New arrangements would be in place on 19 February.

54. In response, Sir Kevin Tebbit, the MOD PUS, instructed officials to "bear in mind the need for wider post-conflict planning. OGDs sh[oul]d bear the brunt, but we are likely to need MOD people as well."[31]

55. On 31 March, Mr Paul Flaherty, MOD Civil Secretary at PJHQ, informed Sir Kevin that 156 civilians had been deployed to theatre in support of Op TELIC, the largest number in the Warship Support Agency, and that numbers fluctuated from day to day.[32]

56. It had taken Mr Flaherty 18 days to compile the figures. He apologised that it had taken longer than he had hoped.

57. Mr Flaherty reported that civilians had been deployed at all grades "in a range of roles including finance, administration, claims, salvage, RFA [Royal Fleet Auxiliary], communications, POLAD etc".

58. Mr Flaherty confirmed that the MOD Civilian Deployment Co-ordination cell had been established at PJHQ. For the first time, co-ordinated guidance had been made available to civilians deployed on Op TELIC and a pre-deployment training strategy had been established.

59. Mr Flaherty added:

> "There is a great deal for the new cell to do, but an important current priority is constructing a register of the names, and other relevant details, of civilians who are deployed. The new cell is working to render this sort of information as complete and reliable as possible."

60. Sir Kevin Tebbit described 156 as "a significant number for deployed personnel, notwithstanding that just over half that number are Royal Fleet Auxiliaries".[33] He attached importance to the provision of "proper support for families" and expressed the hope that the co-ordination cell would pay attention to morale, as well as training.

61. Sir Kevin also requested, as a matter of urgency, advice on arrangements for dealing with civilian deaths.

62. Mr Richard Hatfield, MOD Personnel Director, explained that any MOD civilians and accredited war correspondents killed in Iraq would be subject to the same overarching policy as service personnel.[34] Any MOD civilians would be returned to the UK alongside service personnel and would have the same treatment on arrival, including ceremonial, if that was the wish of the next of kin. MOD civilians were Crown servants operating in direct support of the military in a theatre of war. To offer less might cause offence or embarrassment to the families. For accredited journalists, it was proposed to confine the policy to flying the body home, with no ceremonial.

63. Mr Hatfield reassured Sir Kevin Tebbit that work was "in step" on wider Op TELIC-related civilian and service personnel issues.

64. Sir Kevin approved the repatriation proposals on 7 April 2003.[35]

UK civilian presence during the Coalition Occupation of Iraq

65. The Inquiry estimates that, on the eve of the invasion, the UK had between 10 and 16 non-MOD civilians ready to deploy to Iraq:

- two DFID humanitarian experts to advise 1 (UK) Div;[36]
- four secondees to ORHA (a fifth remained in ORHA's Pentagon office; two other UK secondees were military officers),[37] with five or six more "in the pipeline";[38] and
- a team of four to reopen the British Embassy Baghdad.[39]

66. In late March, the MOD deployed 156 civilians[40] to theatre in support of Op TELIC.[41]

67. Before the invasion, DFID also deployed a number of staff to locations outside Iraq:

- Four DFID staff were deployed to Kuwait, Jordan and Iran "to monitor and assess humanitarian needs and to liaise with UN agencies and NGOs", with an undertaking to increase numbers "as circumstances dictate".
- DFID seconded specialists to the World Food Programme (WFP) and the UN Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), and was "considering requests" from other parts of the UN system.[42]

68. By 7 April, DFID had also seconded a Liaison Officer and a Logistics Officer to the UN's HIC in Larnaca, an Air Movement Officer to the WFP's Operations Centre, and an Air Co-ordinator to the UNJLC in Larnaca.[43]

69. DFID deployed a second Air Movement Officer to the WFP Operations Centre in early May.[44]

UK civilian deployments to ORHA

70. UK policy towards ORHA is addressed in detail in Sections 6.5 and 10.1. This Section considers the nature and scale of the UK contribution to the ORHA workforce.

71. On 1 April, the IPU advised Mr Straw on the UK's future engagement with ORHA.[45] The IPU assessed that, while ORHA was "in many ways a sub-optimal organisation for delivering the UK's Phase IV[46] objectives", it was "the only game in town". There was, however, "ample scope" to use UK secondees to exert leverage over US Phase IV planning and implementation. The IPU recommended that the UK should continue to commit resources to ORHA where the UK "could add real value and exert influence over emerging US perspectives and plans".

72. The IPU also recommended that the UK should:

- continue to make clear to the US the limits within which the UK, including UK personnel within ORHA, could operate;
- seek close consultation on ORHA's plans, to ensure that they did not cross UK "red lines"; and
- subject to those points, confirm Maj Gen Cross as Deputy to Lt Gen Garner.

73. The IPU reported that ORHA, which at that stage was in Kuwait, had approximately 200 staff, expected to rise to over 1,000 by the time it deployed to Iraq. The UK and Australia each had six officers seconded to ORHA. Five more UK secondees were "in the pipeline" and one was working in ORHA's back office in the Pentagon. The UK secondees were "fully integrated" and "adding significant value". At ORHA's request, the IPU was considering whether to strengthen UK representation, particularly in the areas of public relations, civil administration and humanitarian operations.

74. On 2 April, Mr Peter Ricketts, FCO Political Director, sent Sir David Manning an earlier version of the IPU paper, which identified areas in which the UK was considering strengthening its representation: public relations, civil administration, humanitarian advice and administrative support for existing secondees.[47]

75. Mr Tony Brenton, Chargé d'Affaires at the British Embassy Washington, warned Sir David Manning on 3 April that the UK was "in danger of being left behind" on ORHA.[48] The list of senior officials to "shadow" ministries in Iraq was almost complete and those officials would start deploying soon. Australia had bid for a place. The UK had not, even though the US had said it would be open to such a bid. Mr Brenton advised that:

> "Following our significant military efforts we surely have an interest in following through to the civilian phase. If so, given the advanced state of US preparations, it will be important that we vigorously pursue the point at next week's talks [at Hillsborough]."

76. Sir David commented: "We need to decide if we want a place. Do we?"[49] He asked Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to discuss the issue with the FCO.

77. UK support for ORHA was the focus of the first meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR), chaired by Mr Straw, on 10 April (see Section 9.1).[50]

78. Mr Straw visited ORHA in Kuwait on 14 April.[51] During the visit, Maj Gen Cross handed Mr Straw a copy of his 'Must-Could-Should' paper (see Section 10.1). The paper, which was sent to the MOD and the IPU on 15 April, identified ORHA posts that UK secondees must fill, should fill or could fill "to best help ORHA achieve success".[52]

79. Maj Gen Cross advised that, if all the recommendations were accepted, the number of UK staff would rise from 19 to "about 100" within an ORHA total of 1,500 (including force protection and support staff).

80. On 15 April, Mr Straw recommended to Mr Blair:

> "… a step change in the resources and personnel we offer … We are working urgently to establish where we can best make a contribution and how this will be funded.
> "We now need an immediate effort across government and with the private sector to get UK experts into key Iraqi ministries quickly. Patricia [Hewitt, the Trade and Industry Secretary] is particularly keen that we should appoint people to the economic ministries …"

81. In his memoir, Mr Straw wrote:

> "I could not believe the shambles before my eyes. There were around forty people in the room, who, somehow or other, were going to be the nucleus of the government of this large, disputatious and traumatised nation."[53]

82. On 15 April, the IPU informed Mr Ricketts that it had requested extra staff to cover the "major surge of work" in managing the secondment of UK officials to ORHA, and was trying to identify funding.[54] It estimated that the first UK secondees would be required by early May.

83. Sir Michael Jay informed Mr Straw on 16 April that he had reached agreement with Sir Andrew Turnbull, the Cabinet Secretary, on "the modalities for deploying experts from central government, plus experts from eg the NHS and local government".[55]

84. Sir Andrew Turnbull sent Mr Blair a copy of Sir Michael's minute later the same day, commenting: "This is important and we will respond. But we will need the right collective decisions quickly if this project is to [get] under way."[56] Sir Andrew identified two problems:

- It was not clear that ORHA had reached the right conclusions about what was needed, or that ORHA's view of its role was shared by the UK.
- The UK needed to decide on the scale and precise roles of UK secondees and to reach agreement on how to finance the activity.

85. On 17 April, Mr Blair agreed that the UK should "increase significantly the level of … political and practical support to ORHA, including the secondment of significant numbers of staff in priority areas".[57] Mr Blair added that:

> "As a general rule, our role in humanitarian aid and in the reconstruction of Iraq should be commensurate with our contribution to the military phase."

86. The FCO, DFID and the Cabinet Office were instructed to provide Mr Blair with lists of secondees, their roles and dates of arrival in Iraq, by 25 April.

87. Lt Gen Garner, accompanied by Maj Gen Cross and other ORHA staff, left Kuwait to fly into Baghdad on 21 April.[58]

88. In his statement to the Inquiry, Maj Gen Cross commented that, during ORHA's time in Kuwait, his UK team was "strengthened a little, including a very useful media team provided by Alastair Campbell [Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy]", but efforts to secure significant numbers of additional UK personnel were "frustratingly slow":

> "I found myself ringing around lobbying my own contacts and then asking 'formally' for named individuals who I knew would add real value – usually with little or no 'official' agreement/response. I did however manage to get some 'unofficial' additional military support."[59]

89. In the absence of contingency preparations for the deployment of more than a handful of UK civilians to Iraq, officials urgently sought:

- cross-Whitehall agreement on the detailed arrangements for recruitment and deployment of individuals from a range of different organisations;
- agreement with ORHA on the level of support it would provide UK secondees; and
- detailed information on secondees' roles in Iraq.

90. Sir Michael Jay launched the recruitment process on 22 April, sending a request for volunteers to Sir Andrew Turnbull and all Whitehall Permanent Secretaries.[60]

91. Sir Michael included a list of priority positions for UK secondees based on recommendations from Maj Gen Cross (see Section 10.1). Sir Michael described in broad terms the personal qualities and skills volunteers should possess:

> "The key to a successful secondment will be enthusiasm, personal impact, resilience, flexibility and the ability to take a wide top-down view of policy and priorities. The ability to deploy quickly is also essential: ideally we want the first volunteers to reach Baghdad by around 5 May to allow them to help shape ORHA's work and approach from the start. We expect secondments to last between three and six months, depending on the requirements of ORHA and the Iraqi ministry concerned.
> "I hope you will take a broad view in looking for volunteers … you might consider suggesting secondment of officials on your books but not currently employed … I hope you will also consider drawing people from your wider pool of stakeholders – I would, for example, welcome volunteers from eg police authorities, quangos or NHS trusts.
> "In all cases, enthusiasm and personal qualities are likely to be just as important as specific expertise …"

92. Sir Michael explained that salaries would be paid by employing departments. Discussions were continuing on how other costs should be met. ORHA was expected to provide accommodation. Staff would not be deployed until ORHA and Maj Gen Cross were confident it was safe to do so. The "austere" living and working conditions would be compensated by an allowance package being finalised by the FCO.

93. On 25 April, FCO, DFID, MOD and Cabinet Office officials agreed a number of steps to co-ordinate departments' responses:

- Mr Dominick Chilcott, Head of the IPU, would lead a scoping visit to identify posts of greatest value to the UK (see Section 10.1).

---

[60] Letter Jay to Turnbull, 22 April 2003, 'Iraq: UK Support for the Office for Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA)'.

- The UK would pay salaries, additional allowances and transport costs to and from theatre, on the assumption that ORHA would cover accommodation and all other in-country costs.
- All departments would pay the salaries of their own staff. The MOD, DFID and the FCO would pick up additional costs for their staff. Other departments' additional costs would be met through the allocation of a portion of the UK's reconstruction budget to the FCO (see Section 13.1).
- FCO security advisers would assess the security risk in Baghdad as soon as possible.
- The IPU would inform ORHA that the UK understood that its secondees would receive the same medical, evacuation and emergency response package as US staff.
- A similar understanding would be needed "in due course" between the MOD and other departments, covering Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE)).
- The FCO, DFID and the MOD would be responsible for recruiting their own staff. The Cabinet Office, in liaison with IPU and DFID, would select staff put forward by other departments.
- The FCO would arrange medical examinations and inoculations for secondees and issue formal letters of appointment and terms and conditions.[61]

94. The FCO informed No.10 on 25 April that members of the 20-strong UK contingent with ORHA in Kuwait had arrived in Baghdad.[62] It explained that 12 more civilian and military secondees were expected to arrive in Baghdad by 5 May. Secondees' roles were still unclear, partly because of continuing uncertainty about ORHA's own role. The FCO was:

> "… instructing them to take a flexible, pragmatic approach to their work, aiming to be proactive in identifying how they can best add value in support of Coalition Phase IV objectives. We are also requesting this first wave to report back with early recommendations for deeper UK engagement in specific areas."

95. Ms Emma Sky, CPA Governorate Co-ordinator for Kirkuk from June 2003 to February 2004, told the Inquiry that she was not given a briefing by the FCO before travelling to Iraq. Instead she had received a phone call telling her "You've spent a lot of time in the Middle East. You will be fine."[63]

96. On 6 May, Mr Straw announced to Parliament the appointment of Mr John Sawers as the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq (see Section 9.1). Mr Straw explained that:

> "Mr Sawers will work alongside Chris Segar, head of the newly opened British Office in Baghdad, particularly in relation to the political process and our work in the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance."[64]

97. Sir John Sawers told the Inquiry that, although he was "the senior Brit on the ground" he was not Ambassador Bremer's deputy, nor was he in the line management chain of ORHA or the CPA. Rather, he was a representative of the British Government and so his role was one of "exerting influence rather than exercising power".[65]

98. By 14 May, the UK had still not reached agreement with the US on ORHA support for UK secondees.[66] The IPU explained to Mr Straw that:

> "Since ORHA deployed to Kuwait we have been trying to obtain assurances from the Americans … about the precise terms on which our contribution is being provided. So far, despite a good deal of pressing, we have not been successful …"

99. Deployment of the additional secondees was delayed briefly by DFID concerns about security.

100. On 13 May, Mr Suma Chakrabarti, DFID Permanent Secretary, informed Sir Michael Jay that ORHA's 'Outline Brief for Potential International Partners' did not cover security issues adequately.[67] The outline committed the US military to provide overall security and evacuation arrangements, but "it does not set out any security procedures or contingency plans, as we would normally require for any other UK mission in any other country".

101. Mr Chakrabarti explained that the contractors forming the bulk of the DFID team recruited in response to Sir Michael Jay's request for staff on 22 April, and due to travel to Iraq the next day, had said that their insurance cover would be invalid until there was an adequate security plan. The existing DFID secondee to ORHA had therefore been put on standby to withdraw if security arrangements were not resolved quickly, and the first two additional secondees had been stood down. Mr Chakrabarti proposed to send a DFID security team to Baghdad the next day and requested that an FCO security adviser accompany them.

102. Sir Michael Jay responded the same day, after discussing the issue with the UK military, Maj Gen Cross and Mr Sawers.[68] Sir Michael reported that Maj Gen Cross considered the issue in Baghdad to be "protection rather than evacuation". Sir Michael was "willing to accept the judgement of those on the ground that the arrangements in place adequately provide security for the military and civilian secondees already in ORHA and the augmentees we will be deploying from today".

103. Sir Michael added:

> "In briefing UK secondees … we have stressed that Baghdad is an insecure environment and that security guidelines laid down by the US military must be followed at all times … All secondees are deploying with a full suite of protective equipment including body armour, helmets and personal NBC [nuclear, biological, chemical] suits, and have been trained in their use by MOD."

104. Sir Michael agreed, however, that it would be helpful to have a more detailed plan, "not least to meet the insurance requirements of contracted staff". Depending on what the DFID security team concluded, the FCO might take up the suggestion that their work "form the basis for a security plan covering all UK secondees". DFID and the FCO should continue to liaise closely.

105. The first joint FCO/DFID security visit took place at the end of June and is addressed later in this Section.

106. Before the AHMGIR on 15 May, the IPU advised Mr Straw that:

> "Security for our secondees is a key concern … The US military are committed to providing ORHA's overall security and evacuation arrangements … ORHA does not yet have a detailed evacuation plan, but the advice from theatre is that the key issue in Baghdad is protection rather than evacuation.
> "Our own judgement, including that of Security Strategy Unit, has been to accept the view of those on the ground … The UK civilians currently in ORHA … have told us that they are content with the way the US arrangements work in practice … We have therefore proceeded with the deployment of additional secondees, and the first group of 22 departed for Iraq on 14 May."[69]

107. There is no record of the issue being discussed by the AHMGIR on 15 May.[70]

108. In the Annotated Agenda for the 22 May AHMGIR, officials explained that security experts had drawn up procedures that allowed DFID "to deploy fully in support of ORHA".[71]

109. The AHMGIR was also informed that 61 UK officials had been seconded to ORHA, five of them in Basra. Officials provided very basic information on the functions of 35 of the 61, explaining: "Some secondees have yet to be allocated specific roles."

The CPA and the return to a "war footing"

110. Section 10.1 describes ORHA's absorption into the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) during May 2003.

111. Mr Blair visited Basra and Umm Qasr on 29 May. DFID and the FCO provided separate briefings for the visit.

112. DFID advised that it had stepped up its "staff support" for ORHA in Baghdad and Basra and was looking at additional areas to support.[72]

113. The FCO advised that the UK now had 61 secondees in ORHA (including in Basra), most of whom were working with Iraqi ministries.[73] In Basra, the UK had provided a Deputy to Mr Ole Olsen, the Danish Head of ORHA(South), and 10 other secondees, and planned to send more.

114. On 1 June, the Deputy to Ambassador Olsen reported that ORHA(South) had 21 staff (eight UK civilians, five UK military officers, five Danish civilians, two US military officers and one Japanese civilian). Additional staff were arriving "in trickles" but were mostly military officers and had been directed to ORHA(South) by 1 (UK) Div and Maj Gen Cross. Those officers were useful as "stopgaps", but ORHA(Baghdad) needed to provide expert staff.[74]

115. On 3 June, Mr Blair called for Whitehall to return to a "war footing" in Iraq to avoid losing the peace (see Section 9.1).[75] He stated that the CPA lacked "grip and organisation" rather than money or numbers of staff. The UK needed to "beef up" its involvement and there needed to be "a strong civilian team in the South. In general, there needed to be a much stronger civilian grip".

116. After the meeting, Baroness Amos, the International Development Secretary, told Mr Hilary Benn, Minister of State for International Development, and Mr Chakrabarti that "the Prime Minister's thinking seemed to be that the UK would put in the people; US the money".[76]

117. In the Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR on 12 June, officials informed Ministers that:

> "… we continue to strengthen the CPA with a fluctuating contingent of UK secondees, currently numbering around 70. The bulk of those sent in May will return to the UK in mid-August. Their concluding reports will give us the information to decide where we can best target our resources … in the medium term."[77]

118. On 16 June, Ms Sally Keeble, who had been DFID Parliamentary Under Secretary of State until earlier that month, raised with Mr Blair her concerns about DFID's planning and preparation for post-conflict Iraq and its performance since the invasion, including its slow engagement with the CPA after Ms Short's resignation in May (see Section 10.1).[78]

119. Mr Rycroft told Mr Blair that: "From what DM [David Manning] and I have seen from here, Sally's letter is accurate in highlighting DFID's failure to pre-plan and to engage with CPA."[79] Mr Rycroft recommended that Sir Andrew Turnbull pursue the issue with DFID.

120. On 4 July, Mr Chakrabarti told Sir Andrew Turnbull:

> "DFID support to CPA has grown dramatically; and continues to do so. In early April when CPA (ORHA as was) moved to Baghdad, DFID had one official in CPA. That has grown to 16 today split between Baghdad and Basra, and will rise upwards of 30 over the coming weeks – some 30 percent of the total UK contingent …
> "DFID secondees into CPA have been successful in work areas ranging from food distribution to refugee returns. Their success is based on thorough groundwork done beforehand to ensure they have substantive roles, the skill set they bring to their tasks, and professional support and back up from London."[80]

121. Ministers visiting Iraq in early July raised questions about the skills and seniority of secondees to the CPA.

122. On 2 July, Baroness Amos advised Mr Blair that the CPA contained "too many people with the wrong skill set – policy focus rather than operational expertise, and insufficient experience of post-conflict developing country situations".[81]

123. Baroness Amos made a number of broad recommendations for enhancing the UK contribution:

- "more UK people with political skills on the ground … Arabic speakers, with knowledge of the region, to strengthen capacity in CPA(South) and CPA Baghdad";
- "strengthen the senior management" in CPA(South) and "provide other staff as required"; and
- send "whatever additional staff are required with the right skill set to CPA [in Baghdad]".

124. A week later, Ms Hewitt advised Mr Blair of the need "to ensure that we are seconding sufficiently senior people to the CPA".[82] It was noticeable that the US was sending more senior people than the UK.

125. Ms Keeble told the Inquiry:

> "… the numbers speak for themselves. I think there were two advisers embedded with the military, two others in Kuwait, one in Washington with ORHA, as it was then, one in Amman, one in Tehran, for a large part of the early stages of the action and, by the time I left DFID, I think there were – I think I'm right in saying about nine in Baghdad and six in Basra and presumably still one in Washington.
> "… I think it is a matter of judgement as to whether that's a large number or not. I didn't think it was a very large number."[83]

126. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event who had served in Iraq in 2003 and 2004 commented on the additional responsibilities of Occupation. Many felt that Occupying Power status changed the nature of their job from simply working overseas to carrying an immense responsibility to Iraqis to do what was needed to get Iraq functioning. Many struggled to find defined roles and hold on to them in US-dominated Iraqi ministries. They commented that it was often difficult to influence the US because of the UK's relative size and capacity.

127. The skills and seniority of civilian staff deployed to Iraq are considered later in this Section.

128. By June 2003, the security of civilian personnel in Iraq had become a major concern.

129. In Cabinet on 19 June, Baroness Amos said that the uncertain security situation in Iraq required the UK to keep the security of the people it deployed there under review.[84]

130. Baroness Amos reiterated the point on 2 July, after her visit to Iraq. She told Mr Blair:

> "The overwhelming – and immediate – priority is security … the situation appears to be worsening by the day."[85]

131. The FCO and DFID carried out a joint security assessment of Baghdad and Basra between 29 June and 3 July.[86]

132. Mr Peter Millett, Head of FCO Security Strategy Unit (SSU), set out the key conclusions to Mr Collecott:

> "We are failing to meet our duty of care to both FCO staff and those seconded to CPA through the FCO. The security situation is extremely dangerous and the CPA security resources are inadequate. The majority of secondees need to travel outside the secure zone where the threat is high and there is little or no control of the streets. The rules require secondees to travel in soft-skinned vehicles escorted by US military vehicles. This makes them extremely vulnerable since the US military are the target of daily attacks. The alternative to military escorts is a two-car convoy with 'shooters', ie armed escorts. There are not enough military personnel, so UK secondees are being asked to handle weapons, which does nothing to enhance their security."[87]

133. Mr Millett listed the steps needed to allow CPA secondees to operate "effectively and safely" in Baghdad:

- a security manager in Iraq "to brief new arrivals, keep them up to date on security incidents, manage security assets (vehicles, flak jackets etc) and act as a focal point for communications";
- a fleet of vehicles able to operate with or without US military escorts;
- a team of armed escorts to accompany secondees outside the secure zone; and
- a radio communications system to allow secondees to stay in touch with the security manager when outside the secure zone.

134. Implementation of the package required:

- agreement on the detail with DFID, which was already introducing better transport and equipment for its secondees;
- a calculation of the number of journeys required each week and therefore the number of vehicles and escorts needed;
- ordering vehicles for early delivery;

- pursuing a commercial contract for the security manager and armed escorts;
- factoring additional costs into the Iraq Reserve claim; and
- agreeing with the IPU a script for briefing all UK secondees before they deployed.

135. Mr Millett described the situation in Basra as "different from Baghdad, partly because of the political context in the South and partly because UK civilians are not accompanied by military patrols". The atmosphere was "more benign", but could deteriorate. Security in Basra was enhanced by "the active involvement of a DFID team and a commercial contract that will provide armed guards and more vehicles".

136. Mr Collecott advised Mr Straw:

> "We will inevitably be faced with some very difficult prioritisation decisions: activity v. security in Iraq; activity in Iraq v. priorities elsewhere."[88]

137. Mr Chakrabarti had already set in hand the first of the recommended improvements. On 9 July, he informed Sir Michael Jay that he had appointed Control Risks Group (CRG) to provide armed support to UK CPA secondees in Baghdad.[89] The contract had been let by DFID, in consultation with the FCO, with the intention of drawing up a joint DFID/FCO contract for the longer term. Mr Chakrabarti also undertook to send a first batch of "appropriate vehicles" and hand-held communications equipment from DFID's stockpile for use by UK staff in Iraq.

138. In late June, DFID asked the MOD to provide a military close protection team for DFID staff in Baghdad.[90]

139. It its response on 17 July, the MOD explained that Royal Military Police (RMP) close protection resources were "very heavily committed … in support of the FCO presence in Baghdad and on other tasks elsewhere". Steps had been taken to bring the RMP commitment down to sustainable levels. That included a reduction in RMP support for FCO staff, which would limit their freedom of movement in Baghdad. MOD Ministers had agreed that the only way the RMP could provide resources to DFID staff would be if DFID shared the resources available to the FCO:

> "We recognise that this is far from ideal for you and is likely to further constrain HMG's [Her Majesty's Government's] diplomatic activity in Baghdad, but it may be an improvement on your current arrangements."

140. Separately, the MOD informed DFID that medical procedures were being updated to ensure that all UK civilians and contractors received the same standard of care as those in the MOD, including evacuation to the UK or Germany as appropriate.[91]

Locally employed contractors working for DFID would receive the same level of care as locally employed civilians working for the MOD or the military: emergency care in theatre at UK medical facilities.

141. On 18 July, as part of a wider bid to the Treasury to cover additional Iraq-related costs incurred by the FCO in financial year 2003/04, Mr Straw requested £20.2m to improve security for FCO staff and UK secondees to the CPA in Iraq.[92] He advised Mr Paul Boateng, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury:

> "To meet our duty of care to staff, we need to provide armoured vehicles, armed escorts and a communication system for UK civilian secondees to CPA. This expenditure is unprecedented, unforeseen and cannot be funded by reprioritisation, nor I understand, in part from the money we have received for CPA econdees' costs."

142. Mr Boateng approved the majority of Mr Straw's request on 9 September.[93]

143. Mr Straw's request and the Treasury response are addressed in more detail in Section 13.1.

144. On 10 July, the AHMGIR agreed that:

- Secondments to the CPA should be maintained at "approximately the current level", but matched more closely to requirements, with more specialist than policy staff.
- Secondments should be extended from three months to six.
- Ministers and Sir Andrew Turnbull should help identify and release suitable staff from departments, including a senior oil expert and senior economist.
- The UK "effort" in CPA(South) should be increased "as required", including through the appointment of a "suitably strong UK figure" to replace Ambassador Olsen.
- The UK should continue to send small numbers of staff to other CPA regional offices.[94]

145. The IPU prepared more detailed proposals for the AHMGIR on 17 July.[95] It based its recommendations on the principle that the UK should seek to exert influence at "all levels", from national input provided by the Prime Minister's Special Representative to working level appointments in selected policy areas. The IPU recommended:

- filling gaps, including at a senior level in UK coverage of Security Sector Reform (SSR), the economic ministries and the oil ministry;

- targeting secondments to other CPA ministry teams more precisely;
- increasing working level support for CPA governance and the foreign, health and culture ministries;
- appointing a senior figure to lead CPA(South), where there were already 15 UK secondees;
- continuing provision of two officials to CPA(North), including the Chief of Staff;
- continuing provision of the Chief of Staff in CPA(South Central) and a cultural expert at the Babylon archaeological site; and
- leadership of four of the 18 CPA Governorate Teams (GTs) scheduled to begin operations in September, with deployment starting in late August.

146. The IPU reported that Mr Andy Bearpark, CPA Operations Director and senior UK secondee to the CPA, advised against concentrating the UK contribution to GTs in the four southern governorates on the grounds that an all-UK sector might have more difficulty in accessing funds from Baghdad. He advised that a spread of representation would also give the UK sight of developments across Iraq.

147. The AHMGIR agreed that the UK should shift emphasis over time from regional areas of operation to governorates. Ministers requested firm recommendations for the following week.[96]

148. The briefing for the 24 July meeting of the AHMGIR explained that GT security was the responsibility of the local Coalition military, but that the UK was likely to have to provide additional security to fulfil its duty of care to UK GT members.[97] There would be "significant resource implications". DFID had undertaken to fund the set-up costs of GTs in Maysan, Muthanna and Dhi Qar and running costs to the end of October 2003. The CPA would assume liability for all costs from 1 November.

149. The AHMGIR agreed that the UK would offer to lead four GTs, two in the South-East, one in the Kurdish area and one elsewhere in the Sunni area, "but not in the less stable central areas around Baghdad".[98]

150. At the AHMGIR, Mr Straw asked the Cabinet Office and the IPU to devise a debriefing system for secondees to Iraq, "to garner their experience … and to ensure that their contribution was recognised on their return to home departments". Ministers agreed that officials should provide a report on the results.

151. On 25 July, Sir Michael Jay updated Sir Andrew Turnbull and Permanent Secretaries on civilian deployments.[99] Sir Michael explained that, since his request for volunteers on 22 April, the Government had trained and deployed "over 100 civilian staff from sixteen different branches of government", an exercise he described as having "no modern precedent":

> "We now have 65 UK public servants working in the CPA Headquarters in Baghdad, and nearly 30 in the CPA South-East Office in Basra … Small numbers are also working in the CPA offices in central and northern Iraq."

152. Sir Michael reported that Ministers had decided the UK would maintain "approximately the current level of overall commitment" with a focus in Baghdad on SSR, the economic ministries and the oil sector, a "stronger lead" in CPA(South) and leadership of four CPA GTs.

153. Sir Michael explained that the FCO had set up a liaison office in Baghdad working to Mr Sawers and a CPA Operations Team (CPA-OT) in the IPU to put the UK's secondments on "a focused and sustainable basis, and provide secondees with the appropriate support for service in what will remain a difficult and unpredictable environment". The CPA-OT would "debrief the first group of secondees as they return to ensure we learn the right lessons from their experiences on the ground".

154. Sir Michael advised:

> "We will continue to need to provide good human resources if the CPA is to succeed. As reconstruction proceeds we expect more of this requirement to be met with staff engaged under contract from outside HMG. But we will continue to have a need to second staff with specialist skills from our own public service. The new machinery in Baghdad and the IPU will enable us to match requirements and resources more exactly."

155. Sir Michael wrote separately to Sir Nigel Crisp, Permanent Secretary at the Department of Health (DoH), to thank the DoH team in Basra for its "major contribution to the re-establishment of a functioning health system", which had been "out of all proportion" to its numbers.[100]

156. Sir Michael also wrote to Sir Robin Young, Permanent Secretary at the Department of Trade and Industry (DTI), who had raised concerns about security and staff salaries.[101] Sir Michael explained that, after the assessment of security in Baghdad and Basra, the FCO had taken urgent action that should allow it to fulfil its duty of care to staff. Working and living conditions were also improving and were now "quite reasonable (and are compensated by a good allowances package)".

157. On salaries, Sir Michael explained to Sir Robin Young that the terms under which the FCO received funding from the Treasury for CPA deployments prevented it paying the salaries of staff seconded from other departments. He hoped that "the priority given to the reconstruction of Iraq at every level from the Prime Minister down will convince your Ministers of the need to continue providing the CPA with the specialist help it needs". Sir Michael observed that Ms Hewitt had already made clear her support.

158. Ambassador Olsen resigned as Head of CPA(South) on 28 July.[102]

159. His successor, Sir Hilary Synnott, arrived in Basra on 30 July.[103]

160. Sir Hilary told the Inquiry what he found on arrival:

> "A pretty dysfunctional team of eight to ten different nationalities, very, very few British, three Foreign Office officials, one permanent DFID official and a lack of focus and a lack of capability … The phones didn't work, there were no mobile phones at that time and nobody had thought to provide me with any form of computer."[104]

161. The decision to appoint Sir Hilary as Head of CPA(South) and his experience on arrival in Basra are addressed in more detail in Section 10.1.

162. Shortly before Sir Hilary Synnott's arrival in Basra, the CPA produced a 'Vision for Iraq', supported by a detailed implementation plan (see Section 10.1).[105]

163. In his memoir, Sir Hilary wrote:

> "The trouble was it [the 'Vision for Iraq'] did not amount to an operational plan of action … There were no indications about how in practice they would be achieved: no details of funding, of personnel involved, of support systems or of timing."[106]

164. On 7 August, officials informed the AHMGIR that the IPU was debriefing the first wave of UK secondees to the CPA returning from Iraq.[107] Operational lessons would be put to Ministers in September.

165. Separately, the Cabinet Office Corporate Development Group (CDG) began assessing the benefits of CPA secondments to staff and departments. The aim was to report to Ministers in November, drawing on responses to a questionnaire to be put to secondees within a month of their return from Iraq.[108]

166. The outcome of both exercises is described later in this Section.

The impact of deteriorating security

167. On 19 August, a bomb exploded outside the UN headquarters at the Canal Hotel in Baghdad, killing 22 UN staff and visitors, including Mr Sérgio Vieira de Mello, the UN Secretary-General's Special Representative for Iraq (see Section 9.2).[109] One member of DFID staff was slightly injured.[110]

168. Later the same day, Mr Benn held a meeting with officials to discuss next steps and review the status of DFID staff in Iraq.[111] Dr Nicola Brewer, DFID Director General Regional Programmes, stated that it would be "unfortunate if DFID precipitated a withdrawal of staff from Iraq". The department should say publicly that it would not be "intimidated" by terrorism, but any member of staff who wanted to leave should be allowed to do so. Staff employed on contracts would need advice. If anyone did want to leave, it would need to be co-ordinated across Whitehall and not perceived as an evacuation.

169. On the night of 19 August, the British Office Baghdad was evacuated to the CPA secure zone after officials received a warning of a possible attack.[112]

170. A second attack on the UN took place on 22 September.[113]

171. Security also deteriorated in the South, with fuel and electricity riots taking place in Basra during August (see Section 9.2).[114]

172. In his memoir, Sir Hilary Synnott wrote that a "shortage of space and squalid living conditions were affecting operations", but, most importantly:

> "… our combined offices and sleeping quarters were clearly unsafe. Although, in those early days, there were no instances of suicide bombs, we were still vulnerable to car bombs, rocket-propelled grenades, mortars, small-arms fire through our windows, siege and sapping. The building adjoined town houses and was flanked by roads on three sides, one of which was next to a canal. The only exit towards a military safe-haven if we were attacked was over a single bridge, which could easily be blocked by any assailants. We had to move.
> "I formally called for separate and independent security reviews by the CPA in Baghdad and by the FCO in London, knowing that they could only agree on the need for us to move."[115]

173. The FCO Senior Overseas Security Adviser (SOSA) and the Director of CHAD OT visited Basra from 18 to 20 August and Baghdad from 20 to 22 August.[116] They reported their findings to an official-level meeting of COBR, the Government's emergency response mechanism, chaired by Mr Graham Fry, FCO Director General Wider World, on 26 August.[117]

174. The two officials described the picture in Baghdad as "relatively reassuring". Overall security and staff awareness in the CPA zone, where the British Office Baghdad would be located for the foreseeable future, had improved, but DFID and the FCO were taking additional steps to reinforce security awareness "as a matter of urgency". Basra was "more alarming". Security at the CPA compound there was "still inadequate".

175. COBR agreed that:

- Staff in Basra should move to more secure locations within Basra Airport until satisfactory physical security measures were in place, subject to Sir Hilary Synnott's agreement that the move "would not compromise the operational effectiveness of the CPA in Basra to an unsatisfactory level".
- The FCO should consider appointing permanent security managers for Baghdad and Basra to provide a rolling review of the threat.
- The Cabinet Office should raise the seriousness of the situation at the next Ministerial meeting on Iraq and "reiterate the need to deploy only those staff deemed essential".

176. Advice prepared by officials for the 28 August AHMGIR did not reflect the COBR conclusions on deploying only "essential" staff.

177. Before the AHMGIR on 28 August, Mr Neil Crompton, Head of the IPU, advised Mr Straw:

> "Concerns about security argue against putting in more staff [in Basra], but holding staff back, or withdrawing staff temporarily, will only compound the problem. The immediate solution is to strengthen security measures in CPA(South) … Civilian staff also need to be provided with a large fleet of armoured vehicles: until these arrive, which will take time, we need more assistance with escorting from the military … Resources for security assets are an issue. But the principle should be that we provide the number of security assets we need for people to do their jobs properly, rather than limit the number of tasks we take on to the number of security assets we have on the ground (as some around Whitehall have been suggesting). This will be expensive."[118]

178. Officials also raised concern about "the unwillingness of US personnel [in Baghdad] to discuss security arrangements … in detail".[119] The UK would need to make its own assessment of the national situation, potentially leading to UK staff being unable to participate in certain CPA activities. The presence and security of UK staff sent to the CPA would "need to be balanced against our responsibilities for the government and reconstruction of Iraq".

179. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event who served in Iraq during the CPA period commented that intelligence on threats and no-go areas should have been disseminated to all civilians. They suggested that the UK had been better at this than the US, but in Baghdad, where the US controlled security, there had been problems with the flow of information.

180. The AHMGIR agreed that the recommendations in the DFID/FCO security review should be implemented as soon as possible.[120]

181. Sir Hilary Synnott told the Inquiry:

> "After the attack on the UN building at the end of August, the Spanish and Japanese Governments ordered their civilians to leave. And on 30 August, of course, the UN ordered their expatriates to leave also. Everybody else stayed. I was told by London to draw up security regulations and to take disciplinary action if they were not obeyed. I replied that I had already drawn up security instructions which we had been testing, and as for taking disciplinary action, I reminded London that I actually had no statutory authority, as far as I knew, over the nationals of another country."[121]

182. On 28 August, Mr Crompton informed Mr Straw that Sir Hilary Synnott had requested 34 secondees for CPA(South).[122]

183. Later that day, the AHMGIR agreed, "subject to security concerns", that: "Hilary Synnott should be given such assistance and staff as he deemed necessary to improve the workings of CPA South."[123]

184. Mr Crompton visited Iraq from 31 August to 3 September.[124] He concluded that "the Coalition as a whole is only just beginning to come to terms with the scale of the task". The "general view" was that the job was "doable", but the UK needed to "throw massive resources at the problem now". UK staffing in the South and the governorates needed to increase significantly. The relationship between the two was "not yet clear".

185. Mr Crompton judged that staffing in CPA Baghdad was "about right", but CPA(South) was "woefully under-staffed". It was clear that the UK would have to fill the positions itself rather than rely on third country nationals or CPA Baghdad. If necessary, the FCO Board of Management should be asked to rule that Iraq was its top priority and that staff willing to go there could be pulled out of existing jobs at short notice.

186. On 2 September, Mr Blair requested advice on how to improve conditions for UK staff working for the CPA and the British Office Baghdad.[125]

187. The FCO advised that improvements were in hand in Baghdad and Basra.[126] Efforts were being made to speed up the move from the CPA building to the former regime palace in Basra, which was expected to be ready by mid-October.

188. On 4 September, the MOD put proposals to Mr Blair for additional troop deployments to the South-East to improve overall security and help accelerate reconstruction (see Section 9.2).[127] In addition to the extra troops, the MOD intended to put an additional Brigade Headquarters on reduced notice to move in order to support other requirements, which were still to be scoped, but included support to DFID-managed critical infrastructure work and the provision of military protection to civilian contractors.

189. Mr Blair agreed the proposals shortly afterwards.[128]

190. On 17 September, Sir Michael Jay informed Permanent Secretaries that:

> "We now have 18 armoured vehicles in Baghdad for travel outside the Secure Zone. By the end of November there will be 68 vehicles in country, including for staff working for CPA in Basra and the Governorate Teams … For each of these vehicles there is a two-man Armed Protection Team (APT). The contractors (Control Risks) now have 72 personnel protecting our staff in CPA and will be providing a total complement of 110 men, including for CPA Basra and the Governorate Teams."[129]

191. In his valedictory report from Basra, Sir Hilary Synnott thanked DFID for procuring a large number of armoured vehicles and civilian protection teams for CPA(South) staff to use: "They have saved several lives from explosive devices."[130]

192. On 22 September, Mr John Buck, the FCO's recently appointed Iraq Director, updated Mr Alan Charlton, the FCO Personnel Director, on staffing requirements in London and Iraq. Mr Buck stated:

> "I understand pressures on staff resources. But there is a real need to get staffing of Iraq work onto a basis sustainable in the medium term. So far, it has understandably been a little hand to mouth. I fear No.10 will not accept our telling them that we can't do things because we don't have the people. So I hope you will be sympathetic if, after a few weeks on the job, I make further bids for staff."[131]

193. At the Iraq Senior Officials Group (ISOG) on 23 September, Mr David Richmond, the Prime Minister's Deputy Special Representative on Iraq, reported that UK "influence in CPA Baghdad is limited; we supply only 100 out of its 1,000 staff there".[132] Mr Richmond recommended that deployment of UK secondees be "continuously reviewed so that they are where we most need them. The UK is still under-represented at senior level; we should continue to seek senior posts as they become available."

194. Sir David Richmond told the Inquiry:

"I don't think we asked for a lot more people. What we wanted was Arabic speakers for obvious reasons, and we had Charles Heatley [CPA spokesman, see Section 10.1] and his successor, both of whom were very good Arabic speakers, but we probably could have done with more."[133]

195. Sir David also observed that "lack of continuity was a far greater problem than a lack of skills".[134]

196. On 15 October, the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) assessed that:

"The security situation remains difficult in central Iraq. The upward trend in the number of attacks against the Coalition Forces (CF) shows no sign of abatement … The vast majority of attacks (some 80 percent) occur in Baghdad and the surrounding Sunni Arab areas … Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs) are the single most common form of attack, some increasingly sophisticated, and we have also seen more mortars being employed.

"The situation in the UK Area of Responsibility in the South remains relatively calm. In the first week of October, out of 174 attacks against CF in Iraq, only four were against troops in MND(SE). The mortar attack against the British base in Basra on 8 October was a serious incident, but the trend continues to be a relatively low level of attacks."[135]

197. In early October, Sir Hilary Synnott reported "markedly improved attitudes throughout the South over the last three months, and especially when compared with the hot humid days of early August when tempers exploded into violence and killings".[136]

198. Sir Hilary told the Inquiry that there was a general impression of improvement in Basra during October and November 2003.[137]

199. In late 2003, a significant number of civilian vacancies in CPA(South) were filled temporarily by the UK military, including by Reservists from the Territorial Army (TA).

200. After a visit to Basra on 2 October, Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces, commented on the time it had taken to set up an effective CPA and the "large number of gapped posts and military personnel doing jobs that should be done by civilian volunteers".[138]

201. On 13 October, Mr Ingram described to Mr Benn, who had replaced Baroness Amos as Secretary of State for International Development on 5 October, the risks involved in using military reservists to address "the precarious situation on CPA(S) manpower".[139] Mr Ingram attached lists of the 48 military staff embedded in CPA(South) and the CPA GTs in Basra, Maysan, Muthanna and Dhi Qar. A total of 35 were Reservists, all but one of them due to leave Iraq by the end of 2003.

202. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secetary, raised the issue of Reservists with Mr Straw on 23 October.[140] The ad hoc filling of vacant posts by military personnel, including Reservists who happened to have relevant skills from civilian life, was "not a robust way to resource such an important body". Mr Hoon stated:

> "… we need to get out of a mindset where the default position is to call on 'spare' military personnel to fulfil roles for which they have not been trained. CPA(S) may well require a higher proportion of civilians than the CPA elsewhere in the country because the roles and capabilities of UK forces do not encompass all of those available within the much larger US Armed Forces. We will, of course, continue to support the overall effort in the South where we can, but the best people for the posts in CPA(S) could well come from a wider range of Whitehall departments and the civilian sector in the UK."

203. On 30 October, the MOD Iraq Secretariat briefed Mr Hoon on options for compulsory mobilisation of volunteer reserves to fill CPA gaps.[141] It advised that Reservists' willingness to take on those jobs was admirable, but it was unfair to employ them in roles for which they had not originally volunteered and for less pay than they would receive as civilians. Their transfer to civilian roles also represented an opportunity cost to the military.

204. The Iraq Secretariat recommended that the MOD wait to see the outcome of the latest FCO/DFID recruitment drive, but also stand ready to provide what assistance it could if that was unsuccessful. Numbers were unlikely to be large ("10s of people"). The Iraq Secretariat stated that an effective CPA(South) was crucial to UK success in the South: "If other avenues have been exhausted it may thus be in our interest to seek Reservists to fill requirements."

205. UK policy on the deployment of Reservists in civilian roles is addressed in Section 10.3.

206. CPA(South) moved from the former Electricity Accounts building in Basra to the Basra Palace site on 15 October.[142] Sir Hilary Synnott wrote in his memoir:

> "It was security which had driven the move and which had ensured that it happened quickly, but it was the improved comfort which everyone appreciated the most.
> "The difference in living conditions seemed almost unbelievable. Instead of sleeping in crowded rooms or on floors, with unspeakable sanitary arrangements and virtually non-existent communications equipment, every staff member had their own cabin … with a proper bed, a cupboard, a shower and lavatory, and even an air-conditioning unit …
> "Within another couple of weeks FCO engineers had installed a secure communications system …

> "At last, two-and-a-half months after my arrival, I was starting to muster the staff and equipment which would enable me to do my job reasonably effectively. This support was as nothing compared with the general's [Major General Graeme Lamb, General Officer Commanding (GOC) MND(SE)] staff, but it was something; and, of course, our respective tasks were different."

207. By late October, Sir Hilary Synnott had received none of the additional staff he had requested in late August.[143] On 27 October, he sent a further request to the FCO.[144] He explained that his initial request for 37 staff had focused on "our top priority areas: infrastructure, finance, police and security". It was now clear to him that 44 more staff were needed to cover "political reporting, governance issues and CPA(S) internal support".

208. Sir Hilary added:

> "I also urgently need assurance that arrangements are in hand for the succession of those UK staff currently in mission. The relatively rapid turnaround of staff makes continuity difficult at the best of times. Gaps between postings, as have happened up to now, can and do seriously undermine progress in specific areas and across the board. Personnel management structures are needed for the replacement of all UK personnel in CPA(S) well in advance of their departure for mission.

"Some other factors are relevant. 18 UK military personnel currently seconded to CPA(S) will be drawn down to zero between now and 28 December. They will need civilian replacements …"

209. On 14 November, Mr Desmond Bowen, Deputy Head of OD Sec, reported to departments that 104 staff from eight countries were working in CPA(South).[145] The largest contributors after the UK were Italy and Denmark. Of the 48 UK secondees, 30 were civilians and 18 military, half of them from the TA. Seven TA personnel were in the process of being re-engaged on civilian contracts.

210. Mr Bowen explained that DFID had contracted the Crown Agents in October to recruit 37 staff: seven to replace Reservists and 30 for new posts. Recruitment had not been easy, despite financial inducements:

"Successful candidates need to have the right technical skills, aptitude for building Iraqi capacity and willingness to work in a difficult environment. When recruited, candidates also need to undergo security training. The Crown Agents should fill 15 of the 37 posts this month, including seven TA personnel who are being re-engaged on civilian contracts. These seven TA posts will be vacant for two to three weeks while the TA officers are demobilised and contracted by Crown Agents … Up to five lesser priority posts are likely to remain more difficult to fill, but Crown Agents are being pressed to locate suitable candidates as soon as possible …

"… Hilary Synnott subsequently asked FCO to fill a further 29 posts. These are in the areas of interior and justice, liaison with the southern governorates, and in the political development directorates. Job descriptions for these posts have now arrived from Basra … It should be possible to fill many of the jobs from Whitehall (eg Home Office), although outside specialists may be necessary for some. There is already a database of volunteers. But the security situation will be a deterrent. Extracting people from current jobs, security training and the logistics of deployment often take longer than we would want. But FCO aim to fill the posts during December and January.

"CPA(South) has now grown substantially, and UK civilian staffing in Iraq as a whole is moving towards the 200 mark. The number of civilians in CPA(South) is larger than in other regions. But account must be taken of the fact that the large numbers of US Army Civil Affairs officers who are available elsewhere are not available in the South."

---

[145] Letter Bowen to Owen, 14 November 2003, 'Iraq: CPA (South) Staff'.

211. Sir Hilary Synnott told the Inquiry:

> "One of my key requests was at the end of August when I asked for, I think, 37 additional expert staff, not generalists but experts, and 20 armoured vehicles. I was sent the record of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Committee [on 28 August], I think within a day of this, and it was recorded there that Synnott should be provided with everything he thought was necessary. That, to my mind, clearly came from No.10 and that was the pattern throughout. The difficulty, however, was turning that political imperative into reality … I put in this bid at the end of August. The task was ultimately given to DFID. I understood that in October they put out a trawl with a deadline of, I think, the end of October for recruitment. By 1 January, 18 out of 37 had arrived."[146]

212. Mr Jim Drummond, DFID Iraq Director from September 2003 to December 2004, described DFID's role to the Inquiry:

> "Sir Hilary Synnott, working with us, identified, I think it was 37 posts that he wanted to have filled, and we agreed to do that.
> "We asked the Crown Agents to source those people from the market, because we didn't at that stage across government have a pool of people that could easily be called upon, although the Iraq Planning Unit based in the Foreign Office had managed to get quite a number of civil servants from Treasury, DFID and across government into the CPA in the early days. But for Basra we were looking really to fund from contractors in the market, partly because we were looking for specialist skills in project implementation that we don't necessarily have full-time in DFID."[147]

213. Mr Drummond explained that some of the jobs were advertised across DFID, but "mostly they were people who came from the market". People had arrived in slightly greater numbers after Christmas because those selected in December had asked for their contracts to start on 1 January.

214. During his farewell meeting with Mr Straw on 11 February 2004, Sir Hilary Synnott said he had been frustrated at the length of time it had taken the FCO to deploy people and provide secure communications. The FCO response had compared unfavourably with that of other departments.[148]

215. Sir Hilary told the Inquiry that Whitehall departments' interpretation of their duty of care towards civilian personnel had been an obstacle to the recruitment of the people he needed:

> "I raised it with the Foreign Secretary, Jack Straw, and we both of us thought that it was a bit odd that our men and women in the armed forces could be exposed to risk. But … we could not risk injury or death to civilians …

"I raised this with the Permanent Under Secretary [Sir Michael Jay] when I got back and I was told that … the Permanent Under Secretaries' Committee … were quite adamant about this: it was an important duty and civilians were different from the military … I think there was some concern about liability of being sued in the event of injury or death.

"A side effect of this was that the interpretation varied within ministries, and there was one occasion in early September 2003 when I discovered that I was short of 17 DFID personnel. They had gone away for a break and they had been stopped by their managers from going beyond Kuwait on the grounds that conditions were too dangerous in Basra.

"Now, we were living and working [in] Basra … The general who is the expert on security had not been consulted, but the managers of DFID had decided that they should not come back. I kicked up a bit of a stink and after quite some time they were allowed back."[149]

216. Efforts to co-ordinate departmental approaches to duty of care are addressed later in this Section.

217. Mr Buck advised Sir Michael Jay that the FCO record was not perfect, but the department had "learned several lessons and gained valuable experience for the future":

- Staffing of the FCO's Iraq operation in London had been "hand to mouth from the start, and only recently received adequate strength, depth and continuity". A properly staffed unit needed to be formed as soon as it became clear the FCO would have to manage a major new overseas deployment, and the FCO needed to accept far more quickly that the requirement would remain for the medium term.
- In London and abroad, the FCO needed to be able to redirect staff "more swiftly and flexibly" and to be able to target officers with suitable qualifications "more systematically than HR records have allowed in the past".
- A "genuinely flexible" budget allocation along the lines provided for the military, possibly controlled by the AHMGIR, would have saved time and energy and prevented the Treasury playing one department off against another. "The only area on which the Treasury have been genuinely helpful has been security."
- In the early stages DFID had not been "fully on side". When it agreed to recruit a large tranche of contractors, it had been slow to implement that commitment.
- The FCO had little previous experience of recruiting contractors, but now had a pool of knowledge to draw from in future.

[149] Public hearing, 9 December 2009, pages 108-110.

- Delays caused by duty of care obligations were "unavoidable", but the Iraq experience would help streamline the process in future.
- Part of the problem in Basra had been uncertainty about what was needed and "requests bounced about quite a bit. It would have made sense to have a senior post-conflict reconstruction expert in Basra working to Hilary Synnott, defining needs from the outset."[150]

218. On communications equipment, Mr Buck explained that a secure communications package and engineer had been deployed to the British Office Baghdad at the outset and a full Firecrest[151] system had been ready to be shipped with the flat pack Embassy in May. Firecrest systems were designed for a large network of posts. Because of the changing set of posts in Iraq, installation in Baghdad and Basra had been delayed until October. The delay had been a "major disadvantage" that made it "difficult for the FCO to establish authoritative leadership". Part of the answer lay in secure laptops. A new position had been created "to co-ordinate and improve emergency deployment of secure IT and communications".

219. Mr Buck advised that most of those points had been fed into the FCO-led review of post-conflict reconstruction (see Section 10.3).

220. Sir Michael Jay commented:

> "I agree with this. There are many lessons to learn from the – wholly unprecedented – Iraq experience; but I don't think Hilary Synnott's criticisms are entirely fair."[152]

221. On 26 October, the al-Rashid Hotel in the Green Zone of Baghdad, used as a Coalition military base, was hit by a number of rockets.[153]

222. The attack killed a US soldier, and injured 15 other people. US Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, who was staying in the hotel, escaped unhurt.

223. One UK civilian seconded to the CPA was seriously injured.[154]

224. Sir David Manning, British Ambassador to the US, described the attack as "the bloodiest 48-hour period in Baghdad since March".[155]

225. Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq, commented: "Terrible news. This is the first time a CPA civilian has been killed in Iraq, a fact that will have serious repercussions."[156]

226. Mr Bearpark told the Inquiry that he viewed the attack as a turning point:

> "… through July, August, September we were optimistic that we were on an upward slope. We had got through the worst of the problems …
> "From September onwards, then the graph just went sharply down. The trigger point … would have been the mortaring of the al-Rashid Hotel."[157]

227. By the start of November, there had been several bombs and rocket attacks in Baghdad, including attacks aimed at the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and at police stations (see Section 9.2).[158]

228. The al-Rashid Hotel bombing led to a review of protective security and staffing levels in Baghdad. Plans were drawn up to provide hardened accommodation for UK civilians.

229. On 28 October, COBR, chaired by Mr Bowen, commissioned an MOD-led review of protective security within and beyond the Green Zone in Baghdad.[159]

230. The preliminary report on 3 November recommended three areas for action:

"a. Improved ballistic protection for UK staff in their place of work and accommodation. This action is required quickly as the threat is likely to worsen in the coming weeks.

b. Improved passage of information and access to detailed threat assessments. Current levels of information are poor and the CPA system for dissemination and action in the aftermath of an incident is inadequate. Greater influence is required from within the system.

c. Consideration of future accommodation options with enhanced ballistic protection. Favoured options will involve some cost and will need to be finessed with the US who are also reviewing their options."[160]

231. COBR also commissioned FCO-led reviews of training, briefing and terms and conditions for UK civilian staff in Iraq, to "ensure that there is consistency across all government departments seconding staff and consultants".[161]

232. The findings of the FCO-led reviews are described later in this Section.

233. Sir Nigel Sheinwald visited CPA(South) in early November.[162] During the visit a number of issues were raised by civilian secondees, including:

- Insufficient security support, limiting mobility of CPA staff (currently only eight protected vehicles for over 60 staff requiring transport).
- Inadequate succession planning (the much praised DoH team particularly complained of this).
- Over-reliance on TA soldiers to perform specialist civilian jobs."

234. On 11 November, Sir Michael Jay advised Permanent Secretaries and the heads of organisations with secondees in Iraq that the FCO was considering "on a contingency basis – whether it would make sense to reduce the numbers of civilian staff if the security situation were to deteriorate; and, if so, which staff we should retain in those circumstances".[163]

235. Sir Michael reported that, in Baghdad, following the recommendations of the review of accommodation after the al-Rashid Hotel bombing, the FCO was pursuing urgently the possibility of constructing accommodation in the basement of the Green Zone Convention Centre. The work could take two to three months, but the FCO was pressing hard for it to be ready before Christmas. In the meantime it was looking at interim arrangements.

236. Sir Michael explained that, to ensure security measures were implemented effectively and threat information disseminated promptly, the FCO had set up co-ordination structures in London, Baghdad and Basra:

> "The London Iraq Security Committee, chaired by the FCO, meets once a week with a secure video link to Baghdad (to be joined by Basra when their video equipment has been installed). Jeremy Greenstock chairs a UK security committee in Baghdad which is linked into a wider CPA security committee. A similar committee is being set up in Basra. Security issues are also discussed at Cabinet Office meetings including COBR, the group of senior officials chaired by Nigel Sheinwald [ISOG] and the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group [AHMGIR], which the Foreign Secretary chairs."

237. Sir Andrew Turnbull and Mr Gus O'Donnell, Treasury Permanent Secretary, discussed UK civilian secondees on 11 November. They agreed that there were roles in the provisional administration in Iraq that would need to continue to be filled, but that security must be tightened appropriately.[164]

238. On 14 November, Mr Drummond approved an expansion of DFID's contract with CRG for "security support services" in Basra and Baghdad.[165] The number of CRG personnel was increased from 16 to 68 and the contract extended to 31 March 2004, reflecting the expected increase in staff numbers in Basra and the recognition that "a permissive security environment will not be a reality for some time".

239. On 24 November, Mr Straw requested £2m from the Treasury for "essential new, secure accommodation for UK civilian staff in Baghdad".[166] He explained that the security review after the al-Rashid bombing had recommended conversion of the ground floor of a car park near the Convention Centre in the Green Zone into secure accommodation. Mr Straw advised Mr Boateng that the work would be completed in January. In the meantime:

> "… ad hoc accommodation for staff is extremely uncomfortable and unsatisfactory from a security point of view. To reduce discomfort somewhat, many staff are now sleeping in vulnerable trailers. We cannot allow this situation to continue any longer than absolutely necessary."

240. Mr Boateng approved the request on 8 December.[167]

241. The IPU briefing for Mr Straw's visit to Iraq on 25 and 26 November included an update on staff security.[168]

242. The IPU explained that FCO Overseas Security Advisers (OSAs) made regular joint visits with DFID to Iraq. There had been four visits since May 2003. The next was scheduled for the turn of the year.

243. The IPU summarised security provision in Baghdad, Basra and the governorates:

> "Mobile Security
> "All travel outside the Secure Zones must be in full armoured convoys with a minimum of two vehicles. There are currently 52 armoured vehicles in Iraq, shared between Baghdad and Basra, and six Governorate Teams. 23 more will arrive in theatre by the end of November. A further 40 will arrive by February. All such convoys include a four-man armed protection team supplied under contract by Control Risks Group (CRG). There are a total of 26 teams, with 104 men. A further six teams will deploy as additional armoured vehicles arrive.
> "Static Security
> "Security for the CPA Green (Secure) Zone in Baghdad is provided by the US military and Global Security (a private British company). The unoccupied British Embassy compound (containing the partially-built flat pack Embassy) and the villa housing the British Office Baghdad are both guarded by a Gurkha contingent supplied under contract with ArmorGroup.

"Following the attack on the al-Rashid Hotel, all other UK civilians in CPA Baghdad are currently accommodated in trailer parks within the Secure Zone. The units now benefit from physical security barriers which protect them against lateral bomb blast. However, they remain vulnerable, particularly to mortar and rocket attack. We now have a green light to proceed with construction of new accommodation under hard cover (new trailers on the ground floor of car park building). This should be complete by mid-January.

"UK CPA civilians required to work outside the Secure Zone (eg in Iraqi ministries) are protected in those locations by an Individual Bodyguard also supplied under contract by Control Risks Group. Security for the CPA headquarters in Basra is provided by the British military.

"Close Protection

"The Head of the British Office (Chris Segar) and IraqRep (Sir J Greenstock) are protected by a … team from the Royal Military Police Close Protection Unit.

"Security in Governorates

"Following last week's attack on the Italian Police compound in Nasariyah, CPA Baghdad launched a review of security in the governorates where UK staff are deployed. This review is moving more slowly than we had hoped … IraqRep have … issued specific instructions to UK staff in the governorates to take extra security precautions. Additional physical security measures such as blast walls, bomb shelters, alarm systems and window protection, are also in the process of being implemented.

"UK staff in the governorates are subject to the same security procedures and discipline as UK staff in Baghdad and Basra (eg armoured cars and armed protection teams). Evacuation plans are being drawn up and tested."

244. Contingency plans for the phased withdrawal of UK CPA secondees in Baghdad were ready by 1 December.[169]

245. Sir Jeremy Greenstock discussed CPA staffing with Sir Michael Jay on 12 December.[170] He reported that "a strong spirit of commitment" among UK secondees contrasted with concern about living conditions in Baghdad and apprehension about the reaction of families in the UK to the dangers to which people were exposed.

[169] Minute Dodd to Sheinwald, 1 December 2003, 'Iraq: Senior Officials Group'.
[170] Minute Jay to Parham, 12 December 2003, 'Conversation with Jeremy Greenstock: Iraq: Staffing Issues'.

Some secondees who had left after the attack on the al-Rashid Hotel were returning, but security was likely to get worse rather than better and required "constant vigilance". Communication from London to Baghdad and Basra, and with families in the UK, was important.

246. Sir Michael Jay told the Inquiry:

> "… some individuals … were rather more gung-ho and rather more prepared to take risks … Some of the DFID people were rather less used than those of us in the Foreign Office or elsewhere, to be working in very difficult conditions. These were completely understandable differences and they never became serious issues, as far as I'm aware … They were the sort of things that I discussed with the Permanent Secretaries concerned, so that we reached agreement on the right approach.
> "… I do remember one or two conversations when some departments were less willing than others to go out into the field. I think that's inevitable …
> "You have got to have … duty of care at the top of the agenda and you have also sometimes got to say to people, 'I know that you say you are willing to do that, but if you get killed, your parents are not necessarily going to thank you for that or thank us.'"[171]

247. At the weekly meeting of Permanent Secretaries on 7 January 2004, Sir Nigel Sheinwald stated that the next six months in Iraq were critical and that it was important the UK maintained the quality of its secondees.[172]

248. The same day, a Treasury official advised Mr O'Donnell on the return of Treasury secondees evacuated after the al-Rashid bombing:

> "Since the rocket attack on the al-Rashid hotel … and subsequent incidents and security threats the contingent of UK economists from HMT (and the Bank of England) seconded to the CPA has withdrawn from Iraq. In part this reflects concerns about the status of the accommodation on offer … it also reflects family wishes …"[173]

249. The official explained that the FCO's conversion of the ground floor of a car park into hardened accommodation was scheduled for completion by the end of January. In the interim, in recognition of the critical importance of Treasury and Bank of England secondees to the restoration of economic stability in Iraq, the UK military had offered accommodation for up to three economists with "a solid roof and very good 'point' security".

250. The official recommended that existing volunteers, who were fully aware of the security risks, be allowed to make preparations for their return, and that new volunteers be permitted to attend a hostile environment course and deploy to Iraq, if their line manager agreed. Because of the timing of courses, new volunteers would not be able to deploy until at least 28 January.

251. On 9 January, Mr O'Donnell's office replied that he was "keen to see HMT people return if the conditions are appropriate and that people who volunteer are made fully aware of, and are trained about, the risks".[174]

252. On 14 January, Sir Michael Jay informed Sir Andrew Turnbull and Permanent Secretaries that the FCO and DFID had 165 civilian staff in Iraq.[175] The total was likely to rise above 200 in June, before falling after the transfer of sovereignty. Sir Michael provided a breakdown of the 165 by employer:

- 37 FCO staff;
- 23 FCO contractors;
- 52 seconded via the FCO from OGDs and the police;
- 5 DFID staff; and
- 48 DFID contractors.

He also provided a breakdown by geographical location:

- 72 in Baghdad:
  - 50 in CPA Baghdad (including 7 in the UK-CPA Co-ordination Cell);
  - 9 in the British Office Baghdad;
  - 8 in IraqRep (the office of the Prime Minister's Special Representative);
  - 4 in the DFID Baghdad Office;[176]
- 77 in Basra:
  - 72 in CPA(South);
  - 5 in the Basra Governorate Team; and
- 16 in other governorates.

253. Sir Michael listed 14 areas of UK civilian involvement in CPA Baghdad:

- policing and SSR;
- oil;
- governance;
- press and communications;

[175] Letter Jay to Turnbull, 14 January 2004, 'Iraq – Civilian Staffing' attaching Paper, 'Iraq: Civilian Staffing'.
[176] The numbers in Sir Michael Jay's list add up to 71, not 72.

- finance;
- immigration and customs;
- infrastructure and infrastructure security;
- civil affairs;
- human rights;
- justice;
- media policy and regulation;
- gender;
- youth and sport; and
- civic education.

He described the spread of functions in Basra as "even wider", given the UK's "overall responsibility" there.

254. Sir Michael explained that the extra staff expected to deploy between January and June were likely to include:

- 30 more secondees to CPA(South);
- a DoH team for CPA(South) and the southern governorates;
- "political process consultants"; and
- FCO staff setting up new diplomatic posts in Baghdad and Basra.

255. Sir Michael anticipated that numbers should fall to between 70 and 80 after the transfer of sovereignty, spread across the British Embassy Baghdad, the British Embassy Office Basra and "possibly" other regional offices. He warned that FCO human and financial resources were stretched, but concluded that plans for the next six months were "sensible – and manageable as long as the necessary resources are available".

256. Sir Michael Jay also updated Permanent Secretaries on security and duty of care on 14 January:

> "We would not normally deploy civilian staff to an area as dangerous as Iraq now is. But Treasury Solicitors have confirmed to the Cabinet Office that we are complying with our duty of care if (i) we take all reasonable measures to mitigate risk, at least on a par with other governments, (ii) staff are volunteers, and we put no pressure on them to take up posts in Iraq, and (iii) we deploy staff for good reason. We are confident we are fulfilling these requirements."

257. On mitigation of the security risk, Sir Michael explained:

> "The CPA itself is responsible for CPA staff security. But our guidelines and additional security assets bring security for British staff up to levels which we believe are required to allow staff to do their jobs while mitigating the risk to an acceptable level. Most importantly, all British civilian staff are required to travel in armoured vehicles and in convoy with armed protection teams … We have to be prepared for the possibility of serious casualties: … people may just be in the wrong place at the wrong time."

258. Sir Michael Jay visited Baghdad from 21 to 23 January. He told Mr Straw:

"There are some tensions on the ground, notably over security, particularly in Baghdad: staff tend to put a greater premium on quality of life … than on security. I believe Jeremy Greenstock's maxim that no British staff should be killed by a predictable attack is right."[177]

259. On 18 February, Mr O'Donnell confirmed to Sir Jeremy Greenstock that, in light of the assurances he had received, "Treasury secondees will be making their way back to Iraq from the beginning of next week".[178]

260. Lord Jay told the Inquiry:

"Flying into Baghdad [in January 2004] in a Hercules which has got red blobs on the radar screens saying 'That's where the missiles were fired the last time round' concentrates the mind a bit … These were not normal conditions. These were, I thought, very brave, very able people from a wide range of government departments doing a fantastic job in very, very difficult circumstances and you come back thinking, 'Gosh! You have really got to focus on their safety. It is hugely important that they continue to do this job as well as they are doing it at the moment.' But you have got to have huge responsibility for their safety."[179]

261. A DFID security assessment of Baghdad and Basra in January 2004 found that:

"With many more armoured vehicles now in country, constraints on the movement of staff have eased over the period but the CRG teams remain fully stretched. Numbers of British staff at both locations (Baghdad and Basra) continue to increase, and extra armoured vehicles and Armed Protection Teams (APTs) are still urgently needed."[180]

262. On 26 January 2004, Mr Straw requested a further £9.4m from Mr Boateng:

"The firm judgement of our security experts is that, without the protection of armoured vehicles and APTs (armed protection teams), it would be too dangerous for our civilian staff to travel outside guarded CPA compounds such as the Green Zone in Baghdad."[181]

263. Mr Boateng agreed the FCO bid in full on 30 January.[182]

264. By 21 April, the number of UK civilians seconded to the CPA had risen to about 260, with approximately 120 each in Baghdad and Basra, and 20 elsewhere in Iraq.[183] Between 70 and 80 MOD civil servants were directly supporting Op TELIC.

The British Offices in Baghdad and Basra

265. During the CPA period, the expansion of the British Office Baghdad and the opening of a British Office in Basra were delayed by the limited availability of security assets and the need to prioritise other UK activities in Iraq.

266. The British Office Baghdad was opened by Mr Segar on 5 May 2003.[184]

267. Originally staffed by a team of four, by late summer 2003 it had eight UK-based staff and a locally employed British Council officer. The Commercial Section was staffed by two UKTI officials and a secondee from industry.

268. The flat pack Embassy arrived in Baghdad on 23 June in 80 containers. It consisted of prefabricated office and accommodation units and was designed to house up to 40 staff.

269. On 18 July, in a letter to Mr Boateng requesting additional funds for security enhancements to FCO posts in Iraq, described earlier in this Section, Mr Straw reported that the British Office Baghdad was assembling the flat pack Embassy under 24-hour sniper watch and would "soon be up to full strength of eight UK-based officers".[185]

270. On 5 August, FCO officials discussed proposals from Mr Segar to expand the British Office Baghdad to 10 UK-based and 23 local staff.[186] Mr Crompton informed Mr Segar that availability of security assets was likely to be "a major constraint" on his expansion plans: "further increases in armed protection teams, armoured cars and other security equipment could only be funded through compensating savings elsewhere". He advised Mr Segar "to think carefully about prioritising".

271. On 19 August, after the bombing of the Canal Hotel, the British Office Baghdad was moved from the former British Embassy compound to a villa in the CPA secure zone.[187]

272. After visiting Baghdad at the beginning of September, Mr Crompton advised Mr Edward Chaplin, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, that there was "a clear and distinct role for a … British Office [Baghdad] to pursue bilateral interests and begin developing long-term contacts".[188] There were also "many opportunities for TPUK and British Council", but expansion plans should be "moderated to match the availability of accommodation and security assets".

273. Further work appears to have halted until early 2004, when the FCO created a project management team in London, with project managers in Baghdad and Basra, to plan the UK's post-CPA representation in Iraq.[189] The planning process is addressed later in this Section.

274. In November 2003, the IPU reported that work on the flat pack Embassy had stopped and that it would shortly be secured and waterproofed "until the security situation is more permissive and work can continue".[190]

275. In July 2003, the FCO put on hold plans to open a British Office in Basra by the end of August in order to focus on strengthening CPA(South).[191] Any staff already identified for the British Office were to be redirected to CPA(South).

276. On 15 July, the IPU recommended to Mr Straw that the FCO establish "a limited form of UK mission in Basra on 1 December 2003 which would be gradually staffed by FCO UK secondees moving across" from CPA(South).[192] The IPU recommended a total of six UK-based staff, including one from TPUK, and an unspecified number of local staff. DFID and the British Council were reported to have indicated an interest in having one representative each.

277. Mr Straw agreed the proposal subject to Treasury approval of the necessary funds.[193]

278. A decision on whether to open a British Office in Mosul was postponed.

279. Mr Julian Metcalfe, Head of FCO Estate Strategy Unit, informed Mr Collecott on 30 July that efforts to identify premises for the British Office in Basra were "turning into something of a joke" because of security constraints and the shortage of staff resources in CPA(South).[194]

280. Two FCO officials visited Basra to identify a suitable location on 30 July, 24 hours after Sir Hilary Synnott's arrival as the new Head of CPA(South).[195] They reported that Sir Hilary had been very helpful, but that, in the absence of FCO staff able to facilitate the visit, it had "bordered on farce at times". Initially they had been told there was no transport or protection available for a tour of the city, but the visit was "saved at the eleventh hour from being a total disaster" by the MND(SE) visits officer and MOD/CPA liaison officer. The officials did not reach firm conclusions on a location and recommended "a more structured visit" soon.

281. Sir Hilary Synnott advised the FCO that December was not soon enough to establish a bilateral presence in Basra.[196] Commercial, visa and consular demands were all increasing. Much as he would like to help, CPA(South) did not have the capacity or the mandate to do so. He therefore recommended the early creation of a small "UK bilateral cell" in Basra.

282. Mr Straw submitted a claim on the Reserve to cover the expected cost of setting up and running the Basra Office in his letter to Mr Boateng on 18 July.[197]

283. Mr Boateng rejected Mr Straw's claim on 9 September, explaining that he "would have expected the FCO to have adjusted their internal Resource Allocation Round at the end of last year" when faced with what was an "increasingly likely" contingency.[198]

284. In November 2003, Sir Nigel Sheinwald advised Mr Blair that the idea of a bilateral UK office in Basra to handle "trade contacts, culture and visitors … fell by the wayside in the summer" and needed to be revived.[199]

285. Mr Blair asked for the FCO to "put in place a British Office in Basra to handle trade contacts, cultural ties, visitors etc".[200]

286. The IPU advised Mr Straw that there would be advantage in revisiting the idea of setting up a small unit in Basra for bilateral work, arranging visits and managing the establishment of a post-CPA British Office, "not least to flag up the resource implications to No.10".[201] Costs could be kept to a minimum by using staff already selected for other roles and providing accommodation on the CPA(South) site. Other Whitehall departments would join as the project developed.

287. On 27 November, the FCO informed No.10 that it proposed to set up a "Bilateral Unit" in Basra run by an FCO official, under the supervision of Mr Henry Hogger, the Basra Governorate Co-ordinator. UKTI, DFID and the British Council had identified staff to work in the new office. If circumstances and resources allowed, the "Bilateral Unit" would oversee the establishment of a substantive "British Transitional Office".

288. Mr Hogger explained on 2 January 2004 that there was "little to report yet on implementing the Prime Minister's wish for the establishment of a British Office in Basra".[202] He hoped that a visit by security experts in January would make progress on identifying possible premises for an "embryonic British Office" and the eventual Consulate. He advised that, in the current security climate, the British Office would almost certainly have to be housed in the CPA/UK military compound, which was already overcrowded.

Preparations for the transfer of sovereignty

289. On 15 November 2003, the Iraqi Governing Council announced an accelerated timetable for the transfer of sovereignty to an Iraqi transitional administration, with the CPA to be dissolved by 30 June 2004 (see Section 9.2).

290. Hard Lessons, Mr Stuart Bowen's account, as US Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, of the US experience of reconstruction between 2002 and 2008, described the impact of the new timetable:

> "Reconstruction plans that had just been devised on a two-year timetable now had to shift, and the rush began to prepare Iraq's government to stand on its own in seven months."[203]

291. On 5 December, Sir Hilary Synnott advised the FCO that the compressed timetable made adequate staffing more important than ever. Recruitment needed to look beyond the dissolution of the CPA. The UK would need to sustain "an intensive development co-operation/technical assistance relationship" with Iraq and "might usefully maintain an international co-ordination role. This will require a careful transitional process with maximum use of acquired experience."

292. Sir Michael Jay visited Iraq from 21 to 23 January 2004 to discuss the implications of the transfer of sovereignty with UK staff in Baghdad and Basra.[204] He discussed his findings with Mr Straw on 29 January.[205]

293. On 6 February, Sir Michael submitted formal recommendations for an Embassy in Baghdad, a Consulate General in Basra and an office in either Kirkuk or Mosul.[206]

294. Mr Straw sent Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, an indication of the estimated costs of post-transition representation on 11 February as the basis for detailed discussions between FCO and Treasury officials.[207] Combined annual running costs for the three bilateral offices were estimated at £37.1m, including £21.7m (58.5 percent of the total) for security.

295. Mr Straw attached a paper setting out the proposed functions of the three offices and estimated staff numbers for Baghdad and Basra:

- Baghdad: 78 resident UK staff (including police and MOD advisers), up to 20 visiting contractors and DFID staff during peak activity, and 55-56 local staff; and
- Basra: 81 resident UK staff (including police), 10 visiting contractors and 30 local staff.

296. The expectation was that it should be possible to reduce UK representation as Iraq stabilised.

297. The paper stated that office infrastructure and key staff should be in place by the end of June. Recruitment of staff and development of sites would begin as soon as agreement had been reached with the US on a number of issues, including the use of potential sites. The plan was to recruit staff for one year if possible, six months renewable if necessary. Recruitment would not be easy. As one incentive, the FCO planned to give staff the option of having their families in Kuwait.

298. The paper also stated that the FCO had created a project management team in London, which had set up a cross-Whitehall Transition Project Management Group including representatives of interested government departments. An FCO officer had been seconded to the State Department transition team and a UK civilian was a member of the CPA Transition Team.

299. Sir Kevin Tebbit explained the arrangements for looking after civilian personnel in Iraq to Sir Andrew Turnbull and Permanent Secretaries on 21 April 2004.[208] There were two categories of civilian employee: MOD civilians deployed as part of Op TELIC, and other staff and contractors, either seconded to the CPA or deployed directly to Iraq, who were “under the wing of IraqRep”.

300. Sir Kevin explained:

> “… the 70-80 MOD civil servants deployed at any one time in direct support of Operation TELIC effectively enjoy the same protection as the military, alongside whom they live and work. They would be unlikely to have to leave, but if they were, the arrangements would be made through the Permanent Joint Headquarters which is part of their reporting chain and also ‘owns’ the military transport assets. This would be fairly straightforward given the numbers involved.

[207] Letter Straw to Chancellor of the Exchequer, 11 February 2004, ‘Iraq: Post-Transition Representation’.
[208] Letter Tebbit to Turnbull, 21 April 2004, [untitled].

> "Of the IraqRep staff (including civil servants and contractors) there are about 120 each in Baghdad and Basra and 20 or so in smaller locations. Most are based in secure locations which are currently protected by Coalition Armed Forces. Protection whilst on the move is normally provided by private contractors. The security guidelines for these staff is constantly under review, based on risk assessment done by full time FCO security managers in Baghdad and Basra. Staff understand that they are volunteers and that they may return to the UK if not comfortable with the security arrangements.
> "In the event that HMG civilians had to be withdrawn from the South, the UK Armed Forces would assist with the evacuation of UK staff, through Basra Airport, by road to Kuwait, or by sea, depending on the operational circumstances. Those in Baghdad would be assisted to leave through the airport. In the outlying areas the US military would assist. Detailed contingency plans are being drawn up."

301. Sir Kevin also commented on concerns expressed by Permanent Secretaries that the withdrawal of civilian contractors could undermine the reconstruction effort:

> "The impact on reconstruction would indeed be serious if contractors began to withdraw, although there is little evidence that this is happening on a large scale. Most companies seem to realise that they must balance their desire to participate in [the] reconstruction effort with the need to look after their staff. Many are reassessing their security arrangements, but look likely to remain … No UK or US funded contractor has withdrawn from Iraq."

302. The Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR on 22 April advised that security had deteriorated "markedly" over Easter (9 to 12 April) and that the risks to UK civilian staff in Iraq were "high".[209] The deployment of civilians had been reviewed and, as a temporary measure, new deployments to Baghdad had been suspended and staff unable operate in the current security environment had been withdrawn.

303. The AHMGIR approved the recommendation that all other staff should remain in Iraq subject to continuing review.[210]

304. The 11 May meeting of ISOG discussed a concern raised by Mr Patrick Nixon, Sir Hilary Synnott's successor as Head of CPA(South), that there would be a gap in reconstruction activity in the South between the end of the CPA and the launch of major infrastructure projects in August.[211] The number of UK reconstruction staff would fall from 51 to seven (see Section 10.1).

305. On 18 May, Mr Philip Parham, Head of the FCO Iraq Operations Unit (IOU), updated Sir Michael Jay on the security of civilian staff in Iraq.[212]

[212] Minute Parham to PS/PUS, 18 May 2004, 'Iraq: Security of Civilian Staff'.

306. Mr Parham reported that, in Baghdad, all staff were accommodated under hard cover, very few road journeys were authorised beyond Baghdad and there was heightened concern about the road between Baghdad Airport and the Green Zone. There was no operational alternative to using the airport road and staff would continue to use it while mitigating risks as far as possible.

307. Security in Basra had deteriorated over the previous two months. Staff were accommodated in soft-skinned CPA trailers, which were being sandbagged to give extra blast protection. Progress had been very slow, but was now being expedited. From 30 June, all staff at the British Embassy Office Basra would be under hard cover.

308. Mr Parham explained that the drawdown of CPA(South) staff would begin in early June as transition approached and that DFID was considering whether to bring forward the departure of experts performing non-essential tasks.

309. Mr Parham also reported on the security of UK staff in other provinces:

- In Nasiriyah, Mr Rory Stewart, Deputy Governorate Co-ordinator, had already been evacuated with the Co-ordinator and the CRG close protection team on 17 May after the CPA compound had come under sustained attack. Mr Parham explained that it would not make sense for civilian staff to return to the CPA office. Instead, a core staff might operate from the Italian military base "as security allows".
- Mr Nixon and the Basra Security Manager would visit Samawah, the capital of Muthanna province, on 19 May to assess whether the Deputy Governorate Co-ordinator, the only UK member of the GT, should remain there.
- The GT for Wasit province, headed by Mr Mark Etherington, was confined to the city of Kut, where US troops were securing the CPA compound. Mr Parham advised that the UK would pull out its staff if US troops withdrew.
- The GT in Kirkuk was "securely established in a well-protected compound".
- In Erbil, Dr Liane Saunders, CPA Regional Co-ordinator, was based in an isolated compound that was "very secure and well-guarded". She was able to operate over a wide area.

310. On 24 May, two UK civilians, an adviser to the Iraqi Oil Ministry employed by the FCO and a CRG employee, were killed by an Improvised Explosive Device (IED) just outside the Green Zone in Baghdad.[213]

311. An initial ban on staff movements outside the Green Zone introduced after the attack was lifted on 26 May.

312. ISOG instructed the FCO, MOD and DFID to review staff deployments, and the FCO and MOD to speed up the delivery of Electronic Counter-Measures (ECMs) against remotely controlled IEDs, which had been on order for "some time" and were now urgent.

313. IED counter-measures are described in more detail in Section 14.1.

314. On 27 May, Mr Stuart Jack, Mr Parham's successor as Head of the IOU, advised Mr Straw:

> "… we are currently at the limit of technical measures we can apply to protect staff in Iraq. They have armoured cars and armed protection … All staff have body armour and helmets. Everyone in Baghdad now sleeps under hard cover … security managers are constantly reviewing the threat and apply the security guidelines robustly; if travel becomes too dangerous, staff are required to remain in the secure zone. It would be difficult to do much more and still allow staff to carry out their jobs."[214]

315. Mr Jack identified three options for "further minimising" risk to staff:

> "(i) We could bring forward departure dates for those staff scheduled to leave in June, as DFID are planning.
> (ii) We could delay the deployment of new staff going out to fill jobs at the Embassy.
> (iii) We could reduce our presence in Baghdad."

316. FCO security advisers visited Baghdad and Basra again from 14 to 20 June. Mr Millett reported that the threat was higher than on the advisers' previous five visits. Security within the secure zones was good, but transport security remained the main problem.[215] He stated:

> "We have now reached the limit of what we can do to protect staff in Iraq … [I]f the numbers of attacks increase further, we have nowhere else to go …
> "We must ensure the numbers of staff are kept as low as possible consistent with achieving our strategic objectives in Iraq. We also have to ensure that we keep the contingency plan up-to-date for evacuation by the US and/or UK military."

317. Mr Richmond reported on 17 June that the threat to staff in Baghdad was at its highest level since April 2003.[216] Journeys outside the Green Zone were only being approved under exceptional circumstances, seriously handicapping operational capacity (although work to support the Prime Minister's Office and some other programmes were continuing). He had asked all staff who were not staying beyond 30 June to leave by 21 June.

318. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event commented that, although it was difficult to arrange travel to meetings outside the Green Zone in Baghdad from mid-2004, it was equally difficult for Iraqis to attend meetings inside the Green Zone. Iraqis did so at significant personal risk and did not understand why their UK interlocutors appeared to be so risk averse. The participants reported that similar conditions prevailed in Basra from mid-2006.

319. In March 2004, Mr Jack completed a review of the FCO's worldwide security strategy, commissioned in response to the attack on the UK Consulate General in Istanbul in November 2003.[217] The terms of reference were: "To review the basis for the FCO Security Strategy. In particular to re-examine the balance between security and operational effectiveness." Mr Jack's review identified risk management as the most important tool available to identify the measures needed to meet the FCO's duty of care to staff.

320. The FCO Board endorsed the main conclusions of the review on 26 March.[218]

321. In late June 2004, the FCO advised staff of the review's conclusions, including that, although total risk avoidance was unrealistic, risk management was fundamental to striking a balance between security and operational effectiveness, and to the prioritisation of security resources.[219] The FCO's Security Strategy Unit was reported to be developing a risk matrix to help inform decisions in posts.

322. On 23 June, DFID officials sought advice from Treasury Solicitors on draft guidance on DFID's duty of care responsibilities in Iraq.[220] Treasury Solicitors confirmed that:

> "… DFID, in common with all other employers, owes its employees a duty to take reasonable care for their physical and mental health and safety in all the circumstances of the case so as not to expose them to unnecessary, reasonably foreseeable risk of personal injury or death …
>
> "What DFID must do in order to comply with the duty of care depends on what is reasonable in all the circumstances, which include not only its own knowledge of the risks but also the degree of control it has over its employees given where they are, their experience and the nature of their work.

"Should DFID's employees be in Iraq at all, given current circumstances? The answer is that DFID is free to employ its employees on work which will expose them to unavoidable risk of injury or death (ie against which it cannot guard by taking precautions); and, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, the risk is held to be with them and not with DFID. The law, however, requires DFID to use all reasonable care to diminish any inherent dangers, if it cannot eliminate these; and, if (as I presume to be the case here) it cannot effectively eliminate the dangers so that significant risks remain, it may be required to give its employees such information which is available to it to help them evaluate properly the benefits of being in Iraq against the risks. However, such a duty is more likely to arise where the risks are not common knowledge (which I would say they probably are here).

"DFID is not legally obliged to provide staff of consultancy organisations with the same level of support as it gives its own employees. Nor is it required by law to underwrite the steps taken by NGOs to support their staff working in Iraq."

323. On 29 July, Treasury Solicitors added that DFID should "consider carrying out formal, periodic risk assessments as a further safeguard, and amending advice and procedures as a result of any relevant risks identified".[221]

324. The first version of the DFID guidance on duty of care seen by the Inquiry is dated January 2005.[222] It stated:

"DFID has a responsibility to take reasonable measures to protect its employees from risk of injury (physical, psychological) or death … DFID does not guarantee that an employee will not be injured … In taking reasonable care, DFID will only be liable if there is some lack of care on its part for failing to prevent something that was reasonably foreseeable …

"All employees have a duty to take all reasonable steps to mitigate any risks to their safety and security to which they are exposed …

"All UK-based DFID staff visiting or working in Iraq are volunteers and are under no obligation to travel to Iraq and can leave Iraq at any time without penalty …"

325. On the question of DFID's obligations to non-DFID staff, the guidance stated:

"Individual consultants are not the employees of DFID and are ultimately responsible for their own well-being and security arrangements … However, bearing in mind the prevailing security conditions and difficulty of working in Iraq, DFID aims to provide solo and singleton consultants with the same levels of security, logistical and counselling support as it does its own staff …

> "Consultancy organisations are responsible for the well-being and security arrangements of their staff deployed to Iraq. Consultancy organisations are strongly advised to follow the same rules and procedures as DFID does for its own staff …
> "The responsibility for duty of care provisions and the security of NGO employees working in Iraq is held by the NGO. DFID will offer to meet the reasonable costs of providing the same level of security to NGO staff working on a DFID-financed project as DFID does for its own staff."

The post-CPA UK civilian presence in Iraq

326. On 1 July 2004, officials informed the AHMGIR that the British Embassy Baghdad and "Consulates" in Basra and Kirkuk had started operating.[223] Baghdad was reported to have 75 staff, Basra 47 and Kirkuk three.[224]

327. The FCO predicted that numbers in Baghdad would grow to "around 100 UK staff, of whom over half will be consultants to Iraqi ministries and advisers on Security Sector Reform".[225] The British Embassy Office Basra would consist of "around 80 UK-based staff, of whom around 60 will be consultants and security sector advisers".

328. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event told the Inquiry that those arriving in mid-2004 felt a clear disconnect between the CPA, whose staff were shutting up shop and anxious to be home, and what followed. Knowledge acquired by CPA personnel was not passed on and commercial rivalry between old and new contractors damaged continuity.

329. The security situation deteriorated as the number of civilian personnel rose.

330. On 12 July, Mr Simon Collis, the new Consul General in Basra, described security as "the greatest immediate preoccupation".[226] He added:

> "As we prepare to move beyond the bare essentials of an office, a secure perimeter, accommodation in hardened containers and a canteen – none yet fully in place – our duty of care requires that, after security, morale must be a high priority. Access to social amenities is currently less than any post I have seen …
> "Rapid staff turnover (the tour cycle, with breather visits, leaves only five months in post before moving on) means there is a lack of institutional memory. And as yet there is no cadre of experienced local staff to provide continuity …

inception phase … We have an excellent team here. And the Consulate [the British Embassy Office] will be a fine building when completed."

331. Mr Collis told the Inquiry:

"Security was the most important factor, and by several orders of magnitude more significant than any other single constraint, because it made it much more difficult to tackle any of the other constraints."[227]

332. On 5 August, Mr Collis reported that the detention on 3 August of four members of the Office of the Martyr Sadr (OMS) militia had increased tension between the Sadrist militia and the MNF in Basra City, Maysan and Nasiriyah.[228]

333. The tension was such that Mr Collis considered there was "a fair probability of mortar attack attempts on British bases tonight, possibly including our Consulate".

334. The British Embassy Office was locked down in mid-August.[229] Mr Collis reported that, with the help of the military, staff were able to fly out on recuperation breaks using spare seats on helicopters visiting the military compound in Basra. They then transferred to military flights from Basra Airport to Kuwait. Staff were not yet using that route to return to the compound.

335. The British Embassy Office Basra was locked down at least three times in the second half of September, including:

- after further OMS attacks on 17 and 18 September;[230]
- after an attack on the Basra Palace site on 22 September;[231] and
- after attacks on international civilian vehicles in Basra on 28 September.[232]

336. On 29 September, there were three rocket attacks on the Basra Palace site, including a direct hit on the British Embassy Office.[233]

337. On 21 September, Mr Dickie Stagg, FCO Director General Corporate Affairs, reported on a short visit to Baghdad and Basra.[234] He informed senior FCO officials, including Sir Michael Jay and Mr Sawers, that he had been impressed by the "resilience and good spirits of staff (many of whom extend beyond six months) in exceptionally testing circumstances". Mr Stagg concluded:

"a) We need to review constantly the number of staff in both posts to ensure that they all really can add value, in a situation in which movement off compound is so constrained. Nobody should be there unless we are clear their role is critical to the achievement of our (very important) goals in Iraq. I am sceptical about the impact of those trying to help the Iraqis reform their ministries on the basis of 2-3 meetings a week. Similar work in Sofia[235] (a much less difficult environment) was impossible without having people working in the ministries full-time.

b) We must have adequate security staff in both posts. I wasn't convinced that the arrangements in Baghdad are adequate …

c) We need to have a contingency plan for how to handle things if many fewer staff (at all grades) were willing to serve in Iraq because of the security situation …"

338. Sir Andrew Turnbull and Sir Michael Jay discussed security in Iraq at their bilateral meeting on 29 September.[236] Sir Andrew expressed concern about the situation in Basra. Sir Michael said that it would be necessary to reconsider the terms on which staff from different departments were in Iraq.

339. Mr Collis reported on 30 September that arrangements were being made to provide military escorts for CRG vehicles and to restrict movements to certain times of day.[237] He also reported reduced availability of the military air bridge to Basra Airport that had been used in August. Staff remained under instructions to use hardened buildings only and to carry body armour when moving around the Basra Palace site at night.

340. The number of DFID contractors in Baghdad grew throughout 2004.[238] By October, the number of DFID contractors in Basra was also rising, reversing the significant drop in numbers at the end of the CPA period.

341. On 8 October, FCO Iraq Directorate briefed Mr Straw on the latest assessment of the risks to FCO staff and the measures being taken to minimise them.[239] Officials reported that the direct threat had heightened just as the number of UK civilians had increased with the deployment of extra DFID contractors. The FCO was "reaching the limits" of its ability to increase effective protection.

342. Officials reviewed the situation against contingencies that would trigger a reduction in the numbers of staff exposed to the threat:

> "In Baghdad: a deterioration in security within the International Zone; a redrawing of its perimeter to place the Embassy at its edge …; an increase of accurate strikes from rockets or mortars; loss of control of the airport road; or a CBW threat.
> "In Basra: use of SAMS [surface-to-air missiles] in a manner that removed the scope for evacuation by air; an increase of accurate mortar or rocket strikes; more sophisticated attacks on vehicles; or a CBW threat."

343. Officials concluded that, in Basra, a rocket attack on the British Embassy Office had triggered one of the contingencies. In consultation with other departments, the FCO had initiated a limited withdrawal of less essential staff and DFID had postponed several new deployments, largely because proposed work in the governorates was not possible in current circumstances.

344. Officials reported that, in Baghdad, the contingencies had not been triggered, but the Embassy was reviewing staffing levels. DFID had reviewed its staffing in Baghdad and planned a net reduction of six consultancy posts. Some work would be based outside Iraq with shorter visits to Baghdad, but core work with the Iraqi Prime Minister's Office and on economic reform and support to civil society would not be affected.

345. An easing of the security situation in Basra during November came to an end with a rocket attack on the Basra Palace site on 4 December.[240] Mr Collis reported that staff had reverted to carrying body armour when moving outside after dark, but that the Consulate Club, which had been housed in a portakabin, had reopened in a hardened location on 5 December.

346. Further low intensity and inaccurate attacks continued throughout December.[241]

347. During 2004 and 2005, UK civilian personnel in Iraq became increasingly dependent on military assets for transport between and within Baghdad and Basra.

348. On 27 November 2004, after a series of attacks on the road to Baghdad Airport, the US Embassy announced the suspension all road travel to the airport by civilian staff.[242] Until further notice, they would travel by helicopter.

349. Mr Chaplin advised the FCO that the removal of US civilian vehicles from the airport road would raise the threat to UK road travel to an unacceptable level. US helicopters had no spare capacity and UK helicopters were committed to military operations. For the Embassy's operations to be sustainable, it needed its own helicopter assets.

350. The UK military offered help in the short term where Embassy requirements matched its plans, but was not in a position to provide a regular service.[243]

351. On 1 December, the Chiefs of Staff agreed an FCO request for helicopter support to the British Embassy Baghdad.[244]

352. Sir Kevin Tebbit informed Sir Michael Jay that the military would provide the best service it could over the next couple of weeks and was looking at the possibility of making additional helicopters available from Northern Ireland.[245]

353. Mr Straw raised the issue with Sir Nigel Sheinwald, who told him Mr Blair would be ready to write to the MOD to ensure its support continued.[246]

354. The FCO Senior Overseas Security Adviser (SOSA) visited Basra and Baghdad in March 2005.[247] Security arrangements at both posts were reported to be "first class". All staff were said to have confidence in the security arrangements, which allowed them "to work with a reasonably comfortable feeling in a very hostile environment". Two issues were highlighted:

- A continuing shortage in Baghdad and Basra of ECMs for preventing remote detonation of IEDs. Additional suites of ECMs had been ordered, but more were needed.
- A substantial reinforcement of US patrolling along the Baghdad Airport road since the beginning of 2005. If the number of incidents along the road remained low, the British Embassy might be able to re-assess whether it could be used again.

355. In May 2005, in his valedictory as Head of the IPU, Mr Crompton advised:

> "… we need to sell the notion that military assets (particularly transport) belong to HMG as a whole and that decisions on how they are used are determined by HMG, rather than MOD/PJHQ on the basis of military priorities, occasionally in ways which have not best served wider HMG objectives".[248]

356. Section 9.4 describes the further deterioration in security during the second half of 2005, at the same time as the Government started to discuss the consequences for civilian activities of the planned drawdown of UK military forces from southern Iraq.

357. On 15 July, the Iraq Strategy Group (ISG) considered a draft paper to be signed by Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, on operational transition in Iraq (see Section 9.4).[249]

358. The paper described a process in which Iraqi Security Forces would take primacy province by province. The transfer would be implemented from October in Maysan and Muthanna provinces. Basra and Dhi Qar would follow in spring 2006. This would lead to a reduced profile for UK forces, and reductions in numbers to around 3,000 by summer 2006.

359. After a discussion, the ISG concluded that the paper needed to cover more clearly the implications for other government departments and international actors.

360. In the revised paper, sent to No.10 on 18 July, Dr Reid stated that the drawdown could have an impact on the broader UK and international effort in the South:

> "It is also possible that other (FCO and DFID) activity in Iraq aimed at developing the Iraqi police service and reconstruction will need to be curtailed or reduced, with consequent implications for HMG's wider effort, because of the difficulties of running projects without UK military support and protection. This will need to be looked at in more detail with Other Government Departments."[250]

361. Dr Reid's paper also recognised that, although the drawdown was likely to deliver a significant cost saving to the military, there could be an increase in costs for others:

> "Other Government Departments operating in Iraq may … face increased security costs as they are forced to seek commercial alternatives to military force protection."

362. The Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy Sub-Committee on Iraq (DOP(I)) agreed Dr Reid's recommendation on 21 July.[251]

363. On 16 September, the IPU advised Mr Straw and Sir Michael Jay that the frequency and sophistication of attacks in Basra were increasing and the British Embassy Office was locked down.[252] The threat was greater than in autumn 2004. The IPU recommended that the number of staff be kept under review and that Sir Michael Jay press the MOD for a dedicated helicopter service.

364. Officials prepared a draft paper for DOP(I) on 27 September advising that civilian activity in the South was "heavily reliant on UK forces for a range of services", such as accommodation outside Basra, helicopter transport and regular intelligence on security threats.[253] Those services could be sourced from private contractors after the military drawdown, though at a lower "level of service" and with increased risk to civilian staff. The UK had spent £19.2m on life support (including £16m on security) in 2004/05. The cost to source those services from private contractors would be at last 80 percent higher.

365. On 29 September, after a further IED attack on a US convoy travelling on a route being considered by the British Embassy Office Basra for road transfers to Kuwait, Sir Michael Jay agreed to the temporary withdrawal of five FCO and contracted staff from Basra.[254]

366. On 30 September, Mr Straw's Private Office sent No.10 joint FCO/MOD/DFID advice on the implications for UK policy of the 17 September "Jameat incident", when two UK soldiers in Basra killed one Iraqi police officer and wounded another, and were detained by the Iraqi authorities (see Section 9.4).[255] Mr Straw's Office advised that paper had been agreed by officials, but had not yet been seen by Mr Straw. The joint paper stated:

> "For FCO, DFID and OGD personnel to operate out of Basra will … require an air bridge (similar to the one in Baghdad) from the Consulate General to Basra airport.
> "We will need to allocate more resources, which might include military resources, to security. The next week, and possibly months, are likely to be rough. Attacks on us are becoming more sophisticated. We will need to protect our staff."

367. A manuscript comment by a No.10 official on an advance copy of the paper shown to Mr Blair stated: "John Reid does not want this [additional military resources for civilian security]."[256]

368. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff (CGS), visited Iraq in early October.[257] His report of the visit referred to the pressure on the helicopter support fleet and the air bridge: "we really need to take stock of our AT [air transport] capability in the round, especially in light of our impending commitment to Afghanistan".

369. In October 2005, Dr Reid sought approval from Mr Des Browne, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, to procure a counter-measure to the threat posed to UK troops by IEDs (see Section 14.1).[258]

370. Ten days later, Mr Benn, who had received a copy of Dr Reid's letter, expressed his support for the proposal, pointing out that it would also "significantly reduce the current threat against UK forces and DFID staff".[259]

371. The FCO SOSA visited Kirkuk, Baghdad and Basra between 10 and 21 November.[260] He reported that:

> "The number of terrorist attacks remains at a high level and continues to be well targeted and professional. The main threat to our staff in Baghdad and Basra is from Explosively Formed Projectiles (EFPs). However, all methods of Vehicle Borne Improvised Explosive Devices (VBIEDs) can be expected in all areas in which our staff operate. Indirect fire attacks are a threat to all our bases and the threat [of] kidnap is high.
> "The Security Managers and CRG are to be congratulated on their professional control of road movement … It is clear that all road moves are subject to risk. The completion of accommodation at the police academies and at the airports in Baghdad and Basra will allow more flexibility. The use of helicopters is vital in order to change the pattern of movements.
> "We recommend that all staff in Basra can move in Warrior armoured vehicles."

372. Growing pressure on military assets created tension between civilian and military personnel.

373. Assistant Chief Constable (ACC) Colin Smith, the UK's Chief Police Adviser in Iraq from May 2005 to April 2006, told the Inquiry that, when the FCO handed over responsibility for operational delivery of Security Sector Reform to the MOD in October 2005 (see Section 12.1), one UK General Officer Commanding (GOC) in MND(SE) "indicated that unless civilian contractors agreed to be carried in 'Snatch' Land Rovers their contracts should be terminated".[261]

374. Chief Constable (CC) Paul Kernaghan, holder of the International Affairs portfolio for the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) from 2001 to 2008, told the Inquiry that duty of care for civilians in Iraq, including police, was addressed on a collective basis in Whitehall and that he only had to intervene twice: to allow police training officers to remain overnight at their training centre; and to prohibit police officers from being transported in UK military Snatch Land Rovers.[262] He insisted that they be transported in better protected vehicles, including Warrior:

> "I know this meant police officers were treated differently from soldiers, but police officers are not soldiers and different considerations apply."

375. Protected mobility is addressed in more detail in Section 12.1.

376. On 16 December, DFID officials recommended to Mr Benn a number of changes to transport arrangements in Basra, including use of Warrior armoured vehicles by DFID staff for mission-critical visits to certain sites in southern Iraq.[263] Until then, DFID staff had travelled in civilian rather than military vehicles because of their lower profile, consistent with the nature of DFID's work.

377. Officials advised Mr Benn that:

> "… the continuing threat from EFPs in southern Iraq fundamentally compromises our ability to complete important projects, particularly in the power and water sectors at acceptable levels of risk."

378. Three days later, FCO officials recommended to Mr Straw "a safe and measured return to road moves" for civilian staff in the South "in order to fully promote HMG objectives".[264] They proposed that, subject to regular review:

- all civilian staff be allowed to travel in Warrior armoured fighting vehicles within Basra, where there was a significant risk from armour piercing roadside bombs;
- UK civilian police officers be able to travel with contracted British Iraqi Police Advisers in their FCO armoured vehicles, escorted by UK military Snatch Land Rovers; and
- road moves in FCO armoured vehicles should restart along the main road from Basra Airport to Nasiriyah and Basra Airport to Kuwait.

379. Mr Straw approved the recommendations on 9 January 2006, provided the rules were subject to regular review.[265]

380. On 12 January, Mr Straw told DOP(I) that he remained concerned about the need to maintain staff morale, particularly in Basra. All departments needed to keep staff morale and welfare under review.[266]

381. On 2 February, DFID officials sought Mr Benn's approval to bring DFID policy on road movements into line with the FCO.[267]

382. Officials updated Mr Benn on security in Basra six days later.[268] Rocket attacks on the Basra Palace site were becoming more frequent and accurate. Three attacks had taken place on 5 and 6 February, without injuries or damage. The FCO and DFID were assessing options for a temporary reduction in staff numbers.

383. Officials also reported that concerns were growing for local staff, who were increasingly fearful for their safety "after reports of intimidation and murders of local staff employed by the UK" and increased tensions surrounding the Shia festival of Ashura. Mr James Tansley, the Consul General, and others had briefed local staff and did not believe there was much substance to the rumours:

> "However, DFID Basra have offered local staff the option of taking time off if they feel unsafe, have advised varying routes for those who do come in and have made arrangements for varying access times and gates to the compound."

384. On 14 February, in a paper for DOP(I), Dr Reid set out transport options for the British Embassy Office Basra and the UK-led Basra Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) after the handover of security responsibility to Iraqi control in Maysan and Muthanna provinces.[269] The options included escorts from security contractors "as now, depending on local threat" and a range of military options including land and air escort.

385. DOP(I) agreed the approach set out in the paper.[270]

Departmental reviews of staffing levels

386. After reviews of personnel safety in response to an upsurge in violence in March 2006, DFID and the FCO concluded that there should be no reduction in staff numbers.

387. On 3 March, following attacks on the British Embassy Baghdad and an upsurge in violence after the bombing of the al-Askari mosque in Samarra (see Section 9.4), DFID officials reviewed personnel numbers in Iraq. They recommended to Mr Benn:

> "DFID should maintain staffing at current levels for now. The FCO security advice is that there has been no significant change to our direct threat levels. We assess that existing staff remain important to the success of our programmes and that each person continues to deliver effective work despite restrictions on movements. We judge that HMG can continue to manage known threats robustly."[271]

388. That advice was restated two weeks later, in keeping with the conclusions of an Embassy audit of staff and security in Baghdad and Basra.[272]

389. Mr William Patey, British Ambassador to Iraq, sent an audit of staff and security to Mr Dominic Asquith, FCO Director Iraq, on 9 March.[273] He reported that all staff appreciated that working in Iraq was not without risk. The UK's safety record was good:

> "Since 2003 we have only suffered two fatal casualties in Baghdad, a DFID oil contractor[274] and a CRG team member. In Basra two CRG personnel were killed by the first Explosively Formed Projectile (EFP) in July 2005.[275]
> "Staff have reacted well to recent events … I have reiterated that all staff are volunteers and if at any time they feel anxious they should make their concerns known. They are free to leave and no-one would think the worse of them. No-one has asked to leave."

390. Mr Patey recommended no change to staff levels in Baghdad:

- Reducing the number of consular staff from two to one would result in no cover during staff absences and leave the Consular Section short staffed during kidnap cases.
- Reducing the size of the seven-strong Management/Security Section would be "folly".
- The Political/Economic/Military Section was large by FCO standards, but so were the demands on it. It could not meet those demands with fewer staff while ensuring they received the decompression breaks to which they were entitled.
- The single Commercial Officer was needed to cover trade promotion and air service matters.
- The Head of DFID Iraq, Mr Tim Foy, "takes security seriously and liaises constantly with us and DFID London". Mr Foy did not think the security situation warranted a drawdown of DFID staff.
- 2006 was "the year of the Police". There was a large Civilian Police Section, but the key UK objective of support to the Iraqi Police Service would have to be curtailed if numbers were reduced.

391. Mr Patey advised that numbers could be reduced In Basra, but that it would have a severe impact on the service offered "while having a negligible effect on the risk". He advised that numbers would have to be cut "drastically" to reduce the risk appreciably.

392. Mr Patey explained that risk assessments were reviewed and amended on a daily basis and in response to each incident:

> "Recent changes have been a more rigorous pre-screening to ensure staff are fit enough to cope with security measures and don't pose a danger to themselves and others; and the provision of fixed accommodation at BIAP [Basra International > Airport] and Basra Air Station. Future challenges include the shrinking of the International Zone [in Baghdad], the gradual transfer of responsibility for security to the Iraqi forces and Transition in MND(SE). We continually assess and evaluate these changes and will not hesitate to recommend changes to the establishment should we deem them necessary, even at the expense of achieving our objectives. Both missions have a robust Contingency Plan that can be invoked quickly to reduce staff numbers. Having reviewed again the two missions I judge that all staff are carrying out, or enabling others to carry out, jobs required of us by our clients in the UK."

393. On 4 April, Mr Tansley reported a "sustained and substantial" rocket and mortar attack on the Basra Palace site during the Queen's Birthday Party reception, with one salvo hitting and damaging a building belonging to the British Embassy Office.[276] No staff were injured. The attack was the fifth on the Basra Palace site in seven days.

394. FCO and DFID officials put advice in parallel to Mr Straw and Mr Benn, recommending a temporary reduction in the number of staff in Basra (five each from FCO and DFID), to be reviewed after two weeks.[277]

395. The IPU explained to Mr Straw that the "security conditions generally in Basra City have made it impossible for some staff to continue working effectively (the key criterion for their presence)". A review of staffing levels had concluded that it was "debatable whether the benefits of retaining them are commensurate with the risks faced".

396. At the ISG on 7 April, Sir Nigel Sheinwald observed that the drawdown of civilian staff from the Basra Palace site was a significant development and asked the FCO and DFID to "consult more widely than their respective Secretaries of State".[278]
The subsequent advice to Ministers should make clear that:

> "Set against the issue of not keeping people somewhere they could not operate, there was the problem of re-entry [of civilian staff] and the political or practical fall-out of the UK being driven out of the Basra Palace by terrorists. A decision to locate our civilian presence at the airport would represent a major failure."

397. Sir Peter Ricketts, UK Permanent Representative to NATO and FCO PUS-designate, visited Baghdad and Basra from 5 to 7 April.[279] In his visit report on 10 April, he endorsed the FCO recommendation.

398. Sir Peter described staff as "highly committed and motivated … well led and managed, doing important work with great enthusiasm and adaptability".

399. Sir Peter reported that, although security was a major preoccupation in Baghdad, the threat from indirect fire seemed to be lower than in Basra and the ability to move around the Green Zone reduced the sense of claustrophobia. The arrangement with the RAF for guaranteed helicopter hours[280] seemed to work reasonably well, although there were some serviceability problems with the helicopters.

400. In Basra staff felt "pretty beleaguered". The main complaint was the difficulty getting in and out:

> "It often takes two or even three days for staff to get to/from Kuwait, given the frequent delays or cancellations in the helicopter flights to Basra airport, and then the uncertainties of the RAF surf flights up to Baghdad and then on to Kuwait. This is intensely frustrating as well as inefficient, and is leading some staff to consider not taking breather breaks because of the hassle."

401. Sir Peter recommended taking up the issue with the MOD at a high level. The Basra team perceived that the service had reduced recently because of other operational pressures on MOD assets:

> "It must be in the MOD's interests to ensure the viability of the Palace Compound, given the need for an overall plan in the South. Perhaps we should look again at contracting for a specified number of helicopter hours per month (as in Baghdad). Failing that, I wonder whether there might be a commercial solution …"

402. Sir Peter concluded with a suggestion that, after a period of heavy capital investment and a big increase in staff, there was probably scope "to start squeezing down on running costs, eg for the security contracts".

403. On 12 April, Mr Richmond, now FCO Director General Defence and Intelligence, and Mr Asquith discussed the Basra air bridge with Lieutenant General Nicholas Houghton, Chief of Joint Operations (CJO), who had returned from Iraq in March.[281] Mr Richmond and Mr Asquith explained that:

- The FCO would need "much greater confidence in the reliability of air transport" between the Basra Palace site, Basra Airport and Kuwait if it was to keep the staff drawdown to levels that did not have a significant impact on the UK's ability to achieve its objectives.
- Long delays were preventing staff engaged in the SSR programme from carrying out their objectives.
- They "suspected that the problem was a mixture of military priorities and resources". It was essential that the military viewed the operation in Basra as "a team effort".

404. Lt Gen Houghton undertook to investigate the causes of the delays. He advised that if it was a resource problem, it could probably be resolved only at Ministerial level.

[281] Minute Asquith to PS/PUS [FCO], 13 April 2006, 'Basra'.

405. Mr Asquith informed Sir Michael Jay that FCO officials were looking again at the possibility of a private sector provider for the air bridge service and exploring the possibility of using a proposed US military air bridge between the Basra Palace site and Kuwait.

406. On 20 April, FCO and DFID officials recommended the return of a small number of staff pending a further review in another two weeks.[282] Their advice drew on the views of Mr Robin Lamb, Mr Tansley's successor as Consul General, who recommended a two-stage return, reflecting a reduction in indirect fire over the previous weeks, but also the continuing constraints on staff mobility and their ability to work effectively.[283]

407. Sir Michael Jay approved the phased return to normal staffing in Basra on 15 May, after a brief delay while officials considered the implications of the shooting down of a UK military helicopter in Basra on 6 May (see Section 9.5).[284] Sir Michael instructed that:

> "… the security situation needs to be kept under constant and active review (as I know it is), and we should be ready to draw down again if the security situation deteriorates to the extent that staff are unable to carry out their duties, or if we judge the risk simply too great for them to stay."

408. DFID officials recommended to Mr Benn that DFID also return to full staffing, but explained that numbers would not rise substantially because DFID's programme in the South was "less labour-intensive" than six months earlier.[285] They stated that:

> "Numbers will be kept at the current level of eight with an occasional rise to 10 or 11 to account for overlap in rotations. This would mean a breakdown of two out of three DFID staff and five out of the nine consultants at the [Basra] Palace with a maximum of three DFID staff and seven consultants during handover periods … Visitors would be additional to those numbers. Essential visits only will go ahead, by no more than two visitors and for a maximum of four days at a time."

The Basra Provincial Reconstruction Team

409. Many of the problems the UK had encountered with the deployment of civilian personnel since 2003 resurfaced with the opening of the UK-led Basra PRT in May 2006. Those included:

- rapid turnover of staff;
- civil/military co-operation; and
- departmental co-ordination.

410. The Basra PRT was established on 14 May 2006 (see Section 10.2).[286] Its first Head was Mr Mark Etherington, previously Governorate Co-ordinator of Wasit province.

411. Mr Etherington reported on 17 May that the established strength of the PRT was 35, drawn from the UK (FCO, DFID, MOD and the inter-departmental Post-Conflict Reconstruction Unit (PCRU)), Denmark and the US.

412. Mr Etherington described the "substantial" challenges facing the PRT in Basra. He judged that:

> "… we have but one chance properly to configure and launch the PRT in order to maximise the chances of its success. For this reason we would wish to retain in theatre for as long as possible those resources that are already here …
> "… The key to the PRT's capabilities will be the retention of a core of long-term civilian expertise in each envisaged work strand. Basra is our main problem and the notion of withdrawing valuable staff as the PRT gears up to tackle it is counter-intuitive."

413. Mr Etherington advised that:

> "The PRT, because of its integrated civil-military structure, has continued to function despite the difficult security environment. The military component is able to travel when the civilian component cannot … In the event of a protracted deterioration in security terms, the PRT would also be forced to cease military capacity-building efforts in Basra; and it is probable that our Iraqi partners would be reluctant to continue meeting us. In these circumstances the PRT would have to suspend its work altogether until security was restored."

414. In August and September 2006, the US Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction (SIGIR) examined whether PRTs were "fully empowered, staffed and resourced to meet their mission, and to identify any other barriers impeding achievement of the PRT mission" (see Section 10.2).[287]

415. The SIGIR audit, published on 29 October, concluded that the creation of 10 PRTs and eight satellite offices was a "noteworthy achievement", but that many obstacles to effective operation remained, including insecurity, a lag in funding, the difficulty of recruiting and retaining qualified civilian personnel, and the difficulty of integrating civilian and military personnel.

416. The audit stated that the unstable security situation in Basra meant that PRT members had not been able to interact personally with their Iraqi counterparts, significantly limiting the Basra PRT's ability to achieve its mission. It questioned

"whether the continued deployment of PRT personnel to … Basra … makes operational sense at this time".

417. More widely, the report stated that, because of the US Government's difficulties in recruiting civilians to serve in PRTs, a majority of positions were initially filled by military civil affairs personnel. In September 2006, of 128 positions allocated to civilians, 77 had been filled; of the 163 allocated to the military, just two were vacant.

418. The Inquiry has seen no evidence that the SIGIR audit was seen or considered by UK officials.

419. In a review of the first eight months of the Basra PRT commissioned by the PCRU and produced in March 2007, Mr Etherington made a number of recommendations, including:

- Key staff should be held to a minimum of one year tours, with the requisite adjustments for welfare and travel. The repeated and cyclical loss of experience in south-east Iraq [in] 2006 was damaging.
- Where integrated bodies such as the PRT are raised in future, they should be recruited or sub-contracted by a single authority and to a single contractual template, with clear procedures established for grievance and misconduct. Ideally such groups would train together … and move to theatre as a formed body. That single authority would also be financially and administratively responsible for the operating requirements of the group."[288]

420. Mr Etherington added:

> "The lack of clarity regarding ownership of the PRT caused substantial administrative difficulty, for the PRT disposed of no assets of its own and no single department believed itself responsible for it …
>
> "Unlike other PRTs in Iraq, the UK-led team was assembled in large measure from existing effort … While this conferred valuable operational momentum and expertise on a new team it significantly complicated administration, because the team had to merge a wide array of existing contracts, leave schemes, equipment, security procedures and cultures while lacking any defined mandate to do so.
>
> "The administrative world which the PRT was forced to inhabit was always difficult, and verged in the early months on Kafka-esque. An FCO car in the Iraq support team at Kuwait airport would not pick up the inbound PCRU-contracted PRT office manager – or book her hotel – because she was 'not an FCO responsibility'."

[288] Paper [unattributed], 26 March 2007, 'The Establishment and Operation of the Basra Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT), April 2006 – January 2007: Lessons Identified'.

421. Mr Etherington singled out staffing as the best illustration of the difficulties faced by the PRT:

> "… the commercial company Enterplan fielded the bulk of consultants for DFID; which in turn seconded them into the PRT. Perhaps understandably, the consultants … tended to look to either or both of their original employers for guidance and recourse; and this divided loyalty persisted because UK departments, upon whom the PRT concept had largely been forced, were lukewarm about the idea and seconded none of their civil servants into the team, preferring to retain separate departmental structures … While this undoubtedly exposed companies like Enterplan to risk – after all, it was they who were contractually bound to individuals – it also allowed them undue influence in theatre and allowed the possibility that conflicts of interest might arise. In the only instance of the period in which misconduct proceedings were initiated these difficulties became obvious.
> "The PRT consisted, at peak, of staff on seven different kinds of contract … and the cumulative effect of managing … [different] leave schemes, together with a range of other frictions, was to make the maintenance of momentum almost comically difficult.
> "The sheer throughput of staff exacerbated this difficulty. This tended to be because parent agencies and departments tended to move 'their' people in and out of theatre without reference to PRT management …
> "PRT staff varied widely in calibre and disposition …
>
> "The Post-Conflict Reconstruction Unit (PCRU) contribution of core staff such as a communications and IT expert and office manager proved invaluable."

422. PCRU support for the Basra PRT is addressed in Section 10.3.

Reassessment of risk and duty of care

423. At the end of May 2006, the FCO SOSA reviewed security in Baghdad and Basra with a DFID security official.[289]

424. Mr Andrew Noble, FCO Director of Security, reported the outcome to Mr Nigel Casey, Head of the IPU:

> "The starting point for the review remains that the security risks to which our staff are exposed in Iraq are extreme by normal diplomatic standards. All plausible security measures are being put in place to provide as great a degree of assurance from attack as possible. But we are operating at the limits of what can be achieved, consistent with running a diplomatic mission. In such an extreme environment, the likely consequences of an accident or a piece of bad luck could make the difference between life and death. SMD's [Security Management Directorate's] clear assessment is that it is more a question of when there is a fatality amongst our diplomatic staff, rather than if. This assumption needs to be shared or challenged by the risk owners."[290]

425. The main findings included:

- Significant deterioration in the security of UK posts: in Basra, because of insufficient military protection; in Baghdad, because of the increasing threat from extremists.
- An increasing threat of kidnap. FCO security officials were looking at providing key staff with transponders to detect their location in case they were captured.
- The SOSA's judgement that senior staff were facing "undue political pressure to 'produce the goods' which could lead to the acceptance of inappropriate levels of risk". Security managers and heads of close protection teams were "acting as a constraint on senior staff movements to risky areas".
- Signs of speculation in other government departments about moving "off-shore" because of the "nearly impossible operating environment".

426. On 12 June, Sir Michael Jay updated Mrs Margaret Beckett, who had succeeded Mr Straw as Foreign Secretary in early May 2006:

"We have always been aware of the risks of operating in Iraq. Because of the political importance to the UK of our work in Iraq, we have judged it acceptable to tolerate a higher level of risk there (and in southern Afghanistan) than elsewhere in the world. But our duty of care towards our staff, and towards those from other government departments who work in our posts, remains.

"We invest considerable resources in reducing as far as is possible the risk to our staff, and all those for whom we are responsible. We have in place robust structures to manage and mitigate risk, which are subject to constant review, in response to changes in the situation on the ground. We recognise, however, that there remains a residual level of risk in operating in such an extreme environment, against which we cannot wholly protect ourselves."[291]

427. Sir Michael listed the four conditions for any FCO member of staff working in Iraq:

- All staff must be volunteers;
- They must be fully aware of the security risks;
- We must do all we reasonably can to reduce the risks they face;
- Conditions on the ground must be such that staff are able to do their jobs effectively."

[291] Minute Jay to Foreign Secretary, 12 June 2006, 'Iraq: Security of Our Posts in Baghdad and Basra'.

428. Sir Michael informed Mrs Beckett that, in response to the SOSA's report, he had asked for another review to look at "the context for our operations in Iraq; our broad approach to the risks we face; the structures and procedures we have in place to manage the risks; the extent to which these are being observed in practice; and whether these satisfy our legal obligations towards our staff". He hoped that the review would "enable us to satisfy ourselves that an acceptable basis for continuing our operations in Iraq remains".

429. Sir Michael also advised Mrs Beckett that Mr Patey and Mr Lamb "both rejected entirely the suggestion that 'senior staff in our missions are facing undue political pressure to produce the goods'". Mr Patey was clear that the advice of professional security advisers on the ground had never been overruled.

430. Staff in Basra remained concerned about the unreliability of the Basra air bridge.[292] A visiting member of FCO HR Directorate reported that the air bridge was affecting people's ability to do their job, "adding to the angst" of decompression breaks and final departures:

> "My own inward journey experience was 27 hours from leaving my hotel in Kuwait to arriving at Basra Palace with an overnight at Basra Airport. My previous trips by road to Basra usually took a morning. When I got to … Basra Airport I found that there were several … staff stuck waiting for a helicopter move – some had been waiting as long as four days … The US have agreed that we can put staff on their weekly Chinook flight to/from Kuwait, but there are no guaranteed places …"

431. On 18 June, a locally engaged (LE) member of staff at the British Embassy Office Basra was murdered. His wife, also an LE member of staff, was seriously injured.[293]

432. The murder raised concerns about the growing threat to local staff.

433. The FCO and DFID adopted different responses, reflecting the different roles and work patterns of their local staff.

434. DFID officials advised Mr Benn that, as a consequence of the murder, DFID's single LE member of staff in Basra was staying at home and DFID's five local contractors had been advised to avoid the Basra Palace site.[294] Further advice would follow when more information was available from the FCO.

435. Mr Asquith updated Mrs Beckett on 21 June.[295] He reported that the assumption was that the two LE staff had been targeted because they worked for the British Embassy Office. UK and US LE staff were regularly intimidated in Baghdad and Basra. One US LE member of staff had been murdered in Basra on 4 June. Multi-National Force – Iraq (MNF-I) interpreters had also been killed.

436. Mr Asquith reported that Mr Lamb had advised LE staff not to come to work until further notice, although local labourers and support staff working for contractors on the premises had continued to come in. A number of steps were under consideration to improve LE staff security. The attack was not judged to have changed the security conditions for UK-based civilians and it was not, therefore, proposed to draw down UK staff.

437. DFID officials put further recommendations to Mr Benn on 23 June, drawing on advice from DFID Basra.[296] Pending agreement from the FCO, which was expected imminently, officials recommended that:

- at his own request, the DFID LE staff member in Basra should leave the country as soon as possible on a two-month development attachment;
- the locally contracted administrative assistant for power projects should be relocated to Basra Airport; and
- two other locally contracted staff should work from home for two months.

438. On 14 July, DFID officials explained to Mr Benn that DFID and the FCO had adopted different approaches:

> "FCO offered their office-based staff three months' salary if they wanted to leave. We believe most have now accepted this offer. FCO is now deciding if and how to fill these positions with either UK or third country nationals … Although far from ideal, this has so far had no significant impact on DFID's work.
>
> "We suggest that, where staff can work remotely (on project sites, at home, in town), we should continue to employ them on the same basis as before and that we maintain our position on this as originally planned despite it differing from the FCO approach. Our circumstances are different. FCO local staff are needed on a daily basis at the [Basra] Palace. Most of our local staff are not and the two administrative staff who were, have already resigned. All of our local staff know that they have the option to work flexibly, to take time off if they feel threatened and to leave if they feel it is too dangerous."[297]

439. The introduction of the Locally Engaged Staff Assistance Scheme in 2007 in recognition of the uniquely difficult circumstances faced by LE staff is addressed later in this Section.

440. The IPU review of security submitted to Sir Michael Jay on 30 June examined the FCO's approach to risk in Iraq, structures and procedures to manage that risk, the extent to which those structures and procedures were being observed in practice and whether they satisfied the FCO's legal obligations towards its staff.[298]

441. The IPU explained that other FCO departments had contributed to the review. DFID officials had also participated and would report to their Ministers separately.

442. The IPU stated that the FCO approach to risk derived from its "duty of care in law to take reasonable steps to prevent reasonably foreseeable harm to … FCO employees (UK-based and locally engaged) as well as those who visit the premises of our missions and work from there eg from OGDs".

443. The description of the FCO's duty of care was derived from a paper prepared by FCO Legal Advisers as part of the 2004 FCO Security Review. The Legal Advisers stated:

> "Whether a duty of care exists in particular cases depends on whether the death, injury or damage sustained was foreseeable, whether there was a relationship between the FCO and the claimant viewed by a court as one of 'proximity' and whether the court considers it fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty …
> "Even if a duty of care does exist in a particular case, the FCO is liable in law only if it is found to have breached that duty, ie to have fallen below a reasonable standard of conduct through negligent acts or omissions. The fact that an attack on a mission has succeeded does not necessarily mean that the FCO was at fault or has failed to act reasonably."

444. The IPU described the FCO's "basic approach" as "risk averse":

> "… if we judge a situation exists whereby personnel are exposed to greater risk than the mitigating measures in place to deal with that risk, that task will not be undertaken …"

445. Decision-making structures were reported to be in line with the recommendations of the 2004 review. London decision-makers were the Foreign Secretary, the PUS (and FCO Board of Management) and the Iraq Director, supported by the IPU. Advice was provided by the Director General Corporate Affairs and Director General Defence and Intelligence and their subsidiary departments, and by FCO Legal Advisers.

---

[298] Minute IPU [junior official] to PS/PUS [FCO], 30 June 2006, 'Iraq: Review of Security' attaching Paper Iraq Policy Unit, June 2006, 'Review of Security of Staff and Missions in Iraq'.

446. The decision-makers in Iraq were the Heads of Post and Post Security Officers in Baghdad, Basra and Kirkuk, advised by their Overseas Security Managers (OSMs), Post Security Committees and the UK military.

447. The IPU set out the risk assessment procedures for posts in Iraq:

- daily assessment in each post of all operations in or out of compounds and daily contact between the FCO and posts;
- weekly meetings of Post Security Committees, with records copied to the FCO with recommendations as necessary;
- every six weeks "on average", a London-based "Nuts and Bolts" meeting to review measures in place and agree next steps, involving relevant FCO officials and other government departments as necessary;
- quarterly visits to posts by a UK-based FCO OSA, who completed a risk assessment matrix in line with FCO worldwide procedures;
- immediate reviews of security measures in response to incidents or fresh intelligence; and
- regular reviews of contingency plans and business continuity planning.

448. The IPU concluded that those procedures were "closely observed" and that steps taken by the FCO to manage the risks to staff for whom it had a duty of care "could be used as evidence of a reasonable standard of conduct by the FCO". More work was needed to:

- improve pre-deployment procedures for staff from certain departments;
- clarify with the MOD arrangements for the evacuation of third country nationals employed by the FCO as contractors; and
- clarify the status of UK civilian police in Iraq: "It remains unclear whether they are our employees or remain employees of their constabularies."

449. In an annex to the review, the IPU summarised departments' and organisations' responsibilities for the security of local and UK-based staff and contractors. It stated that the FCO's duty of care "would extend to any visiting FCO staff and staff seconded temporarily to the FCO or working directly under FCO supervision and control".
The FCO had "a similar duty of care" to employees of other government departments, foreign governments or international organisations "who live and/or work on or visit the relevant mission compounds". In practice, measures to protect those personnel had to be the same as for FCO staff. "Inevitably", pre-deployment or pre-visit training and medical clearance might vary, but in the case of other government departments it was "clearly desirable that close co-ordination occurs and that the same or equivalent measures are adopted".

450. The annex also stated that the standard of care for contractors "may, in particular circumstances, be lower than that required for employees". Those circumstances included where contractors had security expertise of their own and when it "may not be unreasonable for the FCO to expect them to make their own assessment as to the risks to their own staff (eg while travelling to and from post)". Contracts with such firms and agencies needed to be carefully vetted and contractors were required to have employers' liability insurance.

451. The IPU recommended that as many members of the FCO Board as possible attend a meeting to discuss:

- the impact of the Iraqiisation of Iraqi Security Forces on security in Baghdad;
- the impact of the withdrawal of UK military personnel on security in the South;
- a thorough review of staffing levels; and
- a contingency planning exercise on coping with an emergency in Iraq, to be attended by as many Board members as possible.

452. Sir Michael Jay agreed the IPU recommendations on 3 July.[299] He asked for:

- the status of civilian police to be clarified quickly;
- confirmation that a number of specific issues were being addressed; and
- advice on measures to protect local staff should UK-based staff be evacuated.

453. The IPU responded on 19 July:

- Efforts were in hand to tighten DFID's pre-deployment medical screening procedures for staff and contractors.
- Pre-deployment procedures for police officers would be brought in line with those for FCO personnel by 1 September.
- Concerns remained about arrangements for the evacuation of third country nationals employed by the UK. A UK military assumption that third country nationals would be evacuated was unsatisfactory and was being pursued with the MOD.
- The Home Office had challenged the FCO view that police officers on secondment from their home police force were not FCO employees. The issue was with lawyers. The status of retired police officers was also being discussed with lawyers.[300]

454. Dr Rosalind Marsden, the newly arrived British Consul General in Basra, sent a detailed assessment of the security situation to Mr Casey on 31 August:

> "The following strikes me, as a newcomer:
>
> (a) how exposed the Basra Palace Compound (BPC) is. We abut the city: houses, parks and fishing boats crowd around our walls. The 'badlands' start about two hundred feet from my office …
>
> (b) the risks our local staff run to work for us …

[299] Minute Jay to Asquith, 3 July 2006, 'Iraq: Review of Security'.
[300] Minute IPU [junior official] to PS/PUS [FCO], 19 July 2006, 'Iraq: Review of Security'.

(c) the fragility of our transport and supply links to the airport … There are few helicopters in theatre, those that we do have are prone to breakdown (because they are worked so hard) and, when it comes to getting a seat, the military take priority over civilians;

(d) the difficulty and danger involved in moving around Basra City … Because we depend on the military for support, road moves have to be planned well in advance and are sometimes cancelled at the last moment because of other operational priorities …

(e) the vulnerability of the BPC to indirect fire (mortars and rockets) …

"We need to accept that the risks for UK-based staff are high and do everything possible to mitigate them. For example, we have mitigated the major threats (IDF [indirect fire], EFP and kidnapping) to an acceptable extent by providing hardened living accommodation, limiting helicopter flights to the hours of darkness, varying routes, using Warriors or three vehicle convoys, as appropriate, requiring minimum movement outside after dark and full body armour and constantly reviewing our alert status in the light of the latest intelligence …

"For LE staff the threat is much greater and, I judge, increasing. We and IPU are wrestling with the dilemma of how to justify continuing to employ a bare minimum of staff … in the light of the current threat to them."[301]

455. Dr Marsden advised that the next six to nine months would be critical to Basra and the UK legacy. The UK needed "to maintain a big operation here during that period – and indeed somewhat expand it". The level of risk was likely to increase in the short term with the planned military surge (Operation Salamanca, see Section 9.5), but the reinforcement of the UK military presence in the BPC from 430 to 600 with the arrival of an additional Warrior company would mean better patrolling and harassment of potential firing points.

456. On 1 September, Mr Casey sent Mrs Beckett a paper on staff and security issues in Iraq.[302] The paper stated that:

- LE staff and contractors were particularly vulnerable;
- intimidation of LE staff had led to severe staff shortages;
- the number of LE staff in Basra had been reduced to the bare minimum;
- restrictions to mitigate the risks to UK-based staff were observed, "but erode further staff's quality of life (and options to do anything other than work)";
- nurses were available in Baghdad and Basra to monitor staff health and welfare;

- all FCO UK-based staff worked six weeks on with 10 days off;
- FCO staff served no more than 12 months in Iraq, with the option to extend in exceptional circumstances;
- high staff turnover and decompression breaks were a major challenge;
- it remained difficult to attract new staff, especially at lower grades, despite the incentives (high allowances and decompression breaks); and
- FCO staff who did take up postings found it rewarding and almost all the current complement had extended or would extend beyond their initial six months.

457. Sir Peter Ricketts chaired a meeting with FCO, DFID and MOD officials on 1 September to review security at UK posts in Iraq.[303] He informed Mrs Beckett that the meeting had seen no need to change Sir Michael Jay's four conditions for any FCO member of staff serving in Iraq.

458. Sir Peter reported that there had been a roadside attack on an Embassy convoy in Baghdad on 31 August and a similar attack on a DFID convoy in Nasiriyah on 1 September. One CRG employee had been badly injured in the Nasiriyah attack. Other examples of the evolving threat and risks included increased indirect fire attacks on the compounds in Baghdad and Basra. As risks increased, security measures evolved to mitigate them, but Sir Peter had concerns about two issues:

- Pressure to accommodate increasing numbers of officials and/or military staff with space in Baghdad and Basra at a premium. Sir Peter had asked officials to consider whether any functions, particularly on the management side, could be outsourced or relocated.
- The vulnerability of the Basra Palace site. The helicopter air bridge was mission critical. Because of wider problems with MOD helicopter availability, the FCO had had to start the procurement process for a dedicated helicopter service paid for by the FCO.

459. Later in September, Mr Asquith, who had replaced Mr Patey as British Ambassador to Iraq, advised Sir Peter Ricketts that the two attacks on UK convoys demonstrated the effectiveness of the UK's risk management measures.[304] The number of staff at post was evaluated continually to ensure they were able to contribute to post objectives.

460. Mr Asquith reported that space on the compound in Baghdad was at a premium, but the Embassy had not reached crisis point. He saw little scope for more outsourcing. Greater use of LE staff was the obvious option, but it was difficult to find Iraqi staff willing to work in the International Zone and, with no robust way of vetting new staff, there were questions of trust and security.

[303] Minute Ricketts to Foreign Secretary, 1 September 2006, 'Iraq: Security of Posts'.
[304] Letter Asquith to Ricketts, 20 September 2006, 'Iraq: Security of our Embassy in Baghdad'.

461. Mr Asquith ended with the recommendation that the UK effort be seen in context:

> "After the US we have the largest investment and the largest presence. Others look to us for direction. A major reduction in our resources risks being misunderstood as a signal of reduced commitment. Every prospective six months has been billed as a key period. But we have between now and next spring a clutch of determining events: the Baghdad Security Plan, constitutional review, oil law, amnesty, de-Ba'athification, provincial elections, International Compact, security transition … I will continue to evaluate the risk and the level of resources."

462. In his response to Mr Asquith on 9 October, Sir Peter Ricketts concluded:

> "… you … are right to underline the importance that is attached here to your teams' work. But your staff's safety must remain our paramount concern. Please do tell us immediately if you ever feel you are being pressured to take a risk with which you or your OSMs are uncomfortable."[305]

463. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event commented that, by that time, London had an insatiable appetite for updates on progress, which, it was understood, had to be positive. They described a tension between reporting the situation as it was and maintaining morale.

The move from the Basra Palace site to Basra Air Station

464. On 22 September 2006, a US contractor working for the State Department was killed when a rocket hit non-hardened US accommodation on the Basra Palace site.[306] The attack was the fourth on the compound in four days.

465. The IPU advised that, although all UK accommodation was hardened, it should not be considered mortar or rocket proof. During September, the proportion of rounds landing or exploding inside the compound had increased. The IPU reported that steps had already been taken to reduce staff exposure to the increased threat, including extended breaks from Basra. In view of the latest attack, it had had asked Dr Marsden to review those steps again and consider the scope for further drawdown.

466. DFID officials sent advice in parallel to Mr Benn.[307]

467. At DOP(I) on 12 October, Ministers expressed concern that the security situation in Basra meant UK staff were "in danger, and unable to function effectively".[308] There was "a serious question mark over whether or not HMG had the right to ask them to stay in such circumstances". Many local staff had been killed or injured, or had left because of security concerns.

468. On 20 October, DOP(I) agreed that the FCO would lead urgent work on the security of staff in Basra, identifying options, costs and risks for discussion at the next meeting.[309]

469. On 24 October, Mr Casey sent Mrs Beckett a paper[310] on the future of the UK civilian presence at the Basra Palace site, which, he explained, reflected "Ministers' clear wish to take action immediately to draw down the number of civilian staff working from that site".[311]

470. In the paper, the IPU stated:

> "The threat to our civilian staff operating from the Basra Palace Compound (BPC) has risen steadily over the last year, progressively constraining our operations … We are now at the point where, without effective military action to reduce the IDF threat, our operations from BPC face an unacceptable level of risk.
> "We need to respond. We have four broad options:
>
> a) Continue to run all our civilian operations from BPC …
> b) Start a phased reduction in staff at BPC now …
>
> c) Withdraw our entire civilian operation from BPC now, moving only a very small number to BAS [Basra Air Station], and taking the bulk out of theatre …
>
> d) Withdraw our civilian presence from Southern Iraq altogether.
>
> "Until now we have recommended that we maintain our civilian operations at BPC, despite the deteriorating security situation. We have recently launched a major, integrated military and civilian effort in Basra – Op SINBAD/Better Basra [see Section 10.2] – which is designed to produce sustainable change in the city and to achieve transition to Iraqi-led security responsibility. The civilian component is critical to the success of this effort.
> "But in the last month the security threat has become so acute that, unless current trends can be reversed, in particular by direct action to reduce IDF, the risks to our civilian staff in BPC can no longer be justified. We could suffer a catastrophic incident, as the US has, at any time. The US has just decided to scale back their BPC operation to a minimum.
> "We therefore recommend Option (b). This will further constrain our work, with some negative impact on SINBAD/Better Basra …

"But it will help reduce our staff's exposure, without completely abandoning the BPC – which in public terms, and our relations with Coalition allies, would be very damaging. By phasing the drawdown of police advisers in particular, we can largely preserve their critical contribution to SINBAD for the moment."[312]

471. The IPU proposed that, moving as quickly as practicable:

"a) All FCO staff other than a core of Consul General, Deputy CG, Arab media spokesman, Management Officer, Overseas Security Manager and Technical Works Supervisor would relocate to BAS;

b) The DFID team at BPC would reduce to one;

c) The entire PRT would be transferred to BAS. This will be a major logistical undertaking and will take time to effect;

d) The Police team would reduce in the next month by around 14 officers. Three of these officers would relocate to BAS. The rest would leave theatre. This would retain just enough officers in the city to provide essential support to Op SINBAD …

e) The Prisons team would leave theatre, pending progress on the Basra Central Prison Project;

f) The 25-strong Control Risks close protection team would be reduced, since all road moves will now be in Warriors;

g) The 10-strong KBR [Kellogg Brown & Root] life support team would be reduced.

"Excluding the perimeter guard force … this will mean a reduction in the civilian headcount at BPC from 104 to around 35. Some 35 staff would relocate to BAS.

"The 92-strong Kroll perimeter guard force will have to remain. As long as we have a civilian presence in BPC, the requirement to protect the perimeter of our part of the compound will remain."

472. DFID officials put separate advice to Mr Benn, agreed with the FCO, on the implications of the FCO plan for DFID staff in Basra.[313]

473. It is not clear whether the IPU paper was sent to DOP(I).

474. At DOP(I) on 26 October, Ministers stated that, because of increasing concern about the security of civilian staff in Basra, the FCO "would be consulting urgently" on recommendations for the phased withdrawal of staff from the Basra Palace site to both Basra Air Station and out of Iraq.[314]

[314] Minutes, 26 October 2006, DOP(I).

475. At the ISG on 27 October, Mr Simon McDonald, FCO Iraq Director, reported that the security situation in Basra had deteriorated to the point where Mrs Beckett had decided it would be necessary to withdraw the majority of civilian staff from the Basra Palace site.[315] Mr Martin Dinham, DFID Director Europe, Middle East and Americas, explained that Mr Benn agreed with this view. Sir Nigel Sheinwald confirmed that Mr Blair would be content to accept Mrs Beckett's judgement on the matter.

476. On 29 October, 17 Iraqi interpreters working for a British company at the police training college in Shaiba were murdered.[316]

477. Mr Blair was informed on 3 November that most UK staff had withdrawn from the Basra Place site, leaving a core team of six political officers and 15 police training contractors. MND(SE) was working hard to reduce the threat from indirect fire.[317]

478. The wider implications of the withdrawal are addressed in Section 9.5.

479. On 16 November, Mrs Beckett informed DOP(I) that the withdrawal had been implemented more quickly than envisaged because of security conditions.[318]

480. Mrs Beckett told the Inquiry:

> "… we had our own internal advice and the relevant member of staff had been out to Basra and taken a look at the situation and had come back full of concerns. Concerns that were not totally shared by the people on the ground …
> "So Michael Jay came to see me and told me that he was concerned about the welfare of staff and we had quite a long conversation about it, and, of course, both felt that this was absolutely paramount and that we had to consider what we could and should do.
> "In the process of that consideration … we also took advice from the people on the ground … they didn't take quite such a grim view of the situation. They felt that there was still a good deal they could contribute, that there were adjustments that they could make, that the security situation could be improved and they wanted to do that."[319]

481. An IPU paper, 'Basra: Objectives and Presence in 2007', was prepared for the 7 December DOP(I).[320] Mr Casey explained to Mrs Beckett that the paper was intended to share FCO thinking with other departments, including the MOD, which had been asked to produce a note in parallel on the UK military posture in Basra in 2007.

[320] Minute Casey to Private Secretary [FCO], 1 December 2006, 'Iraq: Future of our Presence in Basra'.

482. In the paper, the IPU explained that:

> "The political and security context for our civilian operations in southern Iraq is changing significantly. The heightened security threat, which forced us to draw down staff from Basra Palace in October, shows no sign of abating. We expect security responsibility in Basra to be transferred to the Iraqis in spring 2007. And MOD are considering a major reposturing of UK forces in the coming months, with direct implications for civilian operations.
> "… In the political and security environment we are likely to face, what can we realistically hope to deliver? What civilian resources do we need to deliver those objectives, and where should they best be deployed?"[321]

483. The IPU strongly recommended that the UK "maintain a civilian effort in Basra province during 2007". The intention was to co-locate as much as possible of the civilian effort with MND(SE) at Basra Air Station, where plans were being pursued to construct suitable hardened facilities, without closing off immediately the option of returning to the Basra Palace site in future.

484. The IPU explained that the current PJHQ proposal was to close all bases in Basra City by April 2007 and to consolidate at Basra Air Station. Two military bases would close during January/February. The Basra Palace base, which was essential for sustaining the civilian presence, would close by 1 March. If Ministers agreed those proposals, there would be just 12 weeks to move personnel and equipment from the Basra Palace site to Basra Air Station: "an extremely tight timetable, given the operational constraints in theatre".

485. The IPU advised that there was no prospect of being able to recommend to Ministers a return to full staffing at the Basra Palace site in the near future. It was equally clear that there was "a powerful and urgent imperative for us to get our in-country civilian operations back up to strength as quickly as possible, to deliver in the critical period ahead".

486. The IPU added that conditions for staff at Basra Air Station would be "much tougher" than at the Basra Palace site:

> "Travel to/from Basra will become much harder. We are likely to face staff recruitment and retention challenges. Space will be limited. With only 54 hardened units of accommodation we will need to make difficult choices about priorities.
>
> "But against that, there will be significant advantages in co-location with the military – making possible a more cohesive approach than is currently possible from different sites in Basra."

[321] Paper IPU, 1 December 2006, 'Basra: Objectives and Presence in 2007'.

487. Introducing the paper at DOP(I) on 7 December 2006, Mrs Beckett stated that the decision to drawdown from the Basra Palace site had been right.[322] Work in hand suggested that the majority of civilian staff should be relocated to Basra Air Station, but urgent work was needed to make it fit for purpose, and moving staff there would undoubtedly make it a more attractive target for insurgents. Whitehall departments needed to co-ordinate plans and engage with the US.

488. A joint PCRU/DFID report on refocusing civilian efforts in Basra, produced on 19 December 2006, stated:

> "It is worth noting that the rapid (unavoidable) drawdown from Basra Palace did raise concerns among MND(SE) partners about civilian commitment and the physical move to Basra Air Station has required considerable time and attention … Construction of hardened accommodation on the FCO site at BAS is under way … but the pace of the build may slip … Claims on accommodation must be seen in the 'round' of a total demand which exceeded supply."[323]

489. Sir Peter Ricketts told the Inquiry:

> "When it became clear that the Armed Forces would in due course be moving out of the Basra Palace in the centre of Basra, and that became increasingly clear in the latter part of 2006, I was clear that our Consulate [the British Embassy Office] had to either shut and go back to Baghdad or operate out of the Air Station."[324]

Sustaining the UK civilian presence during 2007

490. On 22 January 2007, Dr Marsden reported that that the number of IDF attacks on the Basra Palace site had been high and steady since October, but January was set to be a record month.[325] Attacks since 15 January had also been more accurate. Dr Marsden's OSM and Post Security Officer felt that "we are beginning to push our luck".

491. The FCO SOSA visited Baghdad and Basra from 23 January to 1 February.[326] He reported that the security situation throughout Iraq had deteriorated significantly since the last visit by an OSA in September 2006.

492. In Basra, indirect fire on the Basra Palace site had reached record levels that month. Attacks on the Contingency Operating Base (COB, the renamed Basra Air Station) were increasing, but mainly inaccurate. The SOSA was "not overly concerned" about the security of the small UK COB compound as it was on a protected military base, but made a number of recommendations for improving security at the COB, the Basra Palace site and two other locations in central Basra.

493. In Baghdad, the SOSA's main concern was the security of the International Zone after the handing over of checkpoints to Iraqi control. The US would ensure that its Mission remained well protected and there was a danger that the UK compound would become the target by default. The SOSA recommended:

- that a more senior member of the Embassy staff (he suggested the Deputy Head of Mission) attend meetings of the US-led International Zone security committee; and
- implementation of a number of urgent steps to strengthen and harden physical security on the UK compound.

494. In Basra by 15 March, most staff had left the Basra Palace site and the move to the COB was on track for completion by the end of the month.[327] The UK military were expected to remain at the Palace until 1 August.

495. Some DFID members of the PRT for whom there was insufficient hardened accommodation in the COB were based temporarily in a PRT office in Kuwait.[328]

496. Mr Casey informed Sir Peter Ricketts that the SOSA was content for the International Police Advisers (IPAs) employed by the contractor ArmorGroup to remain at the Provincial Joint Co-ordination Centre (PJCC) within the police headquarters, also known as the Warren, but confirmed that the arrangement would be kept under review because of concerns about the site's viability and the fact that it was co-occupied by the Iraqi Police.[329] Because there was insufficient space in the FCO's new facilities for those IPAs located at the COB, they would be accommodated in a separate COB compound with a lower standard of overhead protection. Officials were satisfied that the arrangement met the FCO's duty of care obligations, subject to a written agreement with the company.

497. On 28 March, Sir Peter Ricketts informed the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee of the changes in location of the British Embassy Offices Basra and Kirkuk.[330]

498. Sir Peter described the chief benefits of relocation in Basra as consolidation of all major elements of the UK effort in southern Iraq in the same place and improved safety for staff.

499. The move from Kirkuk to a temporary site at the Khanzad Hotel in Erbil had been precipitated by the US decision to relinquish the site in Kirkuk on which the British Embassy Office had been located. One benefit for UK staff would be the better security environment in Erbil.

500. On 22 April, the Chief Overseas Security Manager (COSM) at the British Embassy Baghdad reported the first IDF attack in many months in which rounds had impacted inside the Embassy compound.[331] Basic procedures in the Embassy had worked well:

> "The incident was well controlled by the Embassy Operations Room, staffed by CRG … The Garda World Gurkha Guard Force were excellent in their cordon and search operation. All wardens should also be congratulated on the speedy manner in which they conducted the head count. I was therefore able to give the FCO Response Centre in London an accurate report that all were safe and well within 15 minutes of the first impact."

501. The COSM concluded with a number of lessons to be learned locally, including the need for an urgent review of the provision of "Duck and Cover" shelters and for staff to be patient while searches were carried out.

502. The British Embassy Office site on the Basra Palace site was handed over to the UK military on 26 April.[332] Mr Robert Tinline, Deputy Consul General in Basra and Mr Etherington's successor as Head of the Basra PRT, reported that over 1,200 rockets and mortars had been fired at the Basra Palace site since attacks had increased in September 2006 and that the site had been hit 70 times:

> "We were fortunate that none of our staff were killed or injured. (Others in other parts of the compound fared less well.) But we also made our own good fortune. Four accommodation 'pods', the bar, the gym and both the main office buildings received direct hits – but because they were hardened, no serious injuries resulted. Six of the reinforced windows were hit by shrapnel – none gave way. Mortars landed one side of 'Hesco' sandbag walls, leaving people the other side unharmed."

503. Mr Tinline explained that the whole Basra Palace site was scheduled to be handed back to the Iraqis in late summer. The Iraqi authorities were expected to assume full security responsibility for Basra province at about the same time.

504. On 21 May, Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, requested additional funds from the Treasury for hardened accommodation to protect troops at the COB; April had seen a threefold increase in the number of IED attacks (see Section 14.1).[333]

505. Mr Stephen Timms, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, approved the request on 30 May, but asked Mr Browne to take a government-wide view of how to allocate the funds, working with Mrs Beckett and others.[334]

506. The next day, Mrs Beckett submitted a parallel request for additional funds for an urgent programme of security works at the British Embassy Baghdad to meet the increased threat that would follow Iraqiisation of security in the International Zone.[335] Mrs Beckett explained:

> "The £23m work in Baghdad … will only be affordable if other departments who use the compound are prepared to contribute their full share … Of 'teeth' staff on the compound, and contractors involved in operational delivery (such as police advisers), fewer than 50 percent are FCO … Of course, there are also large numbers of contractors who provide security and life support, which is a shared benefit.
> "If we are not able collectively to make this investment, we would have to look hard at how we could continue to operate safely and sustainably, meeting our duty of care to all compound users and residents …"

507. Mr Timms replied on 19 June. He welcomed FCO efforts to reduce and absorb costs and agreed that the FCO should "work with other departments to agree joint funding".[336] He expressed willingness to agree a request to use End-Year Flexibility[337] "if, after agreeing contributions with other departments and taking all viable steps to reduce and absorb this pressure, the costs cannot be managed within your capital budget this year".

508. The limited availability of hardened accommodation at the COB and the lack of space to build more caused growing concern as the frequency and accuracy of IDF attacks increased.[338]

509. On 20 April. the IPU explained to Sir Peter Ricketts that IPAs employed by the FCO contractor ArmorGroup were housed in the Skylink commercial caravan park, which offered a lower standard of protection from IDF attacks. The Skylink accommodation no longer presented an acceptable level of risk. In response, the FCO intended:

> "… to continue to exert downwards pressure on overall civilian staff numbers in Basra, so as to allow us to move all our IPAs into our new compound as soon as possible … To this end, we and post will continue to look critically at all civilian slots, and take an aggressive approach to further reducing our footprint wherever and whenever possible (including downsizing the IPA contingent itself).

"This is a difficult balancing act: our civilian staff play a critical role in securing the progress necessary to complete our overall mission. Pulling too many out too quickly will undermine our chances of success, and potentially prolong the need for our presence. But we will aim to get everyone into fully hardened accommodation by 31 July. In early August our military will leave Basra Palace and we can expect IDF rates at the Air Station [COB] to increase further, as it becomes the sole target for such attacks."

510. The IPU explained that, in the meantime, the FCO was taking steps to reduce the risk to those accommodated on the Skylink site. If personnel based there were injured or killed, the FCO could be open to claims of negligence if it failed to demonstrate that it had fulfilled its duty of care obligations. The FCO Legal Advisers' view was that the measures taken and ArmorGroup's explicit written agreement to the arrangement would put the FCO on strong ground in refuting such claims.

511. The IPU warned that if the FCO was to stop use of the Skylink accommodation it would have to remove the vast majority of the IPAs from Basra or make "deep cuts" to other parts of the mission, severely disrupting work in Basra at a critical time.

512. On 30 April, there was a direct hit on the ArmorGroup IPA office.[339] The unhardened room was not occupied at the time and there were no casualties. Two IPAs in the adjacent cabin were unharmed. On the basis of reports from the OSM, Mr McDonald issued instructions to Basra that all personnel under FCO duty of care should move to hardened accommodation immediately.

513. The British Embassy Office Basra sent proposals for a reduction in personnel "to a level that should provide adequate security and acceptable living conditions for all personnel operating from the COB, while maintaining operational effectiveness". The FCO would reduce from 12 to 10 and the Control Risks security team from 32 to 24, subject to a review by the Overseas Security Adviser later in the month. Those reductions would allow the police teams to remain at existing levels and allow three members of the PRT to return to Basra, increasing its numbers from 11 to 14.

514. Mr Benn expressed concern to DFID officials that the appropriate levels of protection were not yet in place.[340]

515. Officials explained that all staff under DFID's duty of care had been under hard cover for some time: a pre-condition for their move from the BPC to the COB. FCO and DFID staff were, however, still eating in the unhardened military dining facility.

The hardened dining area was due to be completed by mid-July, but contingency plans were being put in place should IDF attacks prohibit use of the military facility.

516. Ministers discussed security for civilian staff at DOP(I) on 11 May.[341] Mr Benn expressed concern that hardened dining facilities were not yet available.

517. In his valedictory report to Mr David Miliband, the Foreign Secretary, on 16 August, Mr Asquith paid tribute to the work of LE and UK-based staff.[342] LE staff had:

> "… struggled daily to our offices, in Baghdad, Basra and when we were in Kirkuk, through the wreckage that Shock and Awe and subsequent decisions produces. They have risked their lives. Some have lost them. All have lost a friend or relation. All have suffered massive upheaval … I hope that … the decision will be the right one when eventually Ministers address collectively how to provide protection to those who supplicate us."

518. On UK-based staff, Mr Asquith wrote:

> "By the end of a tour in any one of our three posts in Iraq, an officer experiences what elsewhere takes three or four years. Their professionalism and fortitude is of the highest order. Their determination to secure a better future for Iraq, in the face of daily frustration and barbarity, is a source of wonderment – particularly against a background when resources and attention are being diverted elsewhere."

519. In advance of a Ministerial meeting planned for 19 July, FCO and MOD officials produced a joint paper setting out the latest "assessments and plans on security transition and the associated reposturing and drawdown of UK troops in Basra" (see Section 9.6).[343]

520. The paper had been discussed, in draft, at the ISG on 9 July, where it was agreed that the departure from the Basra Palace site and the Warren should happen simultaneously.[344]

521. In the paper, officials explained that the next key decision for Ministers was the timing of the withdrawal from the Basra Palace site, the "most heavily mortared and rocketed place in Iraq". This was complicated for a number or reasons, including the impact on the UK's SSR effort in Basra, currently co-ordinated from the PJCC, where 100 UK troops and seven UK police advisers were based. The threat to those staff if there were no significant MND(SE) presence at the Basra Palace site would be impossibly high because "there would be no quick way to get reinforcements to the site or to evacuate UK personnel in an emergency". Officials concluded that a withdrawal from the Basra Palace site would mean closing the UK base at PJCC, and so halting SSR work and losing "situational intelligence within Basra City".

522. The UK military handed over the PJCC to Iraqi control on 26 August.[345] The Basra Palace site followed on 2 September. Over 5,000 UK military, the British Embassy Office, the Basra PRT and the US Regional Embassy Office were now located at the COB.

523. In December 2007, FCO Iraq Group reviewed the status of the British Embassy Office Erbil.[346] Mr Frank Baker, Head of Iraq Group, advised Dr John Jenkins, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, that the British Embassy Office should remain at the Khanzad Hotel despite concerns about security and value for money. Mr Baker explained that the Khanzad office achieved a score well inside the "red zone" on the FCO risk matrix. Staff in Erbil would continue to look for better short-term alternatives while preparing the business case for a long-term presence in Erbil.

524. Dr Jenkins advised Dr Kim Howells, Minister of State for the Middle East, and Sir Peter Ricketts that it was "a tough call" whether to remain in Erbil:

> "There is a serious duty of care issue. The costs of maintaining the consulate in Erbil flow from this. On the other hand it does a serious job of work. The French are looking to establish a mission there. My view is that we should accept the current level of risk and maintain our presence while actively looking for other sites (which may include co-location with the French)."

525. In the first week of December, Sir Peter Ricketts visited Baghdad and Basra with Mr Bill Jeffrey, the MOD PUS, and Ms Susan Wardell, DFID Director General Operations.[347]

526. On his return to London, Sir Peter advised Mr Miliband that the most important issue to resolve was the future of the UK presence in Basra. Mr Brown, now Prime Minister, had announced a continued UK military presence until late 2008 and Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, Chief of the Defence Staff, intended that the UK military should leave soon after that. Mr Brown had also set a high level of ambition for the UK contribution to economic regeneration, but the UK civilian presence was entirely dependent on the military for security and life support. Sir Peter warned: "If the military go, the civilians go, unless another very capable western military force replaces us." He also warned that the Basra PRT was small and there was "a sense of planning blight" because of uncertainties beyond late 2008.

[347] Minute Ricketts to Foreign Secretary, 10 December 2007, 'Visit to Iraq'.

527. Without exaggerating the problem, Sir Peter also wanted Mr Miliband to be aware of:

> "… tensions under the surface between some on the UK military side (more [Lieutenant] General [William] Rollo [Senior British Military Representative – Iraq] in Baghdad than [Major] General [Graham] Binns [GOC MND(SE)] in Basra)… who think that the civilians are moving too slowly and unimaginatively, and the UK PRT in Basra who feel that they have been turned on a sixpence from an expectation of closing down in the Spring of 2008 to a series of big new expectations, but not much more resources to deliver them. Des Browne has picked up this military view."

528. Separately, Sir Peter Ricketts suggested to Mr Baker that improving conditions in Baghdad, though not Basra, called for a reassessment of policy on the length of postings.[348] Many staff were highly motivated and able to cope with an extra six months, if not a second year: "Quite a head of steam is building up on this issue and it needs to be tackled." Sir Peter also reported that Mr Christopher Prentice, British Ambassador to Iraq, had made a persuasive case for an increase in staff numbers as prospects improved and the pace of work began to increase.

529. Mr Miliband visited Baghdad, Basra and Erbil from 16 to 18 December.[349] On return, he commented to Mr Brown: "I was struck in talking to members of our locally engaged staff in Baghdad how fearful for the future they remain – and how much they have personally borne and continue to bear."

530. Mr Miliband was impressed by staff morale and the positive "can-do" attitude in all three UK posts. He suggested to Mr Brown that: "We should think about reflecting the role of our civilian staff more widely in future statements on Iraq to Parliament."

531. Mr Tinline sent an annual review for the Basra PRT to the US Embassy in Baghdad on 19 December.[350] He reported that:

> "Keeping going has been a huge challenge. The team spent three months crammed four to an 8 metre x 2 metre pod and seven months under increasingly heavy rocket attack … And for most of the year we did not know whether we would still be in Basra in six months' time. The burden has been greatest on our local staff. Our legal assistant was killed in April, followed by his father the week after he attended one of our legal training events. Others have been threatened. They appreciate that the British assistance scheme [for LE staff] explicitly includes them. Throughout the spirit and support within the whole team has been tremendous."

532. Mr Tinline added that one challenge lying ahead was putting staff on a "sustainable long term footing (several members have already done two years and we are carrying some gaps on the rule of law side)".

The Charge of the Knights and the UK military drawdown

534. Section 9.6 describes the changes brought about by the Charge of the Knights, the Iraqi military operation in March 2008 to drive Shia militias out of Basra.

535. Mr Keith MacKiggan, Head of the Basra PRT from the end of September 2008, was one of several witnesses to describe the operation's impact:

> "… post-Charge of the Knights, really the only constraint on our movement around the city and the wider province was the availability of military assets … over time, even that became less of a constraint."[351]

536. The FCO SOSA visited Baghdad with a DFID security co-ordinator and a second FCO official from 15 to 18 October 2008.[352] He reported that there had been a dramatic reduction in terrorist incidents after the US surge, but that the threat to civilian staff remained as before. Of particular concern was the use of the Improvised Rocket Assisted Mortar (IRAM), which was more effective and accurate than IDF from long range.

537. The SOSA advised that CRG was at the limit of its capacity. It was supporting 120 civilian staff with numbers intended for 80. If there was an increase in UK civilian staff or a change in security requirements because the US decided to withdraw from checkpoints in the International Zone as part of the transition to Iraqi security control, GRG assets would need to increase.

538. After visiting Basra from 19 to 21 October, the SOSA advised that the surge had led to a significant reduction in terrorist incidents, but that the threat to staff remained unchanged.[353] He highlighted the threat of IED and IDF attacks and the "high possibility of kidnap".

539. The visit raised concerns about the condition of DFID and FCO vehicles in Baghdad and Basra.[354] The inspectors recommended regular spot checks and the installation of additional security equipment.

540. During October, the FCO and DFID reverted to local authorisation by the Consul General and the DFID Head of the Basra PRT of moves outside the COB.[355] All moves had been authorised from London since the deterioration of the security situation in 2005.

541. In March 2009, with the departure of the DFID Head of the PRT and the transition to US leadership, DFID authority for moves off the COB was transferred to the Head of DFID Baghdad.[356]

542. Comments from witnesses who served in Iraq reinforced the impression of slowly improving transport provision.

543. Mr Tansley, Consul General in Basra from October 2005 to April 2006, told the Inquiry: "The thing that dominated our lives, was not money and people. It was helicopters."[357]

544. Mr Asquith, British Ambassador to Iraq from August 2006 to August 2007, told the Inquiry that transport constraints inhibited movement between Baghdad and Basra:

> "Not merely was it difficult to get down there, since we were dependent, at that stage, upon helicopter trips out of Baghdad to the airport and then to Basra, and the military facilities weren't always ready for that …
>
> "It was also difficult to move around Basra …"[358]

545. Ms Kathleen Reid, Head of DFID Basra from August 2007 to September 2008, explained that:

> "[Major] General [Barney] White-Spunner [GOC MND(SE)] … made a commitment … that they were there to support. Whatever we needed in terms of assets, he would make that happen, and I have to say, always came good on that …"[359]

546. Mr Prentice, British Ambassador from September 2007 to November 2009, stated:

> "… if we wanted to get to Basra, we needed to have a military asset. Under our duty of care regulations, we couldn't use the emerging commercial flights, which towards the end of my period were available … So we had to depend on helicopters and military lift. But during my time we also had use of US civilian aircraft through the US Embassy. They kindly made those available to us occasionally. So physical movement to and from Basra I would say was improving during my time but was still difficult."[360]

547. In October 2008, FCO officials started to consider the future of the UK's network of posts in Iraq after the military drawdown in 2009.[361] The preferred option was to maintain the status quo in Baghdad and Erbil, with a reduced presence in Basra, in order to strike "the right balance between strategic policy delivery requirements and financial pressures".

548. Sir Peter Ricketts supported that conclusion "from the perspective of our relations with Iraq", but asked that FCO Ministers be given the opportunity to "consider the relative importance of continuing very high levels of FCO spending in Iraq as against other priorities".[362] Decisions should not be pre-empted by Whitehall processes before that had happened. The FCO's corporate systems were "not well developed for making those decisions about relative priorities across the network", but there would be an opportunity for the Board to look at the issue later at the end of November.

549. Sir Peter was "struck by the extremely high cost of maintaining a presence in Erbil". He did not believe it was possible to justify on value for money grounds a large capital investment in the city. If the UK was to remain, it had to be on the basis of co-location with another EU country.

550. On Basra, Sir Peter expressed scepticism about what a very small post, with declining interest from other departments, could achieve. Ministers needed to be given the option of closure. If they would not accept that, the FCO should review after 12 months whether staff had been able to make any difference in Basra.

551. Officials informed Mr Miliband on 8 December that the FCO Board had decided on 28 November that Ministers should be presented with two options for Basra: a mini-mission within a secure US military perimeter, to be reviewed again in 2009, or closure when UK forces left.[363] There was a strong case from a policy perspective for retaining the post, but Ministers would want to consider value for money in the light of wider cost pressures. Mr Brown and DFID and Department of Energy and Climate Change (DECC) Ministers were thought to be in favour of keeping Basra open.

552. Officials explained that NSID(OD)[364] would discuss Iraq and Afghanistan on 9 December, but that there would not be time for substantive discussion of the post-drawdown Iraq strategy. Mr Brown would invite Mr Miliband to seek agreement by correspondence.

553. NSID(OD) discussed Iraq on 9 December 2008.[365]

554. Papers provided for the meeting included 'Iraq: arrangements for transition'.[366] On the network of posts, the paper stated:

> "FCO will retain a substantial Embassy in Baghdad at roughly current levels (20-25 FCO UK-based staff), a small post in Erbil (4 UK staff – to be reviewed again in March 2009); and – subject to Ministers' views – a small post in Basra (3-4 UK staff, down from 9 at present) until at least March 2010. Financial Year 2008/09 are £55m. These should reduce to below £50m in 2009/10. The majority of these are recovered by FCO from cost-sharers (other departments, programme budgets, tenants)."

555. On 13 January 2009, Mr Miliband's Private Office circulated a draft strategy for "UK policy towards and relations with Iraq following military drawdown".[367] It had been agreed by officials from all interested departments and by Mr Miliband.

556. Annex C set out proposals for three posts in Baghdad, Basra and Erbil:

- Baghdad. Any significant disengagement would reduce the UK's influence and be seen as an acknowledgement of failure. The FCO assessed that the security situation allowed road moves between the Embassy and the airport, rather than the RAF helicopter air bridge, but that Iraqiisation of security in the International Zone from 2009 would require additional investment in security measures.
- Basra. The FCO did not believe it would be cost-effective to maintain the same level of civilian presence after the departure of UK combat forces. The US was likely to become the public face of the Coalition in southern Iraq and the security situation did not yet permit travel between Basra and the COB without military assistance. The FCO proposed reducing the number of UK-based FCO staff from nine to three or four; DFID would not keep resident staff in Basra after June 2009, but would pay the cost of two "virtual" slots to guarantee accommodation for visiting staff.
- Erbil. The policy case for retaining a UK presence was strong, but the cost per head of operating in Erbil was extremely high and the location in the Khanzad Hotel was not sustainable on security grounds. The FCO intended to work on a more sustainable and cost-effective arrangement.

557. Mr Alistair Darling (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), Mr John Hutton (the Defence Secretary) and Mr Douglas Alexander (the International Development Secretary) all agreed to the proposed strategy.[368]

558. Mr Baker visited Basra from 15 to 18 February 2009.[369] He reported to Dr Jenkins that the security situation continued to improve:

"I spent a day driving around Basra, including a visit to a date farm outside the town in an area we could not have thought of visiting even three months ago … The improvement in security has been mirrored on the COB, where body armour is no longer required to be carried while on the base.

"While it is true that the key enabler for recent progress was Charge of the Knights, it was our reaction to those events which was critical. It would have been easy to have taken that opportunity to disengage with Basra. Instead we recognised that we could take advantage of the improving security situation …"

559. The UK handed over the command of MND(SE) to the US on 31 March.[370]

560. An unattributed FCO review of lessons to be learned from the UK's experience in Basra from late 2008 included a number of observations on civilian personnel:

- "FCO (and other civilian departments) need to build on the frameworks for risk ownership and management which have been put in place over the last five years to allow maximum operational flexibility on the ground consistent with our duty of care, including through the provision at an early stage in the deployment of protective assts eg armoured transport."
- "The FCO was unprepared for the sort of operation that was to be undertaken, with the result that, in the early stages (but almost six months after the invasion) FCO staff were being sent into the field without computers, communication equipment, satisfactory communications arrangements (personal email accounts were used throughout, though some classified communications became available during 2004) and so on. Their military and DFID counterparts were better provided for."[371]

Attracting volunteers

561. Between 2003 and 2009, departments faced a range of difficulties recruiting sufficient volunteers with the right skills and experience for civilian roles in Iraq. Problems included:

- the absence of an established co-ordinating mechanism for UK civilian recruitment;
- the absence of a deployable reserve of experts in post-conflict stabilisation and reconstruction;
- a shortage of Arabic speakers;
- imprecise and changing job descriptions;
- high turnover of staff on short deployments;
- delays caused by pre-deployment training;
- concerns among potential volunteers, their families and friends about deteriorating security;
- extraction of volunteers from existing jobs;
- negative perceptions of the career impact of a posting to Iraq;

- hostility in some departments to Iraq deployments; and
- Iraq fatigue.

562. In response to those constraints on recruitment:

- The Government took steps to establish a UK cadre of deployable civilian experts as part of a strategic review of the UK's approach to stabilisation and reconstruction. That process is addressed in Section 10.3.
- Individual departments introduced a range of ad hoc incentives to volunteer.

563. With the exception of problems associated with deploying volunteers from UK police forces, addressed in detail in Section 12.1, the Inquiry has seen no indication that difficulty attracting volunteers contributed to the delays in the deployment of UK civilians to Iraq in the early months of the CPA.

564. On 25 July 2003, Sir Michael Jay reported that, since his request for volunteers on 22 April, the Government had trained and deployed "over 100 civilian staff from sixteen different branches of government", an exercise he described as having "no modern precedent".[372]

565. A Treasury official recalled in mid-2004 that he had been very impressed by the turnout at an early meeting in the Treasury for people thinking of volunteering to go to Iraq:

> "We had some 60 or so people arrive for that meeting – a very high quality response – in fact such a good response that we couldn't meet everyone's desire to go out to Iraq at that point."[373]

566. By autumn 2003, as Ministerial pressure to deploy greater numbers of civilians grew, departments faced increasing difficulty attracting volunteers. Ministers and officials considered a range of incentives to aid recruitment.

567. The AHMGIR on 6 November 2003 discussed the need for CPA(South) to be staffed "properly and quickly" and requested a report on recruitment.[374]

568. Mr Desmond Bowen, Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), advised:

> "It has not proved easy to recruit staff to serve in Iraq, despite financial inducements. Successful candidates need to have the right technical skills, aptitude for building Iraqi capacity and willingness to work in a difficult environment."[375]

569. Mr Bowen reported that: "Extracting people from current jobs, security training and the logistics of deployment often take longer than we would want."

570. In November 2003, the FCO Iraq Operations Unit (IOU) advised Sir Michael Jay that recruitment and succession planning were "difficult".[376] A number of volunteers had dropped out in recent weeks. Staffing requirements were "just about manageable" but would become more difficult if security deteriorated.

571. At a meeting with Sir Michael Jay on 25 November, Sir Hilary Synnott reported vacancies in "key areas" in Basra and advised that, unless there was "a more positive approach to recruitment, the whole policy risked failure".[377]

572. Sir Hilary reported that he had discussed the issue with Mr Straw, who had suggested that "the [FCO] administration (and by extension other departments in Whitehall) should try to encourage people by pointing out the career advantages". Sir Hilary had suggested paying people more.

573. Sir Michael Jay told Sir Hilary Synnott there were drawbacks to those proposals:

> "The strong view hitherto in Whitehall had been that all postings to Iraq should be volunteers. Andrew Turnbull had also taken the view that we should not try to pay people the market rate to get them there. This would work for the private sector, but not for us with our duty of care to staff, which was uppermost in the minds of a number of my Permanent Secretary colleagues … It was important to maintain Whitehall solidarity if possible."

574. On 5 December, Sir Hilary Synnott advised that recruitment had been made more difficult by "the widely held perception that secondment to Basra might involve danger, discomfort and long hours with little reward (although seen from here, some of these concerns are exaggerated)".[378] Sir Hilary expressed sympathy with the view put in London that imprecise and changing job descriptions presented an additional obstacle, but argued that tasks could not be defined until there was an expert on the ground:

> "We should not become mesmerised by job descriptions. The main thing is to have relatively expert people on the ground in sufficient numbers and quickly. Resourceful officers will find plenty to do for themselves. Contracts need to be sufficiently flexible to allow for this."

575. In his valedictory on 26 January 2004, Sir Hilary Synnott expressed frustration at the slow deployment of staff, complicated by the short tours which constantly led to gaps between appointments:

> "… it was brought home to me that officials could not be deployed like the military, despite notional mobility obligations; that the contracting processes to employ non-official civilians were lengthy; that these had to be followed by pre-deployment training which was only intermittently available; and that, crucially, departments' duty of care constrained recruitment … [I]n these circumstances, "as fast as possible" was simply not fast enough."[379]

576. In his memoir, Sir Hilary described the shortage of human resources and expertise as "the greatest single deficiency of our civilian operation":

"It is now clear that there were two main reasons for this. Partly it was a result of the excessive priority which was, and still is, placed on the security of civilian public servants …

"But a more fundamental reason for the short supply of personnel and other resources stemmed from a lack of political direction … The Army could, as always, be relied upon to find solutions for themselves, albeit cut according to their overstretched means. But in the civilian domain, Blair's exhortations and verbal commitments were not reflected in exceptional measures such as identifying and encouraging volunteers by means of trawls of Embassies around the world, fast-track recruitment procedures, or new management and co-ordination systems across government departments."[380]

577. Mr James Tansley, Consul General in Basra from October 2005 to April 2006, told the Inquiry:

"Under our current terms and conditions of service you can't tell someone in the Foreign Office to go to Basra. It's a voluntary thing, and that was the Foreign Office's policy. No matter how you present it, being told you are going to be sitting in a fortified camp, being mortared every evening and probably not seeing daylight for a number of – not so much daylight, but not seeing the outside world for six weeks at a time, is not a particularly good sell, particularly if you feel that no one in London appreciates what you are doing.[381]

578. Asked whether he had the right team to do what was needed, Mr Tansley replied: "The incentives weren't there."

579. Ms Lindy Cameron, Deputy Head of DFID Baghdad from January to November 2004 and Head of DFID Iraq from November 2004 to August 2005, told the Inquiry:

"Late 2003 before I got there and early 2004, it was quite hard for us to get the right people. It's important not to underestimate the impact that the bombing of the Canal Hotel had on willingness of staff to come and work in Iraq … I recall having to brief staff before they arrived that they had to be aware that friends and family would be quite aggressive with them about why it was they wanted to put themselves at risk to do something that many people considered to be something which was a mistake."[382]

580. Mr Tim Foy, Head of DFID Iraq from August 2005 to August 2006, told the Inquiry:

"Generally speaking, I think we did reasonably well in terms of acquiring core staff from DFID, certainly in the early years. I think it's got progressively harder as the engagement has progressed because the lustre of going has gone there."[383]

581. The recruitment of UK police officers for deployment to Iraq faced additional obstacles.

582. CC Kernaghan, holder of the International Affairs portfolio for the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) from 2001 to 2008, told the Inquiry that the impact of a posting to Iraq on police officers' careers had been a significant obstacle to effective recruitment and deployment. He had considered it his responsibility to point out to potential recruits that Iraq might not be a good career move.[384]

583. CC Kernaghan added that the police experience had not been entirely negative. After a while, the positive testimonies of returning officers had started to encourage potential recruits: "I actually found it marginally easier to deploy people. They were not affected by the big picture."

584. Former Chief Superintendent Dick Barton, UK Chief Police Adviser in Iraq from 2006 to 2007, told the Inquiry that "it was made quite clear to me that there were no guarantees regarding postings or jobs on my return".[385]

585. The resource cost to the contributing police force was also a constraint on recruitment. ACC Smith told the Inquiry: "Some forces, particularly the larger metropolitan, refused to allow serving officers to deploy."[386]

586. Government departments took a number of steps to encourage staff to volunteer for Iraq, including:

- financial allowances;
- decompression breaks;
- assistance with post-Iraq job placements; and
- temporary promotion.

587. Incentives to attract UK volunteers were not introduced uniformly across government. Differences in the terms and conditions applied by different organisations persisted throughout the Iraq campaign.

588. In November 2003, FCO officials started to consider additional incentives to attract the growing number of volunteers needed to fill civilian roles in Iraq and to be able to replace them every few months for the foreseeable future.

589. On 3 November 2003, the IOU informed Sir Michael Jay that civil service secondees in Iraq received allowances worth about £1,500 a month, depending on grade.[387] By comparison, FCO and DFID contractors earned up to £1,000 a day. The IOU advised:

> "There is no sign, yet, that money is a significant factor in finding civil service volunteers for Iraq. But we may have to consider some improvement in the financial terms if we find it increasingly difficult to recruit the civil service staff we need over the next few months."

590. DFID's November 2004 'Guide to Overseas Terms and Conditions for Long-term Assignments in Iraq' explained:

> "DFID's work in Iraq is very high profile and has assumed major corporate importance. Working in Iraq is dangerous and the conditions are difficult. We need staff with appropriate skills, e.g. programme management, and a high degree of self-motivation to carry out this work. So, we have devised a package of allowances and benefits specifically to attract such people and meet their needs."[388]

591. The details provided covered financial, travel and leave entitlements, health care, insurance, accommodation and security."

592. Hardship allowances for Iraq were said to be high compared with other countries, at £26,900 per annum in November 2004.

593. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event who served in Iraq between mid-2004 and mid-2007 viewed the financial package available to civilians positively, but expressed some resentment towards "overpaid" private sector contractors on "extraordinary" daily rates.

594. In 2003 the FCO introduced the "Golden Ticket" for staff deployed to Iraq for three months or longer.[389] The Golden Ticket gave the holder priority over other applicants when applying for their next job. It remained valid until a substantive job was secured.

595. The November 2004 text of the standard letter issued to FCO staff posted to diplomatic missions in Iraq stated: "HR and the wider Office value the contribution you have made, and we hope that this will go some way to recognising that."[390] It also explained that a posting to Iraq would not be counted as one of the maximum of two overseas postings usually allowed by the FCO before staff had to return to London.

596. The Golden Ticket policy remained unchanged in 2005.[391]

597. An official from the FCO HR Directorate told Mr Asquith in June 2006 that staff in Basra had asked whether the Golden Ticket really meant anything.[392] The official had explained to staff that the ticket was not a guarantee of a dream posting but "an added extra". It was important that staff obtained timely, good quality appraisals of their performance in Iraq to support job applications.

598. The Golden Ticket was still on offer in January 2008, with an additional caveat:

> "You will be able to 'cash in' your ticket when you next bid for jobs. A Golden Ticket will give your bid priority over other officers' bids provided you are considered equally credible in the job in other respects."[393]

599. In August 2008, an official in the FCO Human Resources Directorate informed DFID that although the Golden Ticket had not been abolished formally, "we recognise that it is increasingly difficult to deliver and the staff in post also recognise this".[394]

600. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event who had been posted to Iraq during the CPA period commented that some people had been "pressured" to volunteer for tours in Iraq with the offer of a Golden Ticket, but nobody knew of anyone rewarded with a favourable posting on their return. Some said they had not had jobs held open for them during their absence because of cost-saving pressures.

601. Members of the group also commented that many in their home departments did not want to hear about their experiences on return from Iraq because of the negative perceptions of the conflict in departments and the wider public.

602. Participants who served in Iraq from mid-2004 to mid-2007 said that the career impact of a posting to Iraq was often more negative than positive. There was a perception that human resources departments did not recognise adequately the skills acquired and that the career benefits had been oversold during recruitment. Some returnees felt their departments saw them as something of a problem. The MOD was a notable exception, where skills had been recognised and there had been a positive career impact.

603. Some non-MOD participants also commented that performance in jobs following an Iraq posting was often poor. Possible contributory factors included low motivation and lack of understanding by subsequent managers of what staff had been through.

604. The Inquiry has seen evidence that temporary promotion was widely used in the MOD as an additional incentive for recruitment of volunteers.

605. In late 2007, Mr Jon Day, MOD Director General Operational Policy, commented unfavourably on the large number of MOD civilians given "T&G [temporary and geographical] promotion well above their grade".[395]

606. Participants at the civilian outreach event suggested that, between 2007 and 2009, it had become more difficult to recruit suitable candidates. There was concern that availability rather than suitability became the deciding factor, and that some posts had been overgraded to attract applicants.

607. The US also experienced difficulty filling positions in Iraq.

608. In June 2004, the US General Accounting Office (GAO) reported that the CPA "had generally operated with about one-third of its direct positions vacant".[396] Reasons suggested for the shortfall included the hardship of the posting, the security situation and budgetary constraints.

609. The RAND history of the CPA stated that the CPA suffered severe shortages of trained and experienced personnel throughout its existence, with a number of sectors, including police and justice, "chronically undermanned".[397] Contributory factors included rapid staff turnover, the CPA's inability to keep track of the staff it had, and its failure to identify requirements still to be met.

610. In January 2006, the Office of the Special Inspector for Iraq Reconstruction concluded that a number of circumstances had inhibited effective workforce planning, including:

- the wide-ranging role of the CPA;
- the CPA's temporary status;
- deteriorating security;
- inaccurate pre-conflict assumptions about Iraq's bureaucracy;
- limited sources of personnel;
- constantly changing requirements; and
- inconsistent inter-agency co-ordination.[398]

Seniority

611. Ministers and officials frequently expressed concern about the difficulties faced by the UK in deploying the right people to positions where they would be able to exert UK influence in a US-dominated environment and achieve lasting impact in Iraq.

612. The issue arose in a number of different contexts. It appears not to have been addressed systematically.

613. The appointment of Major General Tim Cross as the senior UK member of ORHA in February 2003 is addressed earlier in this Section.

614. Section 9.2 describes the appointment of his successor, Mr Andy Bearpark.

615. In the Annotated Agenda for the AHMGIR on 22 May 2003, officials advised that Mr Bearpark needed to be given the right job to "maximise UK influence in ORHA".[399]

616. Mr Bearpark was subsequently appointed CPA Director of Operations and Infrastructure. He arrived in Baghdad on 16 June.

617. Section 9.2 describes how, although UK officials in Whitehall regarded Mr Bearpark as the UK's senior representative in the CPA, Mr Bearpark saw his primary loyalty as lying with the CPA and Ambassador Bremer.

618. Several weeks after Mr Bearpark's arrival in Baghdad, the Government agreed that a senior UK figure should be appointed to head CPA(South).

619. On 10 July, the AHMGIR agreed that:

- Secondments to the CPA should be maintained at "approximately the current level", but matched more closely to requirements, with more specialist than policy staff.
- The UK effort in CPA(South) should be increased "as required", including through the appointment of a "suitably strong UK figure" to replace Ambassador Olsen.[400]

620. On 11 July 2003, Ms Hewitt advised Mr Blair of the need "to ensure that we are seconding sufficiently senior people to the CPA". It was noticeable that the US was sending more senior people than the UK.[401]

621. Shortly afterwards, the IPU put forward recommendations for CPA staffing based on the principle that the UK should seek to exert influence at "all levels". These included:

- filling gaps, including at a senior level, in UK coverage of SSR, the economic ministries and the oil ministry;

- appointing a senior figure to lead CPA(South), where there were already 15 UK secondees; and
- leadership of four of the 18 CPA GTs scheduled to begin operations in September, with deployment starting in late August.[402]

622. On 25 July, Sir Michael Jay informed Sir Andrew Turnbull and Permanent Secretaries that Ministers had decided the UK would maintain "approximately the current level of overall commitment" with a focus in Baghdad on Security Sector Reform, the economic ministries and the oil sector, a "stronger lead" in CPA(South) and leadership of four CPA GTs.[403]

623. Sir Hilary Synnott arrived in Basra as Head of CPA(South) on 30 July.[404]

624. On 24 September, Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the Prime Minister's Special Representative on Iraq, commented that the UK "has not yet put the intensity of resources into the civilian side of our operation, in terms of both personnel and project money, to convince the Americans that our analysis … has to be listened to" (see Section 10.1).[405]

625. Sir Andrew Turnbull and Mr O'Donnell discussed the seniority of UK secondees to the CPA on 11 November.[406] They observed that the recent reorganisation of the CPA (see Section 10.1) had left the UK with no UK officials at Director level and concluded that: "It was difficult to continue to send staff as secondees if they were left with low level roles only."

626. Although the Treasury and Bank of England deployed only junior officials to Iraq, they were noticeably effective (see Section 10.1).

627. A Treasury official speaking at a Treasury seminar in July 2004, said that securing people with the right skills had been "paramount" in Iraq:

> "… we didn't have many people to deploy so we took care to second people who could add value, and we are very fortunate in having a skill set within the Treasury that was able to deploy effectively in the circumstances."[407]

628. Seniority was not a guarantee of influence.

629. In August 2003, officials informed Ministers that the UK was "seeking to engage the US Administration and CPA leadership over oil sector issues in order to gain influence over decisions and policy" (see Section 10.1).[408] Two "senior people" were joining the CPA Oil Team, including Mr Terry Adams as the CPA Oil Technical Expert. The CPA had welcomed Mr Adams' appointment, but had been "less than enthusiastic" about the second UK appointment.

630. TPUK informed Mr Blair on 10 October that the DTI's efforts to understand and influence CPA policy on oil and gas had been "consistently unsuccessful" until Mr Adams' arrival. Mr Adams' appointment had improved the DTI's understanding to some extent, although officials believed that the CPA had restricted Mr Adams' access to information and decision-making meetings.[409]

631. On 14 October Ministers were informed that Mr Adams was "routinely excluded from some meetings".[410]

632. A further instance of US resistance to senior UK appointments occurred in January 2004, when the Iraq Senior Officials Group concluded that, given the US lead in the media sector, there was little scope for UK involvement, and that the US was resisting the secondment of senior UK staff (see Section 10.1).[411]

633. At the end of January 2004, the US asked for UK help in staffing the Program Management Office (PMO) that had been set up to oversee CPA reconstruction funds (see Section 10.1).[412]

634. UKTI contracted two individuals to work in the PMO, initially for three months. The first deployed in early March 2004, the second in early April.[413]

635. In early June, UKTI began considering whether to continue to fund the two contractors.[414]

636. A UKTI official set out the arguments for Mr Mike O'Brien, FCO Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, on 21 June:

> "We can claim indirect benefit to UK plc from these consultants, but it is difficult to quantify any direct commercial benefit. PMO procurement still (rightly) has to go through a full competitive process … But these consultancies have earned us a great deal of goodwill from PMO senior management, ensured a UK voice at the highest levels of the organisation, and [have been] a useful but unacknowledged source of commercial information."[415]

637. The official recommended that, given the difficulty in identifying any direct commercial benefit to the UK and the high cost of the contractors, UKTI should not agree to the US request to extend the contractors' contracts.

638. Discussions within UKTI and between UKTI, the FCO and DFID failed to identify further funding for the posts.[416]

639. In November 2004, in response to Mr Blair's suggestions that the UK needed to find more effective ways of getting the US to spend its funds more quickly and with greater impact, Mr Benn explained that Mr Bill Taylor, the US head of the Project Contracting Office (PCO), which had taken over some of the functions of the PMO after the transfer of sovereignty in June 2004, "has declined our offer of a senior reconstruction specialist but we are offering technical help instead" (see Section 10.2).[417]

640. Witnesses to the Inquiry offered contrasting views on the success of the UK's effort to deploy the right people to the right positions in Iraq.

641. Sir David Richmond told the Inquiry that the CPA generally received the people it needed from the UK:

> "I think we did pretty well on that … [T]here was a sort of little bit of a generation gap, perhaps inevitably, given the security circumstances, in that you got a large tranche of relatively young people, because they were single and didn't have families and children to worry about … We also had quite senior people, whose families had grown up, again less concerned. So there was sort of a missing middle to some extent, but I think that's probably inevitable in the situation."[418]

642. Mr Bearpark was less sanguine. He highlighted the effect of the imbalance between military and civilian numbers. Because civilians could not cover all the meetings taking place each day that were relevant to their work, "99 military planners are going away saying, 'DFID is useless' and only one of them is admitting that DFID does actually know what it is talking about". That systemic problem had been resolved very quickly in Bosnia in 1994 and 1995:

> "… whatever your limited civilian resource is … it must match exactly into where you insert it into the military machine. If you can only afford one person, that person has to be the equivalent of the Commanding General. If you can afford three people, you can place them two ranks down, and if you can only afford one junior person, that person must be on the personal staff of the Commanding General."[419]

643. In his valedictory as Head of the IPU in May 2005, Mr Crompton criticised the FCO's "inability (or unwillingness)" to redeploy senior staff at short notice:

> "In summer 2003 we carried short gaps in both Baghdad and Basra at critical times, absences which damaged our reputation around Whitehall … If the FCO aspires to be the lead on post-conflict issues, it needs to be willing to redeploy senior staff immediately from other positions, leaving gaps if necessary."[420]

644. Mr Tinline, who served in Basra from 2007 to 2008, told the Inquiry that recruitment was less of a concern than it might have been because of the security situation:

> "… if the security constraints had been less, I think a lot of these things would have been far bigger issues. Because the security constraints were such, we didn't actually need that much staff. We couldn't actually do that much. So the sort of lost opportunity was in fact minimal."[421]

Skills

645. Between 2003 and 2009, UK Ministers and officials expressed concern about a shortage of UK Arabic speakers and of expertise in a number of fields associated with reconstruction and stabilisation.

646. The Government's response to the shortage of reconstruction and stabilisation expertise is addressed in Section 10.3, which considers the creation of the Post-Conflict Reconstruction Unit and its successor, the Stabilisation Unit.

647. Several witnesses to the Inquiry commented on the shortage of Arabic speakers deployed to Iraq throughout the period covered by the Inquiry.

648. Sir Mark Lyall-Grant, FCO Political Director from February 2007 to October 2009, who was not an Arabic speaker, explained that he had three experts on the Middle East working for him who were Arabic speakers: Mr McDonald, Dr Jenkins and Mr Prentice.[422]

649. Mr Tansley, Consul General in Basra from October 2005 to April 2006, told the Inquiry that he was the only Arabic speaker at the British Embassy Office Basra during his time there.[423] He explained that, not only was living in Basra more restrictive than in Baghdad, but there was also:

> "… a view, in purely career terms that the high profile work … was being done up in Baghdad, liaising with ministers, most of whom spoke English and were all western educated and quite smooth, suave and sophisticated, compared with the politicians we had to deal with down in Basra.

> "So in many ways it was a certain sort of person who would have enjoyed his time or her time in Basra. I think there were those who did. I think I would have liked it if the Foreign Office could have come up with another Arabist.
> "As I said, I think we could have had more impact in terms of personnel if we had people who were a bit more specialist in the region and who spoke Arabic, and if we could have got people to come at the time when I most needed them."

650. Mr Nigel Heywood, Consul General in Basra from April 2008 to August 2009, told the Inquiry that he had one UK-based Arabic-speaking slot on his staff and a locally engaged political adviser who acted as interpreter.[424] Mr Heywood suggested that there was a competitive advantage to be gained from having Arabists in an environment like Iraq, where other countries did not have any on their staff.

651. Mr MacKiggan, Head of the Basra PRT from 2008 to 2009, did not speak Arabic, and worked through interpreters.[425] He told the Inquiry that it was necessary to prioritise skills and that it was difficult to find the person who had all the skills you were looking for in an environment like Iraq.

652. Shortage of Arabic language skills was also a consistent theme among participants at the Inquiry civilian outreach event.

653. The Inquiry has seen no evidence that any Kurdish speakers were deployed, or available to be deployed, by either the FCO or the MOD between 2003 and 2009.

654. In March 2002, FCO Research Analysts hosted a discussion on Middle Eastern and Islamic studies in the UK involving representatives of industry and the academic community.[426] The event raised concerns about the shortage of Arabic speakers in a range of institutions, including the FCO, and the decline in the teaching of Middle Eastern studies and languages in the UK. Some Middle Eastern languages, including Kurdish, were not being taught at all in the UK. Participants warned that, when money was tight, language teaching was often the first area to suffer.

655. In 2007, the FCO closed its Language Centre.[427] The British Academy's 2013 report on languages in UK diplomacy and security described the closure as "the low point of what had been a gradual decline in language skills amongst diplomats". The decline had been particularly marked among languages that were difficult to learn, including Arabic.

656. In 2011, Mr William Hague, the Foreign Secretary, told the Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) inquiry into the role of the FCO in UK government that he wanted language expertise and regional knowledge to be "re-accentuated" in the FCO.[428]

657. Two witnesses to the FAC inquiry argued that there was a disjuncture between Mr Hague's emphasis on language skills for UK diplomats and decisions to cut government support for the teaching of modern languages in UK universities.[429]

658. Dr Christian Turner, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, informed the FAC that the FCO had taken a number of steps to improve Arabic language skills:

- restoration of the length of full time Arabic training to 18 months;
- more opportunities for staff in London to learn Arabic and maintain existing skills; and
- a 40 percent increase in "Arabic speaker capacity" in Middle East and North Africa posts compared to 2010.[430]

659. In its 2012 report on British foreign policy and the Arab Spring, the FAC concluded that the FCO had "significantly degraded" its language capacity by 2010, but had since recognised the need to improve Arabic language skills.[431]

660. At the opening of the new FCO language school on 19 September 2013, Mr Hague described expertise in a foreign language as "one of the fundamental skills of our diplomats":

> "It makes them vastly more effective at communicating the viewpoint of the United Kingdom. And it is vital to understanding the political mood in different countries and to spotting trends or anticipating crises.
>
>
> "It helps us, for example to identify and influence individuals and groups playing a significant part in shaping events, such as in the context of the Arab spring. Arabic is the fastest growing language on social media platforms globally, and we need good language skills to tap into this rich conversation and to put across the UK position.
> "Language skills are invaluable when trying to understand and predict the behaviour of countries that do not have transparent, democratic political systems, and where reliable information is harder to come [by] but vitally important to British companies or to our security interests.

"With 40 classrooms we have space here to train up to 1,000 full and part-time language students over the course of 12 months, in up to 80 different languages from Arabic to Zulu. We will be offering 70,000 hours of teaching each year, not just for the men and women of the Foreign Office, but to those of other government departments if they wish to take advantage of our services.

"So we are also increasing the number of jobs overseas for which language skills are required in key parts of our overseas network. We've brought in a 20 percent increase in the number of posts for speakers of Latin American Spanish, Portuguese and Arabic, and a 40 percent increase in the number of Mandarin speakers."[432]

661. In his speech, Mr Hague described the new language facility as just one part of "the biggest drive to enhance the diplomatic skills of the Foreign Office that the department has ever seen". A stronger culture of learning and expertise was part of a "quiet revolution" that included "a greater emphasis on history and the retention and sharing of knowledge and expertise". Changes included moving the FCO's historians "back into the heart of the Foreign Office" and attaching greater importance to the work of Research Analysts.

662. The British Academy welcomed the opening of the new FCO language school, but warned that significant work was needed to embed the changes and reverse the decline.[433]

663. By November 2003, the UK military was also facing a shortage of Arabic speakers and interpreters.[434]

664. The Chiefs of Staff raised the shortfall in the number of linguists available at their meeting on 16 July 2003.[435] General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, directed Lieutenant General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Commitments), to establish the exact requirement and where the linguists might be found.

665. In December 2003, MOD officials informed Lt Gen Fry that, in addition to "tactical linguist requirements" in military units, Op TELIC had a requirement for 39 linguists on six-month deployments.[436] By November 2003, officials expected that requirement would last three to four years.

666. Officials explained that the search for Arabic speakers across the three services had exhausted the pool of suitably qualified regular soldiers, and the mobilisation of reserves had exhausted the pool of linguists in the Territorial Army (TA). Training individuals to the level required for the 39 core posts took 10-12 months.

667. MOD officials explained that allocating 18 of the 39 posts to civilians offered a partial solution, but there was still a need to fill the remaining 21 posts every six months for the foreseeable future. Proposals included:

- an increase in the provision of training by the Defence School of Languages;
- expansion of the pool of TA linguists;
- further civilianisation;
- a request for FCO assistance, judged unlikely to succeed because of the FCO commitment to the CPA; and
- redeployment of Arabic-speaking Defence and Military Attachés at British Embassies, thought likely to damage relations with FCO staff in those Embassies and affect working relationships with host countries.

668. It is not clear from the papers seen by the Inquiry which, if any, of those recommendations was implemented during Op TELIC.

669. In early 2004, the press reported that several language students at UK universities were putting their degrees on hold to work in Iraq as interpreters and translators for the UK military.[437] By mid-February, 16 students had been employed, with five already working in Iraq.

670. MOD guidance on the military contribution to peace support operations published in June 2004 made only passing references to language skills. It stated:

> "The ability to negotiate and mediate will place a premium on basic language skills. However, working through interpreters is currently more usual and therefore should be practised before deployment."[438]

671. The absence of clear UK military doctrine on language capability was addressed in 2013.[439] A Joint Doctrine Note on linguistic support to operations stated that the military:

- had only "a modest standing language capability … not well placed to support operational planning or high readiness deployment needs"; and
- had been "inherently slow to build capability for enduring operations".

672. In 2013, the growing recognition of the importance of language skills was reflected in the opening of the new Defence School of Language and Culture 2013.[440]

673. The British Academy's 2013 report on the need for languages in UK diplomacy and security attributed the MOD's change of approach directly to lessons learned in the Iraq and Afghanistan campaigns.

674. Both the FCO and the Armed Forces failed to anticipate or prepare for the surge in demand for Arabic speakers in Iraq.

675. In its 2013 report, the British Academy described some of the steps taken by the MOD to generate language capacity quickly, but stated that, of the organisations consulted, only the secret intelligence agencies appreciated the need for and difficulty of ensuring sustainability of supply and surge capacity, especially for rare languages.[441]

676. The British Academy added that there appeared to be "little co-ordination across government to identify language needs and no overall strategic approach to enable future needs to be met." The report proposed more flexible working across departments, allowing staff with language skills to be seconded for specific projects, such as engaging with hard to reach groups. The new FCO language centre was identified as a significant opportunity for pooling resources.

Tour length and continuity

677. The difficult working conditions for civilians in Iraq were reflected in short tour lengths and frequent leave breaks. Different departments adopted different arrangements throughout the Iraq campaign.

678. Officials expressed concern about the impact of those arrangements, including:

- breaks in continuity;[442]
- loss of momentum;[443]
- lack of institutional memory;[444] and
- insufficient local knowledge.[445]

679. Participants at the Iraq Inquiry civilian outreach event also referred to reduced credibility with external interlocutors.

680. An initial tour length of three months for the first wave of secondees to the CPA was extended to six months in July 2003.[446]

681. The FCO pre-deployment letter for November 2004 stated that: "In light of the dangers and discomforts a posting to Iraq is six months with the option of a further six months thereafter."[447] In addition to the FCO's normal and overseas leave, staff would be entitled to an extra 10 days' leave each year.

682. DFID's November 2004 'Guide to Overseas Terms and Conditions for Long-term Assignments in Iraq' explained that DFID postings were for up to 12 months with a rota of six weeks on, two weeks off, away from Iraq.[448]

683. In April 2005, the MOD considered introducing longer tours to mitigate some of the effects of the short tour length (six months with a 10-day break half way through).[449] Mr Richard Hatfield, MOD Personnel Director, reported that many MOD staff in Iraq were willing to do a second tour, or suggesting that slightly longer tours might be more effective, if more difficult to sell to potential volunteers. Mr Hatfield recognised the possible advantages of longer tours, particularly where continuity or local knowledge was at a premium. He proposed that the MOD take "a slightly more 'mix and match' approach about tour patterns, taking account of both the individual's circumstances/ desires and the nature of the post".

684. In May 2006, Mr Mark Etherington, Basra PRT Team Leader, reported that:

> "The military component of the PRT – roughly a third – is invaluable, but cannot act as a repository of expertise because tour lengths are short. This civilian core must be large enough to withstand the turbulence of the six-and-two week leave system … or we risk a loss of momentum."[450]

685. In December 2007, Sir Peter Ricketts called for a reassessment of policy on the length of postings to Baghdad.[451] Many staff were able to cope with an extra six months, if not a second year: "Quite a head of steam is building up on this issue and it needs to be tackled."

686. Tour lengths remained unchanged. The January 2008 version of the FCO terms and conditions for postings to Iraq stated:

> "In light of the associated dangers and discomforts of living in Iraq, a posting to Iraq is six months with the option of a further six month extension. As you know, Iraq

> "Extensions beyond 12 months are rare and only granted if there are compelling operational reasons."[452]

687. Staff were not permitted to bid for consecutive jobs in Iraq and/or Afghanistan with a combined duration of over 12 months "while these posts are at a security level warranting close protection teams and decompression breaks".

688. The 2008 terms and conditions also stated that the length and frequency of decompression breaks were linked to the security situation and could change during a posting. The interval between decompression breaks was set at between six and seven weeks. In special circumstances, staff could seek authority to spend eight weeks at post without a break.

689. The Inquiry received a range of views on the merits of different models.

690. Mr MacKiggan, Head of the Basra PRT from 2008 to 2009, told the Inquiry:

> "I think nine to 12 months should be the norm, perhaps even the minimum, because it takes time to develop relationships … It is partly relationships with … locals … It is also about relationships between different parts of government."[453]

691. Mr Tansley endorsed the MOD model:

> "Comparing terms and conditions of service between the FCO and the political advisers who were attached to MND(South East), I would have preferred perhaps an arrangement that the POLADs had, which I thought was more effective than what the FCO was doing, both in terms of the level on health and safety reasons, what they could and could not do, in terms of how often they had their decompression breaks."[454]

692. All three working groups at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event debated the merits of different tour lengths, including the impact on civilian-military relations, business continuity, relationships with external partners and the impact on individuals and their families.

693. Participants who had served in Iraq during the CPA period commented that 12 months was the maximum time during which personnel could remain effective. Six weeks on and two off (6+2) was seen as an effective model. Tours were complicated by the difficulty of getting out of Iraq, resulting in people not taking their leave, and by the shortage of staff to cover work while people were on leave.

694. Those who had been in Iraq between mid-2004 and mid-2007 commented that covering absences under the 6+2 model required a much higher degree of flexibility than was normal for the civil service, and that two-week absences had a negative impact on civilians' credibility with external interlocutors, including the UK military. 6+2 had the advantage that it allowed those with families to deploy and made it possible to sustain tours of one to two years, providing greater continuity than the six months (with a one-week break) served by MOD civilians.

695. There was also thought to have been an impact on relationships with Iraqi interlocutors, who were frustrated with frequent and apparently ill-planned changes of UK personnel. In some cases there was a suspicion that Iraqis had exploited the situation, for example by misrepresenting what had been agreed previously.

696. Some individuals who had been in Iraq from mid-2007 suggested that, at least initially, departments were too rigid about tour lengths. Those wanting to extend beyond 12 months had been forced by their departments to return. Different tour lengths for MOD civilians continued to inhibit business and the building of relationships during this period. The group concluded that different jobs called for different tour lengths.

Learning operational lessons

697. Between 2003 and 2009, departments debriefed some civilian staff returning from Iraq in order to learn operational lessons from their experience.

698. Departments took steps to improve the debriefing process, but do not appear to have established a comprehensive or consistent approach.

699. At the AHMGIR on 24 July 2003, Mr Straw asked the Cabinet Office and the IPU to devise a debriefing system for secondees to Iraq.[455]

700. On 7 August, officials informed the AHMGIR that the IPU was debriefing the first wave of returning UK secondees to the CPA.[456]

701. The FCO drew on the contributions of returning secondees for its November 2003 review of pre-deployment training and terms and conditions for civilian staff, described later in this Section.[457]

702. Separately, the Cabinet Office Corporate Development Group (CDG) began assessing the benefits of CPA secondments to staff and departments. The aim was to report to Ministers in November, drawing on responses to a questionnaire to be given to secondees within a month of their return from Iraq.[458]

703. Mr Straw told Cabinet on 27 November that he had spoken to some 60 UK staff at CPA headquarters in Baghdad, whose "extraordinary stoicism", commitment and contribution should be recognised.[459] There was, however, a sense that staff from departments that did not normally send people on overseas postings were not properly appreciated by those departments, either while in Iraq or on their return. Mr Straw asked colleagues to ensure Permanent Secretaries were "managing and supporting" their seconded staff and suggested that regular contact should be maintained between departmental top management and their secondees.

704. On 1 December, Mr John Barker, a Director in the Cabinet Office Corporate Development Group, updated Sir Andrew Turnbull on responses to the questionnaire given to returning UK secondees to the CPA.[460] Mr Barker reported:

> "So far we have only had eight questionnaires returned. Although they have raised a small number of niggles for example in relation to visa problems in Kuwait delaying travel arrangements and to difficulties in getting help to arrange flights home, the overall response has been positive. Volunteers have enjoyed the experience, learned from it, felt proud to have been involved, enjoyed the comradeship and will be happy to recommend others to go out there. None of the questionnaires mention concerns about treatment on return to their department.
> "There may of course be people who have not let us know of difficulties …"

705. Mr Barker proposed that Sir Andrew Turnbull write to Permanent Secretaries, reminding them that:

> "… colleagues are doing a splendid job in very trying circumstances and will be developing their competences in many of the areas we would want them to. We should ensure that their contribution is recognised and that they do not have grounds for believing that their careers have suffered because of being there."

706. Sir Andrew Turnbull wrote to Permanent Secretaries on 3 December.[461] He reported that Ministers greatly appreciated the "courage, persistence and determination" of staff in Iraq and felt more could be done to recognise what they were achieving:

> "Please encourage your Human Resources and Communications teams to address this, for example by generating reports for your house journals, sending messages > of support and appreciation to secondees, and feeding stories to local newspapers and radio stations (as our military colleagues often do so well) …

> "We should also ensure that the experience gained by secondees in Iraq is valued properly, and reflected in their appraisals and future career development …"

707. In July 2004, after the disbanding of the CPA, the Treasury held a seminar to learn lessons from the UK's contribution to the rehabilitation of Iraq's economic and financial administration during the CPA period.[462] Treasury and Bank of England secondees to the CPA spoke at the seminar, which was attended by Mr Brown, Mr Boateng, Sir Michael Jay and Mr O'Donnell.

708. After the seminar, Mr O'Donnell saw the secondees to the CPA "to talk about their time there and the lessons we can have".

709. Several participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event said that the Inquiry's event was the first time they had been asked to talk about their experiences. Most of those who had served in Iraq during the CPA period felt let down. They felt that departments had not tried to make use of the knowledge they had acquired or to bring them into strategy discussions. Most of the participants had not had a post-tour debriefing. There was a feeling at the civilian outreach event that the Whitehall approach to human resources, leaving individuals to look after themselves, was not appropriate for this sort of expeditionary civilian deployment.

710. After a visit to Iraq in April 2005, Mr Hatfield reported that the MOD needed:

> "… to make more active use of operational veterans to sell the prospect of a deployed tour to potential volunteers – their enthusiasm is catching and they are well placed to supply answers about both the real and imaginary concerns people may have about what is involved."[463]

711. Mr Hatfield also reported that:

> "The Ambassador [Mr Chaplin] was … interested in our arrangements for debriefing – which at present it seems the FCO do not do. I suspect that we need to be a bit more systematic here, too. Debriefing is therapeutic as well as potentially informative – and may also help to identify any individuals with aftercare needs."

712. The FCO, the MOD and DFID provided different pre-deployment training for staff posted to Iraq.

713. Periodic efforts to synchronise approaches did not produce consistency across departments.

714. In October 2003, COBR commissioned an FCO-led review of training, security and insurance for UK civilians serving in Iraq to "ensure that there is consistency across all government departments seconding staff and consultants".[464]

715. Sir Michael Jay sent the findings to Permanent Secretaries and the heads of organisations with secondees in Iraq on 11 November 2003.[465]

716. The paper stated that, before deployment to Iraq, staff from the FCO and other government departments (excluding DFID), and individuals contracted by the FCO, attended a security-focused training course at the Reserves Training and Mobilisation Centre in Nottingham (Chilwell). The initial course included:

- Medical and dental examination
- Inoculations
- Intelligence Brief
- NBC [nuclear, biological and chemical] kit issue and familiarisation
- Foreign Weapon familiarisation
- Issue of body armour and helmet, boots, kit bag etc
- Conduct after Capture
- Law of Armed Conflict
- Mine Awareness."

717. The course had been "improved and adapted" at FCO request to include:

"
- Cultural Awareness Brief
- Hostage Situations
- Environmental Health
- Combat First Aid."

718. The course also included a briefing by the FCO Iraq Directorate on working and living conditions, including a "preliminary security briefing". Modules on NBC, "Conduct after Capture" and "Law of Armed Conflict" had been dropped.

719. The paper stated that, when no course was available at Chilwell, secondees attended an equivalent course provided by a private sector company. In a few cases, including that of Sir Jeremy Greenstock, the requirement for pre-deployment training had been "overridden", but it was Iraq Directorate's "firm policy to insist that all secondees receive such training".

[465] Letter Jay to Chakrabarti, 11 November 2003, 'Security of UK Civilian Secondees in Iraq' attaching Paper, 'Iraq: Civilian Staff: Training, Briefing, Security and Insurance'.

720. The paper also stated that the MOD arranged its own training and briefing. For recent deployments, that had matched the FCO arrangements, although MOD staff continued to receive NBC training.

721. DFID training followed the same principles, but was provided by the private sector because those courses were more frequent.

722. The paper stated that debriefing of secondees on their return from Iraq indicated that they received good preparation "now that some deficiencies in the Chilwell course … have been dealt with". Feedback from staff still in Iraq "confirms that the training has been useful and appropriate".

723. Concerns about the Chilwell course resurfaced in the MOD in 2005. After visiting Iraq in April 2005, Mr Hatfield reported that the course did not seem to be working:

> "Apart from the cultural brief, hardly a good word was said about it. To be fair, it was not designed for civil servants. As a result of my discussions with our Ambassador [Mr Chaplin], I think the solution might be to join with the FCO who have their own preparatory course."

724. In June 2006, the MOD established the Support to Operations (S2O) programme in response to lessons learned from the deployment of civilians on Op TELIC.[466] The programme's aim was "to develop a more capable deployable civilian workforce, to reduce the risk to deployed civilian staff and to ensure MOD is meeting its duty of care to those deployed".

725. S2O was designed as a "single portal" for all deployed civil servants and visitors to operations, to ensure they had been adequately trained, were medically fit and had the appropriate equipment before deployment.[467]

726. The MOD told the Inquiry that S2O oversaw both pre- and post-deployment processes, with much emphasis on the support to families.[468]

727. Mr Martin Howard, MOD Director General Operational Policy, visited Basra and Baghdad from 17 to 20 January 2007.[469] He reported to Vice Admiral Charles Style, DCDS(C), that the MOD POLAD team in Basra and the MOD training team in Baghdad were in "good spirits" and found their roles challenging and interesting, but felt that:

- pre-deployment training and briefing were not adequate;
- their accommodation and support package was not comparable to that received by FCO and DFID staff;
- succession planning was not adequate; and

- they were not valued on return and did not get enough assistance finding a new position.

728. Mr Howard undertook to write to PJHQ about those issues.

729. The Inquiry has not seen any further material addressing those issues.

730. Participants at the civilian outreach event described the setting up of the S2O programme as a significant turning point for the MOD, rectifying problems with the previous system under which there had been no centralised unit for managing MOD civilian deployments.

731. Those deployed during the CPA period characterised training and the issuing of personal security equipment as ad hoc, with practice varying between departments. Several mentioned that military body armour was too big and heavy for people not used to it, and compared it unfavourably with the lighter armour issued to the media and some US civilians.

732. Participants who served in Iraq between 2004 and 2007 described pre-posting arrangements as ad hoc and haphazard. The MOD was felt to have performed better than the FCO, particularly after the creation of S2O in 2006. FCO participants were particularly critical of FCO workforce planning, including line managers' responsibility for recruiting their own staff, which did not work well when they were in theatre.

733. Participants at the outreach event who had been in Iraq between 2007 and 2009 saw no consistency in the pre-deployment preparation offered by different departments, but commented that there had been improvements to the security course at Chilwell.

734. Living conditions for personnel seconded to ORHA in April and May 2003 were difficult. Maj Gen Cross told the Inquiry:

> "The reality was the living conditions [for ORHA personnel] were pretty atrocious, and although somebody like myself who had done a number of operations was relatively comfortable, for a lot of people just surviving was pretty hard work."[470]

735. As early as June 2003, concerns emerged that civilian personnel deployed to Iraq were not prepared for the conditions they would encounter.

736. A DFID contractor seconded to CPA(South) asked the DFID Iraq Directorate to inform new consultants of the conditions in Basra, in particular the challenges of the working environment, climate and conditions.[471] One consultant had serious health issues and no medical insurance.

737. The PJHQ recruitment notice for civilian postings to Iraq published in July 2005 stated that applicants would need to be "fit and healthy, often to a higher standard than would be needed for a sedentary job in the UK … Unfortunately individuals with Type 1 or Type 2 diabetes … and individuals who have severe allergies cannot be deployed."[472]

738. The November 2005 version of the FCO terms and conditions for postings to Iraq advised that the FCO had contracted a private company, Frontier Medical, to provide primary health care services at posts in Iraq.[473] Secondary care was managed by International SOS using the 24-hour FCO Healthline. Close protection personnel were all first aid trained.

739. The terms and conditions stated: "The onus is on you to behave responsibly whilst at post with regard to your own health, in order to make sure you are as fit as possible at all times." Failure to act on the advice of the OSM, security personnel or Frontier Medical would be dealt with in a "firm manner".

740. On 16 February 2006, the FCO Human Resources Directorate (HRD) reviewed procedures for hostile environment training and medical clearance in response to "concerns that some FCO personnel on posting to, or visiting, Iraq are not capable of meeting the physical requirements".[474] Officials agreed a number of procedural changes, including new requirements that:

- the FCO Medical Examiner would confirm whether an officer was fit to go to Iraq before, not after, the posting board made the appointment; and
- hostile environment course instructors would comment on whether an officer was fit to deploy.

741. On 26 February, Mr Robert Gibson, Deputy Head of Mission at the British Embassy Baghdad, expressed concern about civilian staff already at post: "We judge subjectively that their fitness levels are low and their lack of speedy mobility might pose a danger to themselves and others."[475]

742. In June 2006, as part of its review of the security of staff and missions in Iraq, the IPU updated Sir Michael Jay on the measures in place to assess the health of FCO staff before, during and after deployment to Iraq:

- All potential applicants were required to complete a pre-posting fitness questionnaire. Their applications would not be processed until occupational health doctors had confirmed applicants' suitability.
- Successful applicants were required to attend hostile environment training. If the course organisers had concerns about an individual's ability to cope with "extreme conditions", the posting could be cancelled.

- "[H]ealth surveillance" was carried out on arrival in Iraq and at quarterly intervals "in liaison with Frontier Medical, Capita and HRD".
- Three months after completion of the tour, Capita interviewed the officer to assess the impact of the posting.[476]

743. The IPU explained that pre-posting procedures were "rigorously followed" for FCO staff, but it had been "unable to confirm this to be the case … for other government departments". There had been a few cases where individuals the FCO would not consider medically fit to serve in Iraq had arrived at post or medical teams had identified their medical problems at post at the last minute.

744. The IPU advised that the FCO did not have the resources to carry out medical screening and hostile environment training for all government staff deployed to Iraq. Instead it would:

> "… write to those departments and contractors most concerned, setting out our procedures and recommend that they either institute something similar or ensure their staff sit the Offshore Operators Association Medical. This is a rigorous medical required for staff working on oil rigs …"

745. In June 2006, a member of the FCO HR Directorate briefed two Frontier Medical staff in Basra on the FCO's process for pre-posting medical clearance.[477] During the discussion, it emerged that concerns persisted about the fitness of some contractors working for the FCO and other departments. The Frontier Medical staff also suggested that non-FCO personnel should have to pass a medical similar to that required for FCO staff as a condition of employment in Iraq. The FCO Iraq Directorate was reported to be pursuing the issue.

746. In July 2006, DFID officials explained to Mr Benn that, although DFID staff were covered by FCO procedures in most areas, that was not the case for pre-deployment procedures.[478] In the light of FCO concerns about the physical fitness of some DFID contractors, DFID had taken a number of steps, in consultation with the FCO, to tighten up pre-deployment medical fitness clearance and hostile environment training, including:

- asking staff to complete the FCO-led fitness pre-assessment form for postings to Iraq;
- discussing with the firms recruiting contractors the possibility of all staff undergoing a pre-assignment medical with a specialist organisation, rather than obtaining medical clearance from their GP;

- considering the possibility of introducing additional psychological assessments;
- making available a number of counsellors with security clearance; and
- improving Iraq-specific hostile environment training to include a fitness assessment.

747. In November, a representative of Frontier Medical in Iraq responded to concerns expressed by a junior official in DFID about medical fitness requirements.[479] He reported that: "Despite our frequent requests the FCO has still not clarified any set criteria for medical fitness for deployment to this theatre." In contrast, DFID had "instigated quite strict medical assessments prior to deployment … undertaken by an independent company, who have so far proved to be excellent".

748. Departments also provided psychological support to civilians deployed to Iraq.

749. On 5 March 2004, Mr Philip Parham, Head of the FCO Iraq Operations Unit (IOU), sent Sir Michael Jay a contingency plan for the FCO's response in the event of an attack that incapacitated the senior UK leadership in Baghdad or resulted in the death or injury of five or more UK civilian staff in Iraq.[480] The plan built on existing FCO procedures. Objectives included:

- ensure that all civilian staff in Iraq are promptly informed of what has happened, what remedial action is being taken, and what services and options are available to them;
- assess the attack's psychological impact on staff and advise whether staff should remain or be withdrawn."

750. The October 2004 version of the FCO pre-deployment briefing pack for staff from all departments and contractors referred to the availability of a trauma risk management (TRiM) interview for those exposed to "specific events".[481] The briefing also listed the range of medical and counselling services available, some of them 24 hours a day, and gave contact details for the information network set up "to inform and support" the relatives and friends of people serving in Iraq.

751. During the drawdown from the Basra Palace site in October 2006, the FCO confirmed that TRiM assessment was open to staff from other departments and contractors.[482]

752. At the same time, DFID introduced its own counselling service for civilians returning from fragile states.[483]

753. DFID officials recommended that service in November when approached by consultancy firms asking what counselling or debriefing was available to staff recently withdrawn from the Basra Palace site.[484]

754. Details of the new service were sent to DFID staff in London and Iraq on 28 November.[485] Staff would be expected to attend debriefing counselling sessions as part of existing security and medical procedures, in order to complement pre-deployment medical clearance and the facilities provided in Iraq by Frontier Medical.

755. DFID's Procurement Group agreed that the service should be made available to contractors on an exceptional basis, reflecting the particular conditions in Iraq, and should not set a precedent for other countries.[486]

756. Participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event commented on the range of security and welfare support offered by different departments before, during and after deployment.

757. Non-MOD participants who had served in Iraq between mid-2004 and mid-2007 reported that support in Iraq was poor. Staff were not briefed on what to expect psychologically and there was criticism of the fact that Deputy Heads of Mission were not trained as TRiM assessors or taught actively to look for stress warning signs in their staff. Non-MOD staff had to take the initiative to find support if they needed it. Participants also commented that there seemed to be no structured post-deployment follow-up, although there was some suggestion that the FCO support had improved by the first half of 2007.

758. Participants also commented on the serious damage caused to staff morale when senior staff without the right interpersonal skills were deployed to Iraq. FCO staff suggested that the "can do" approach of FCO senior management limited its ability to recognise when tasks might be impossible and to provide appropriate support to staff.

759. Dr Nemat Shafik, DFID Permanent Secretary from March 2008 to March 2011, told the Inquiry:

> "When we select people for these postings, we do look at … their personal qualities and their emotional resilience, and they do get pre-deployment training and a bit of psychological profiling, to see if they have the tenacity and resilience to be able to work in such tough environments.

"We also make sure to support them when they are there. So – particularly after security incidents, we make sure that our welfare people and our counselling services are available to them to deal with any concerns that they have, but it is providing emotional support."[487]

760. Civil servants deployed to Iraq were covered for death and injury by the provisions of the Civil Service Pension Scheme.[488]

761. In June 2003, Treasury Solicitors advised DFID that its duty of care in Iraq did not extend to "the provision of personal accident insurance against special risks arising out of postings or travel overseas or, for that matter, advising employees to obtain appropriate insurance cover".[489]

762. In October 2003, COBR commissioned an FCO-led review of training, security and insurance for UK civilians serving in Iraq to "ensure that there is consistency across all government departments seconding staff and consultants".[490]

763. On 11 November, Sir Michael Jay reported to Permanent Secretaries and the heads of other organisations with personnel serving in Iraq that the review had found "no material gaps or inconsistencies" between departments, except in the case of insurance, where there was a difference between arrangements for MOD civilians and other civil servants.[491]

764. Sir Michael enclosed a paper summarising the death and injury provisions of the Civil Service Pension Scheme and the advice on life insurance offered to secondees by the FCO, the MOD and DFID. The paper explained that the FCO advised secondees from the FCO and other government departments (excluding DFID and the MOD) to check whether their life insurance policies covered death in Iraq. If insurers required an extra premium to provide cover under an existing policy, the FCO would cover that cost for maximum life cover of four times the officer's salary. If insurers were unwilling to provide cover, the FCO recommended taking out a new policy, on which the Iraq Directorate could offer advice. As long as the policy had a term of at least 10 years, the FCO would cover the costs on the same terms as for those paying extra premiums for existing policies.

765. The paper stated that DFID offered its staff the same support.

766. The MOD provided additional cover. If an insurer rejected a claim on a secondee's life policy solely because the secondee was deployed to Iraq or travelling in an MOD aircraft, the MOD would pay the beneficiaries whatever sum they would otherwise have received from the insurer. The MOD would indemnify a secondee injured in Iraq on the same basis, but to a maximum of £50,000. Those indemnities were standard terms of MOD deployment to operational areas and not Iraq-specific.

767. The paper listed two discrepancies not mentioned in Sir Michael Jay's covering letter:

- DFID alone had encouraged staff to increase death benefit by making additional voluntary contributions to the Civil Service Pension Scheme.
- FCO and DFID contracts required contractors to take out personal accident and travel insurance before deployment. The full cost was reimbursed by the FCO and DFID up to a maximum death benefit of £300,000 (FCO) or £250,000 (DFID).

768. In May 2004, DFID reviewed insurance provisions for its staff working in or visiting dangerous locations.[492] The absence of adequate provision was said to be discouraging some existing staff from continuing to contribute to reconstruction in Iraq and Afghanistan. Financial incentives were not thought to be an issue.

769. The review stated:

> "Ministry of Defence research suggests that there is no significantly greater risk of death for service personnel embarking on operational deployment to dangerous locations compared to working in the UK. Our own discussions with the Government Actuary Department and the Office of National Statistics suggest that the probability of death or injury in Iraq or Afghanistan is too random to predict."

770. DFID officials believed that there was a limited and, arguably, small additional risk of death and injury. DFID staff were generally "less exposed to the same risks as service personnel in Iraq/Afghanistan". In line with its duty of care obligations, DFID had taken all reasonable steps to protect staff:

> "However, in the prevailing circumstances in Iraq and Afghanistan, it is understandable that staff have reviewed their insurance cover … And insurance companies have responded to the increased perception of a higher risk of death and injury … by substantially increasing premiums …"

[492] Minute MacDonald to PS/Suma Chakrabarti, 13 May 2004, 'Insurance for DFID Personnel Working [in] or Visiting Dangerous Locations, Particularly Iraq and Afghanistan'.

771. The arguments for DFID providing additional cover were:

- to respond to "a partly irrational, but understandable, fear amongst our staff": if DFID did not give them what they wanted, they would not go; and
- to allow for the difficulties and/or expense they faced in getting additional cover.

772. DFID officials discussed options with FCO and MOD counterparts and with the Treasury. Among the changes proposed was the introduction of the MOD policy of indemnifying secondees where an insurer rejected a claim. The FCO was reported to be considering the same options, but had put a decision on hold while it waited for the outcome of consideration by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board of a compensation payment for two employees killed in the bombing of the British Consulate General in Istanbul in 2003.

773. The Treasury approved the DFID proposals, but urged officials to continue discussions with the FCO and MOD "in the interests of joined-up government".

774. Revised DFID provisions, including indemnity cover to a maximum of £300,000, were incorporated into the DFID terms and conditions for long-term assignments in Iraq published in November 2004.[493]

775. Participants at the civilian outreach event described a striking and persistent diversity of security and welfare support provided by different departments.

776. On 22 December 2006, Mr Bill Jeffrey, MOD PUS, sent Sir Peter Ricketts and Mr Chakrabarti an MOD study on the deployment of civil servants in operational theatres.[494] The letter was also sent to Sir Gus O'Donnell, the Cabinet Secretary.

777. Mr Jeffrey reported that the study had looked in particular at co-ordination between different departments, their security advisers and providers. It had become apparent that:

> "… there were different practices in different locations, both within and between departments … but there must be scope for identifying and spreading best practice. For example, it may be useful for all to see the results of the risk assessment which the MOD has undertaken for each of the roles in which our civilian staff deploy."

778. The paper recommended sharing best practice and taking advantage of economies of scale on pre-deployment training.

[494] Letter Jeffrey to Ricketts, 22 December 2006, 'Deployment of Civil Servants in Operational Theatres' attaching Paper S2O, 30 November 2006, 'A Report on Safety & Security of MOD Civil Servants on Operations'.

779. Mr Jeffrey explained that the paper proposed "a formal standing cross-Government group" on security and reported that he had agreed to create a new Directorate of Operational Deployment Capability in PJHQ to provide a single focus within the MOD.

780. Mr Jeffrey visited Iraq with Sir Peter Ricketts and Ms Susan Wardell, DFID Director General Operations, from 4 to 7 December 2007.

781. Mr Jeffrey's briefing included a paper from Mr Jon Day, MOD Director General Operational Policy, about the use of MOD civilians in operational theatres.[495] Mr Day expressed concern about "whether we are right to continue the current course in high risk environments such as Iraq and (increasingly) Afghanistan". Concerns about security had led the FCO to spend £37 million per annum on close protection for their "relatively small number" of staff in Iraq. The security threat had also:

> "… introduced a risk averse culture which is preventing MOD civilians embedded in the Embassy and working in the Iraqi MOD from doing their jobs effectively – to such an extent that I am increasingly inclined to start pulling them out.
> "… [T]he growing difficulty we are having in filling posts suggests that some – many – will not be as suitable as we would wish. I am not at all sure that all of the civilians I met in Iraq would pass the new S2O fitness and health tests …"

782. Mr Jeffrey described much of what was being done by MOD civilians in Iraq as "a legacy of the more benign environments of the Balkans and post-TELIC 1 euphoria". Nobody appeared to be auditing the roles filled by civilians against the much more hostile conditions that had prevailed until recently in Iraq. Mr Jeffrey cited the example of civilian finance staff, whose roles could be taken by appropriately trained service personnel. The MOD should minimise the number of non-essential civilian posts in operational theatres. A small number of posts would have to be filled by civilians – POLADs and perhaps scientific and contracts staff – but the right people would not volunteer "simply for the money". The MOD should "listen to what the current generation say will continue to motivate them".

783. Mr Jeffrey advised discussing a coherent and sustainable approach to duty of care with the FCO, observing that "at present we are less risk aware than the FCO in Iraq but more risk aware in Afghanistan!".

784. Mr Benn told the Inquiry:

> "… you need to have a common approach for everybody, not a difference between departments and that includes a responsibility of the duty of care you have for consultants and contractors whom you have asked to come and work".[496]

[496] Public hearing, 2 February 2010, pages 43-44.

785. The Inquiry received conflicting evidence about whether those differences had been resolved.

786. Dr Shafik told the Inquiry:

> "Peter Ricketts, the Permanent Secretary of the Foreign Office, and Bill Jeffrey, the Permanent Secretary at the Ministry of Defence, and I, had a series of conversations about this over 2008 and we worked very hard to see whether we could develop a common duty of care regime for all civilians, and the security teams, particularly in the MoD and the FCO, worked very hard on this, and I'm sure they could give you more detail, but in the end of that process, we realised that our civilians are doing such different things that it didn't make sense to have identical regimes."[497]

787. Mr Bowen told the Inquiry:

> "Duty of care was a problem, but it was a problem actually that was gripped, or we tried to grip it at a very senior level. Permanent secretaries were engaged in this, and tried to resolve issues."[498]

788. Sir Suma Chakrabarti identified two key lessons about duty of care:

> "One is about unifying tour lengths, and the other is about trying to unify terms and conditions around staff security and duty of care. The latter has happened. So FCO and DFID have the same standards."[499]

789. Sir Gus O'Donnell told the Inquiry that, after a trip to Helmand Province in Afghanistan with the FCO and MOD PUSs, he said to one of them: "One of the issues we really need to sort out here is terms and conditions for people sent abroad and duty of care issues."[500] Sir Gus concluded that terms and conditions were "not completely harmonised". The process was "not finished yet, but I think it has made a lot of progress".

790. In additional evidence to the Inquiry, Sir Gus O'Donnell stated:

> "The FCO and MOD use different systems of risk assessment and management, reflecting the different roles, purposes, and levels of training for their personnel when deployed to high threat environments (DFID follow FCO arrangements). In all locations, security arrangements for military and civilian personnel are determined according to the threats present, and assessed on a case by case basis. There is no "standard" or "standards" of duty of care as the practical discharge of duty of care is case and context specific.

"The Building Stability Overseas (BSO) Board, made up of MOD, DFID and FCO Directors (including the previous Stabilisation Unit Board) oversees ongoing discussions between departments on duty of care, seeking to provide the best possible security arrangements for delivering coherent HMG effect and exploring opportunities for greater flexibility where circumstances allow …

"However there do remain key differences between the FCO and MOD practices. In Afghanistan, FCO civilians use close protection bodyguards, while MOD civilians rely on military protection. Pay and allowances, duration of postings, R&R arrangements as well as compensation and insurance arrangements vary across all departments, often reflecting differing roles of personnel. As noted earlier, in all locations, security arrangements are determined according to the threats present, and assessed on a case by case basis."[501]

The Iraq Reconstruction Service Medal

791. In May 2004, Mr David Blunkett, the Home Secretary, wrote to Mr Straw as Chair of the AHMGIR to propose that UK police officers and other civilians seconded to Iraq should be eligible for the Iraq campaign medal or a civilian equivalent.[502] Home Office officials had advised the police that UK police officers seconded to Iraq might be eligible for the Iraq Campaign Medal, but had since been advised by the Cabinet Office Ceremonial Secretariat that it was a military medal for which police officers were not eligible. Mr Blunkett suggested that would have been a reasonable position were the campaign medal awarded solely to members of the Armed Forces, but civilians serving directly with the Armed Forces in support of Op TELIC were also eligible. It was "abundantly clear that our civilians in Iraq run risks to their own lives often comparable to those faced by the military, and certainly probably [sic] greater than in civilian deployments almost anywhere in the world".

792. Mr Blunkett warned that the repercussions for the police, who had been given to understand that they were eligible, "could be very serious". He recommended that the eligibility criteria be changed or a new medal created.

793. Mr Straw commended Mr Blunkett's letter to Mr Douglas Alexander, Minister for the Cabinet Office, and sent it to Mr Blair. Mr Straw stated: "I believe that the recognition of all personnel serving directly in support of government policy in Iraq, whether serving in Jordan or Iraq, should be appropriately rewarded."[503]

794. Sir Andrew Turnbull put three options to Mr Blair:

- extending the Iraq campaign medal to include other civilians, which was not supported by the military;

- a new medal to recognise civilian service in Iraq, which would create pressure for a series of other medals, including for past campaigns; and
- use of the Humanitarian Service Medal, approved in principle by the Queen in 1999, which could provide appropriate means for rewarding civilian service in Iraq and have longer-term application.[504]

795. Mr Benn supported the idea of a separate civilian medal.[505] He also requested either greater flexibility in the allocation of honours to DFID, which, he said, only received a small number, or an additional special list for Iraq.

796. Mr Hoon told Mr Blair that he had "no difficulty with marking the contribution made by civilians abroad", but could not support use of the military campaign medal.[506] He recommended an urgent review by the Cabinet Office Honours and Decorations Committee of ways to provide wider recognition of civilian service "appropriate to the fast moving situations in which we are increasingly likely to find ourselves".

797. Mr Blair asked the FCO to seek approval from the Queen for a special civilian medal for Iraq and endorsed Mr Hoon's separate proposal for a wider review.[507]

798. Mr Blair announced the Queen's approval of the new medal in Parliament on 30 June:

> "We should pay tribute … to the many British public servants, policemen and women and volunteers, so ably led by David Richmond, the UK Special Representative, who played a crucial role in helping the Iraqi people to rebuild their lives under difficult and stressful conditions. Her Majesty the Queen has graciously agreed that their extraordinary contribution should be recognised with the award of a special civilian medal."[508]

799. FCO officials explained to Sir Michael Jay in July 2004 that eligibility criteria, periods of qualifying service and details of the medal design were still to be worked out.[509] Late October 2004 was suggested as a possible date for a further public announcement, because of the "not inconsiderable work required to produce the Civilian Iraq Medal from scratch".

800. The first set of eligibility criteria proposed by the FCO Iraq Directorate in January 2005 excluded locally engaged staff and sub-contractors not directly employed by the UK Government.[510]

801. Sub-contractors, who included guards employed by Control Risks Group and ArmorGroup, were excluded on the grounds that the numbers involved would "very significantly increase production costs" and "risk devaluing the medal". The Iraq Directorate also observed that most sub-contractors "already receive considerable financial reward for their efforts".

802. The proposal also excluded UK police officers employed at the Jordan International Police Training Centre. While recognising that the police officers who set up the centre had volunteered for service in Iraq, were expecting to be deployed there, and worked, initially, in physically difficult conditions, the Iraq Directorate advised that service in Iraq had carried an entirely different level of risk.

803. A revised proposal, including sub-contractors, was put to Mr Straw in February.[511] Officials advised that:

> "Although these guards are well paid for their work, we believe that the risks that they undertake merit their inclusion. They are an essential part of our operation. Posts argue strongly that to exclude them would damage morale and create divisions."

804. Mr Straw was "generally content" with the proposal, but asked whether a "blanket exception" for LE staff was fair.[512]

805. The paper prepared by the FCO for the Cabinet Office in July 2005 included sub-contractors, but not LE staff.[513]

806. The FCO paper listed the "risks and rigours" facing civilians who had served in Iraq since 2003:

> "RISKS
> - Overall a high risk to personnel both on and off duty.
> - High risk of rocket and mortar attack on all civilians, both in office and staff accommodation.
> - High risk of attack by IED (improvised explosive devices), VBIED (vehicle borne improvised explosive devices) and suicide car bombers, when travelling in official transport on the ground.
> - High risk of attack by individual suicide vest bombers.
> - High risk of attack from surface to air weapons when travelling in either RAF or Army helicopter flights.
> - High risk of kidnapping.

- High risk of injury/fatality from becoming involved in civil disturbances or violent attacks, including muggings.
- High risk of contraction of endemic diseases. Extensive range of inoculations required. Malaria prophylaxis required in many areas (mosquitoes present throughout Iraq).

RIGOUR

- Basic infrastructure lacking, damaged or in disrepair.
- Personnel required constantly to live and work in an extremely hostile and dangerous environment.
- Constant requirement to carry or wear heavy, restrictive and uncomfortable body armour and helmet.
- Personnel required to work and live in hardship conditions, (until recently in Basra, but still in Baghdad: shared accommodation and communal washing/ toilet facilities) in unsocial circumstances, with very limited amenities and near non-existent social facilities.
- Severe restrictions on movement. All movements outside secure area are in armoured vehicles with armed Close Protection Teams.
- Hostile climate, with high temperatures sometimes in excess of 50 degrees Celsius in the summer. Frequent sandstorms, which further impede movement of personnel."

807. The FCO estimated that the number eligible, which was likely to increase as new personnel were deployed, was approximately:

- 550 civilian public servants;
- 60 contractors not involved in the provision of security, mostly employed by the FCO and DFID;
- 850 security-related contractors; and
- 80 police officers.

808. The Ceremonial Secretariat of the Cabinet Office and the MOD raised questions about the absence of any reference to NGOs and aid or charity workers.[514]

809. In December 2005, FCO officials advised Ministers that the award, now referred to as the Iraq Reconstruction Service Medal (IRSM), should not be given to aid workers and NGO personnel on the grounds that it could compromise their independence and have a negative impact on their security. NGOs and aid organisations working in Baghdad would be encouraged to consider nominating individuals for the six-monthly honours lists.

---

[514] Minute Iraq Directorate [junior official] to PS [FCO], 15 December 2005, 'Iraq Reconstruction Service Medal (IRSM)'.

810. Officials also recommended that LE staff employed at the British Embassy Baghdad and British Embassy Offices Basra and Kirkuk since May 2003 should receive a certificate commending each individual's contribution to the reconstruction of Iraq.

811. Mr Benn recommended that, before Ministers took a final decision, the main NGOs should be contacted to confirm that they did not want their personnel to receive the award.[515] That consultation process, which was carried out by DFID and took several months, reaffirmed the FCO's advice that individuals working for NGOs should not be eligible.

812. Dr Howells approved the FCO's eligibility criteria for the IRSM on 19 May 2006.[516]

813. In April 2006, with the details of the medal still not agreed, Acting ACC Barton, Chief Police Adviser – Iraq (CPA-I), reported that awards to UK police officers serving in Iraq remained a "bone of contention".[517] Several staff had commented that police officers and FCO staff did not receive the Op TELIC campaign medal. ACC Barton proposed to award every member of staff who served three months in Iraq a Contingent Commander's Certificate of Merit. Commendations would be reserved for outstanding commitment or acts beyond the call of duty. Serving officers would also receive a letter to their Chief Constable. Retired officers would be sent a testimonial letter.

814. The Cabinet Office submitted the July 2005 FCO paper to the Committee on the Grant of Honours, Decorations and Medals in August 2006, after the negotiation of a number of amendments.[518]

815. The Secretary to the Committee explained in a covering note that:

> "No civilian medal has ever been awarded for civilian service in a war zone. It is therefore important that this case is considered carefully. It is essential that members of the military who have been awarded the military medal should not feel that they are disadvantaged by the application of less rigorous standards to a parallel medal for civilians and members of the military in non-operational roles.
>
> "The situation in Iraq has been unprecedented in terms of the number of civilians who have been involved in reconstruction and the transition to democracy …
> "These civilians have volunteered for this work. The work has been generally well-rewarded financially. A concern of the MOD is the fact that the military have been haemorrhaging personnel who leave the forces to become highly paid security contractors in Iraq. There is some discomfort over the prospect of these people becoming eligible for a medal on the same basis as their former colleagues."

816. The IRSM was introduced in January 2007.[519] It was decommissioned in 2013.[520]

817. The FCO told the Inquiry that "around 4,100" medals were awarded.[521]

818. A small number of recipients criticised the administration of the medal.

819. In June 2008, Sir Peter Ricketts received an email from a recipient of the IRSM, who believed that the medal's value as a good way of honouring those who served in Iraq had been "somewhat diminished by the manner in which it is administered".[522] The individual recognised that work was in hand in the FCO to improve administration of the medal, but criticised the fact that individuals had to fill out an application form, received the medal in a Jiffy bag, and that there was no presentation ceremony.

820. Sir Peter commented to the IOU: "I don't want any medals sent in Jiffy bags unless staff specifically ask for that."[523]

821. In his reply to the original email, Sir Peter explained that the application form provided the FCO with important documentation for auditing purposes.[524] Presentation of the medal was complicated by the need to balance the wishes of those who wanted to receive theirs quickly, without great ceremony, and those preferring to wait for a more formal ceremony, at post or in London. Dr Howells and Sir Peter had hosted a reception for London-based recipients of the first batch of medals in 2007. A second reception was planned for later in 2008.

822. There were some critical comments about the medal from participants at the Inquiry's civilian outreach event, including that it had been sent in a rolled up brown envelope, addressed to "Dear Colleague" and not even signed by the Permanent Secretary. One participant had refused to accept a medal on the grounds that the qualification was simply to have been in Iraq for a minimum period.

Locally engaged staff

823. UK government departments and the UK military employed Iraqi citizens in various capacities from 2003 onwards, including as supervisors of reconstruction projects, interpreters and office staff.

824. As security deteriorated and the mobility of UK personnel became increasingly constrained, locally engaged (LE) staff and contractors became critically important to the UK reconstruction effort.

825. Concern about the safety of LE staff emerged in September 2003.[525]

826. On 18 September, during a visit to Baghdad, Mr Benn was told by UK secondees to the CPA that "there was increased nervousness amongst Iraqi staff about doing their jobs. Daily lives were difficult and the UN bombing [on 19 August 2003] had increased these tensions."[526]

827. Mr Dinham told the Inquiry that, during 2006 and 2007, access to a number of infrastructure projects was so difficult that "we had to arrange to work through local contractors … taking videos, taking digital images, contacting us by email, meeting them in safe locations so we could actually supervise at one remove".[527]

828. Sir Suma Chakrabarti paid tribute to the bravery of local staff:

> "Some quite innovative project management techniques had to be applied when staff could not get out of the Consul General's office to go and monitor progress on some of the infrastructure programmes. I have to say something about the courage of our Iraqi staff, actually, in helping with a lot of that until they also faced threats as well and then we had to stop employing them."[528]

829. On 20 April 2006, Mr Robin Lamb, British Consul General in Basra, reported that law and order in Basra had deteriorated over the preceding few weeks and that:

> "Most of our critical local staff (ie those who interpret or conduct external business for us) now consider it too dangerous to come into work …
> "We are taking steps to manage LE staff's perceptions. We judge that the risk to them is probably lower than they believe, and we have designed ways of working to lower their exposure (flexible patterns, shifts, rotations). But it is hard to argue with the facts on the ground. Murders have spiked in the last three weeks and there is evidence that interpreters associated with MND(SE) and the wider Coalition have been targeted.

staff … Key local government politicians and officials are more willing to engage with DFID than with the UK military and FCO."[529]

830. On 25 April, DFID officials advised Mr Benn that two LE staff working for the UK at the Basra Palace site had left Iraq in fear of their lives after being followed home from work.[530] The incident had caused concern among other LE staff, who had been given the remainder of the week off. All local staff continued to have "standing permission not to come to work if they felt unsafe". The situation was to be reviewed once it was clearer how many local staff considered it safe to return to work and it was possible to assess the impact on the DFID programme.

831. Mr Benn commented: "The right approach – our local staff have shown a lot of courage and deserve all our support."[531]

832. On 18 June, an LE member of staff at the British Embassy Office Basra was murdered. His wife, also a local member of staff, was seriously injured.[532]

833. On 29 June, local staff working for the British Embassy Office Basra were advised that they could take the available severance package if they no longer felt safe working there.[533] They were told there might come a point when their employment would have to be terminated because of the risk to their safety, but the Embassy Office judged that point had not yet been reached.

834. During the second half of 2006, FCO and DFID officials exchanged views on departments' duty of care to LE staff.

835. Ms Diana Brookes, FCO Legal Counsellor, advised FCO officials:

"The important point is that even if they [LE staff] have accepted the risks involved this does not absolve the FCO from liability in terms of duty of care in an individual case. If the view is taken that the risk is so great that LE staff should not continue working at this time then I do not see how we could be meeting our duty of care to them by allowing them to turn down the voluntary severance package. If the risk is that high then the severance package should be made compulsory for all LE staff, otherwise we risk the possibility of liability for breach of our duty of care if a further incident were to happen."[534]

836. Ms Liz Davis, DFID Human Resources Director, advised DFID officials:

> "It is our responsibility to ensure the health, safety and welfare of our staff. A failure to do so is a breach of our responsibilities in law and potentially a failure of our common law duty if we act negligently. This framework is not the same for the military. The test at law will be:
> - have we assessed the risks,
> - controlled those risks as far as possible,
> - trained staff where appropriate,
> - and monitored the issues."[535]

837. Those responsibilities would normally be confined to "working time", an approach Ms Davis did not believe to be reasonable in Iraq. Ms Davis advised that, as an employer, DFID could not be held responsible for the overall security situation, but that the picture was clouded by the wider role of the UK Government.

838. A table prepared by the British Council in July itemised some of the differences between the packages offered by the FCO and DFID (and the British Council), including grievance procedures, "security leave" and entitlement to termination benefits.[536]

839. By October 2006, all but one of the Iraqi civilian staff working at the Basra Palace site had been replaced by third country nationals because of "a growing campaign of intimidation at the hands of extremists."[537]

The Locally Engaged Staff Assistance Scheme

840. In August 2007, faced with a further deterioration in security and growing press interest in LE staff,[539] officials sought to establish "a coherent cross-Whitehall approach" to LE staff.[540]

841. Mr Giles Lever, Head of the IPU, advised Mr Miliband that officials in the FCO, MOD, DFID, Home Office and Cabinet Office had found it difficult to agree a common approach:

- The FCO saw a strong moral, reputational and operational case for doing more to assist Iraqi staff facing security threats and those who had been forced to leave UK government employment due to security. The FCO had around 27 LE staff in Baghdad and estimated no more than 100 current and former staff in Basra would be eligible.
- DFID, with a very small number of LE staff, broadly shared the FCO view.
- The MOD had directly employed around 15,000 Iraqi citizens since 2003, and tens of thousands more through international or local contractors. It was "nervous about the resource implications for any commitment to do more for Iraqi staff". The MOD was also concerned that any promise of assistance to LE staff (for example, asylum in the UK) would be "a catalyst for an exodus of staff" and "would undermine MND (SE)'s ability to operate effectively".
- The Home Office was "predictably unwilling to contemplate any relaxation of the asylum/immigration rules for Iraqis who have worked for HMG, especially in view of MOD's numbers". It was also concerned that any change in policy "could act as a pull factor for a large number of Iraqis".[541]

842. On 7 August, the Cabinet Office advised Mr Brown that the numbers involved were large, policy differed between the FCO/DFID and the MOD, and "our current immigration/asylum policies mean that there are few straightforward options".[542] The two principal alternatives were resettlement and financial assistance.

843. Three options were put forward for reducing the number of eligible staff to more manageable levels:

- Distinguishing between LE staff directly employed by the UK and those hired on a casual basis or via contractor. More than 15,000 Iraqi citizens would still be eligible, but a large number hired through international or local contractors would be excluded.
- Establishing a minimum level of service of perhaps 12 or 24 months. Depending on the timeframe, about 330 or 230 Iraqi citizens would be eligible.
- Prioritising interpreters and other white collar staff on the grounds that professional staff were mission critical and more closely identifiable with the UK. Questions of fairness could arise. Around 120 (12-month minimum service) or 100 (24-month minimum service) were estimated to be eligible.

844. Mr Brown asked the Cabinet Office to co-ordinate a Whitehall-wide review, reporting to the Defence, Foreign and Home Secretaries.[543] The review should establish a minimum threshold for assistance and consider whether more could be offered to a subset of Iraqi employees, against clear criteria and with possible resettlement in third countries. It should also consider the implications for UK operations in Iraq and elsewhere, and for UK asylum policy.

845. The 'Review of Locally Engaged Staff', written by the FCO with input from other departments, was sent to Ministers on 1 October.[544] The review recommended the establishment of "discrete schemes to assist sub-sets of a) serving and b) former Iraqi LE staff". Objective criteria, such as the length of service should be the main method for deciding which staff should be eligible.

846. The review stated:

> "Because records of former staff, in particular the estimated 20,000 employed by MOD, are incomplete, it is extremely difficult to assess with any certainty the numbers of former staff who might be … eligible …"

847. Ministers agreed on 3 October that "the best solution was to offer assistance as an ex-gratia package, not as a reward for service, but with the implicit recognition that the uniquely difficult circumstances formed part of the justification for that package".[545]

848. Ministers also agreed to set a minimum of 12 months' service for serving staff and that for former staff, only the "professional cadres" would be eligible. The package would include financial assistance, resettlement in third countries and resettlement via the Gateway Protection Programme.[546] On funding, the Home Office would offer £6 million from the annual Gateway budget. Additional costs should be met where possible by employing departments. In the MOD's case that would entail a call on the Reserve.

849. Ministers met again on 8 October to reach agreement on whether existing staff should be offered the additional option of Exceptional Leave to Enter the UK direct from Iraq and, if so, how that would be funded.[547] Ministers agreed that the MOD should be able to claim up to £20 million from the Reserve and would provide up to a further £5 million from its existing budgets.

850. Mr Brown announced the scheme to Parliament later on 8 October:

> "I would … like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the work of our civilian and locally employed staff in Iraq, many of whom have worked in extremely difficult circumstances, exposing themselves and their families to danger. I am pleased therefore to announce today a new policy which more fully recognises the > contribution made by our local Iraqi staff, who work for our armed forces and civilian missions in what we know are uniquely difficult circumstances. Existing staff who have been employed by us for more than 12 months and have completed their work will be able to apply for a package of financial payments to aid resettlement in Iraq or elsewhere in the region, or – in agreed circumstances – for admission to the UK. Professional staff, including interpreters and translators, with a similar length of service who have left our employ since the beginning of 2005 will also be able to apply for assistance."[548]

851. Mr Miliband gave a fuller explanation in a Parliamentary Written Statement the next day.[549]

852. Neither the MOD nor the FCO was able to provide precise figures for the number of Iraqi citizens employed since 2003 and likely to be eligible under the scheme.[550]

853. At a Ministerial meeting to discuss LE staff on 18 September, Lord Drayson, Minister of State for Defence Equipment and Support, conceded that the MOD "had not done a good job on record keeping". In discussion, Ministers commented that further work on the issue was "unlikely to deliver much more clarity given the nature of the records".[551]

854. On 30 October, Mr Miliband gave more detail on eligibility, the package on offer and application procedures:

> "Both fairness and realism demand that we focus on that sub-set of staff who have had the closest and most sustained association with us, in circumstances which we judge to be uniquely difficult. We have therefore established clear and transparent eligibility criteria which are, as far as possible, objective in nature.
> "… We need to preserve our ability to recruit and retain qualified staff … Both the overall policy, and the design of the scheme in respect of serving staff have been designed with this in mind.
> "Finally, we have taken into account the need to ensure that any assistance … is practical, realistic and preserves the integrity of wider immigration and asylum policy …
> "The assistance … is offered ex-gratia and goes above and beyond the confines of what is lawfully or contractually required."[552]

855. On 19 December, Mr Tinline reported that implementation of the scheme was starting to work. All precedent-setting cases were referred to MND(SE) and London.

Many applications were “obviously inadmissible”, but a surprising number raised difficult questions. A number of principles had informed decisions:

- Individuals on Letters of Appointment who did not fulfil the ‘‘Eligibility criteria for former staff’’ were not eligible.
- Those still on the payroll on 8 August 2007 but not currently working because of threats should be counted as current staff.
- Those meeting the job criteria for only a brief period, such as providers of “occasional interpreting”, were not eligible, however long they had worked for the UK.

856. The first 18 “current staff” arrived in the UK from Basra on 8 April 2008.[553] By 22 May, the UK had received 1,138 applications for assistance, of which 503 had been assessed as eligible, with almost half the successful applicants opting for the financial package.

857. In March 2009, Mr Miliband informed Ms Jacqui Smith, the Home Secretary, that an assessment of the Locally Engaged Staff Assistance Scheme by Home Office, FCO, MOD, DFID and Cabinet Office officials had concluded that it was “working well” and only “minor adjustments” were needed.[554] Mr Miliband explained that he had agreed a recommendation to set a cut-off date after which new applications from “former” staff would not be accepted. He sought Ms Smith’s agreement to continue the scheme for serving staff, with a review of its future in September 2009.

858. On 23 March, Mr Miliband announced to Parliament that the scheme was “popular and effective” and would remain unchanged, but new applications from “former” staff (those who had left their jobs before 7 August 2007) would not be accepted after 19 May.

859. The scheme was closed to all applicants on 16 January 2011.[555]

860. The total number of individuals who have taken up the option to be resettled in the UK under the Locally Engaged Staff Assistance Scheme is 1,389 (see Table 2).[556]

UK civilian deployments to Iraq: statistics

861. The Inquiry asked government departments to provide quarterly data on the numbers, roles and location, of civilian staff and contractors deployed to Iraq between 2003 and 2009.[557]

862. In the case of the FCO, the request included information on secondees from other government departments for whom the FCO had duty of care responsibilities.

863. None of the three principal departments responsible for the deployment of civilians (the FCO, the MOD and DFID) was able to provide data in the form requested.

864. FCO data were drawn principally from the department's human resources (HR) database, Prism. An initial return covering the period from March 2003 to June 2009 was submitted to the Inquiry in 2011.[558] In 2013, the FCO updated the figures for March 2004 to June 2009.[559]

865. The Prism figures indicate the number of FCO staff deployed to bilateral FCO missions in Iraq, but do not include FCO contractors, staff from other government departments for whom the FCO was responsible, or FCO staff seconded to ORHA or the CPA.

866. The FCO supplemented the Prism material with miscellaneous data from other sources, including telephone lists and policy documents, which provided occasional snapshots of overall numbers of civilians deployed by the FCO and other departments, excluding support for Op TELIC.

867. Sir Simon Fraser, the FCO PUS from 2010 to 2015, told the Inquiry that the FCO had learned lessons from the experience of Iraq and that "the current recording system in FCO is both more robust, more complete and more accurate than was previously the case".[560]

868. The MOD provided average quarterly figures for three groups of civilians deployed in support of Op TELIC: MOD staff; staff from other government departments; and contractors.[561]

869. The figures for 2003 to 2006 are drawn from returns compiled by individual military units and based on physical counts of civilians present. The returns were collated by PJHQ.

870. In 2006, the requirement to produce a combined total for the three groups of civilians lapsed, resulting in large gaps in the record for the later period. Figures for 2006 onwards were compiled for the Inquiry by the MOD from units' individual returns.

871. Mr Jon Thompson, the MOD PUS from 2012 to 2016, told the Inquiry:

> "… I do not see any prospect of our being able to provide you with figures which we can guarantee to be comprehensive. I am at least assured that systems now in place would enable us to provide the current data for Afghanistan without difficulty."[562]

872. The information provided by DFID was compiled from a number of sources, including duty of care sheets, contractors' records and medical spreadsheets.[563]

873. Mr Mark Lowcock, the DFID Permanent Secretary since 2011, explained that "achieving 100 per cent accuracy in this data would require a disproportionate amount of staff time (if it was possible at all)", but expressed confidence that "the trends present in the data are reliable".[564]

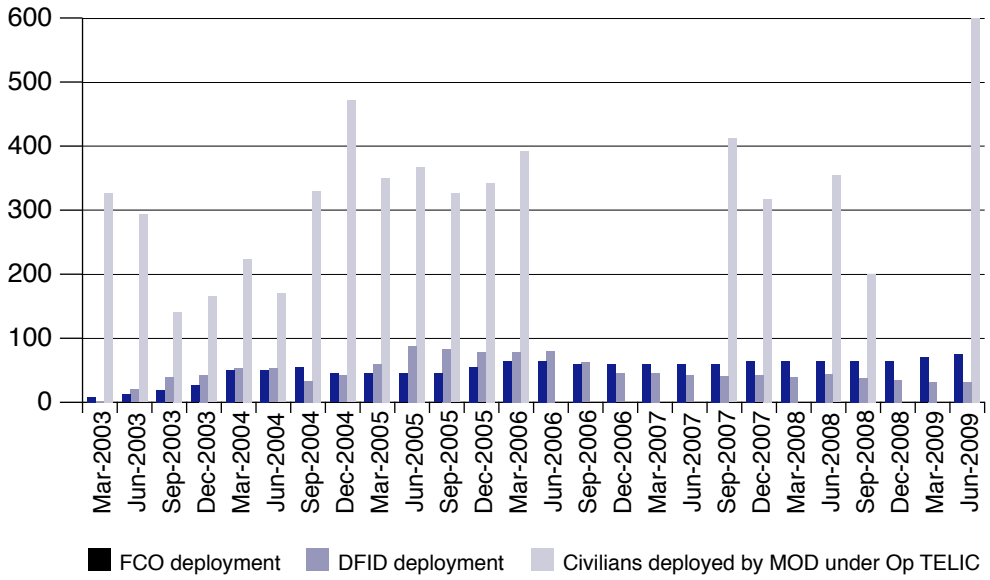
874. The Inquiry has produced a set of graphs and tables, drawing mostly on the data submitted by the FCO, the MOD and DFID, that gives a broad indication of overall numbers and trends.

875. Because of the limitations of the source material and the variety of sources used, the numbers quoted are approximate and, in some cases, are inconsistent with each other and cannot be reconciled.

876. Unless stated otherwise, all statistics in this Section exclude UK police officers deployed to Iraq in support of the SSR programme. The deployment of police officers is addressed in more detail in Section 12.1.

877. Figure 1 shows FCO,[565] MOD[566] and DFID[567] civilian deployments to Iraq between March 2003 and June 2009.

878. The underlying data, reproduced in Table 7 at the end of this Section, show that between March 2003 and June 2009:



- The MOD deployed an average[568] of 320 civilians to Iraq in support of Op TELIC at any one time.

[568] All averages quoted in this Section are arithmetic means.

- The FCO and DFID deployed a combined average of 100 civilians (including DFID contractors, but excluding police, security contractors and officials from other government departments) for post-conflict reconstruction and the UK's bilateral representation in Iraq.
- There were two peaks in DFID's contribution to reconstruction:
  - 53 personnel from March to June 2004, towards the end of the CPA period; and
  - 88 personnel in June 2005.
- The number of DFID personnel fell significantly in the face of deteriorating security in late 2006.
- The number of FCO staff deployed to Iraq reached 50 towards the end of the CPA period and climbed to 75 in mid-2009.

The UK civilian deployment during the CPA period, May 2003 to June 2004

881. During the CPA period[573] the UK deployed:

- an average of 220 civilians in support of Op TELIC on any given day;
- 61 civilians to the CPA in May 2003, rising to 260 in April 2004;
- two police officers in support of the UK's SSR programme in Iraq in July 2003, rising to 37 in March 2004; and
- between four and eight staff to the British Office Baghdad.[574]

882. Table 4 shows the number and location of UK civilian secondments to the CPA between May 2003 and April 2004. In the absence of continuous data covering the whole period, the figures have been taken from four summaries prepared for senior officials and Ministers between May 2003 and April 2004.

[573] The available data do not match precisely the dates of the CPA. Some earlier figures describe deployments to ORHA, before its absorption into the CPA.
[574] All figures in this list exclude security contractors.

883. Secondments to the CPA appear to have peaked in April 2004, with approximately 260 UK civilians working for the organisation across Iraq.[575]

884. The British Office Baghdad opened on 5 May 2003.[581] Originally staffed by a team of four, by late summer 2003 it had eight UK-based staff.

885. Information on the location of personnel outside Baghdad and Basra during the CPA period is sparse.

886. A contact list for UK personnel present in Iraq on 30 December 2003 listed 51 people (civilian and military) deployed to the CPA Governorate Teams (GTs) across Iraq:

- Basra 22 (including a UK military close protection team);[582]
- Dhi Qar 4;
- Wasit 6;
- Ta'Mim (Kirkuk) 7;
- Maysan 10 (including a UK military close protection team);
- Muthanna 1; and
- Erbil 1.[583]

888. Most of the 23 were from the MOD (a mix of civilian and military personnel), DFID and the FCO. The Governorate Co-ordinator for Dhi Qar was from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA).

889. There is no continuous set of data for the number of civilians deployed during the CPA period by UK government departments and organisations other than the FCO, the MOD and DFID.

890. A snapshot produced for the AHMGIR on 22 May 2003 listed 13 organisations other than the FCO, MOD and DFID with staff seconded to ORHA, and 11 "miscellaneous" secondees:

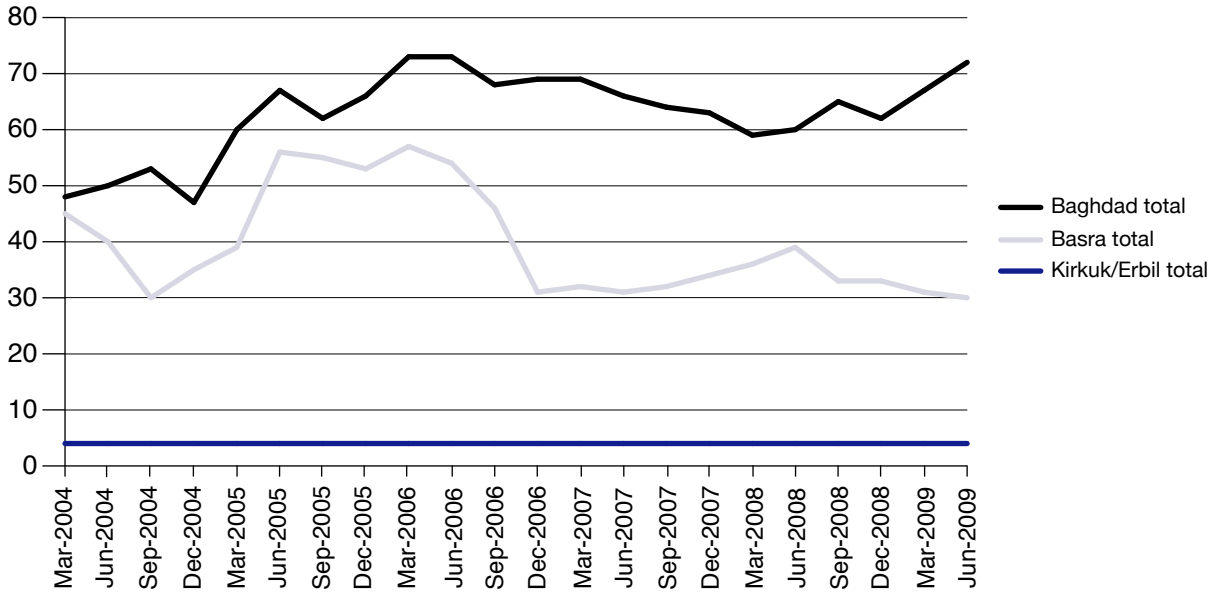
The post-CPA UK civilian deployment, July 2004 to July 2009

891. On 28 June 2004, the CPA handed over to a sovereign Iraqi government (see Section 9.3).

892. During the post-CPA period the UK deployed:

- an average of 372 civilians in support of Op TELIC on any given day;
- an average of 112 civilians to the UK's bilateral missions in Iraq, including the DFID offices in Baghdad and Basra, on any given day;
- 43 police officers in support of the UK's SSR programme in September 2004, falling to 13 in March 2008; and
- eight civilians to the Basra PRT from mid-2006.[586]

893. The UK civilian presence in Baghdad, previously split between the CPA and the British Office Baghdad, was consolidated in the new British Embassy Baghdad.



894. In Basra, UK civilians were deployed to the British Embassy Office and additionally, from April 2006, the UK-led Basra PRT.

895. A second, smaller, British Embassy Office was opened in Kirkuk, alongside the US Regional Embassy Office (REO).[587] In January 2007, the British Embassy Office Kirkuk was moved to Erbil after the US REO transferred to Kirkuk Regional Air Base.

896. Figure 2 shows the distribution of UK civilian personnel (including DFID contractors, but not civilians deployed on Op TELIC, police or security contractors) between Baghdad, Basra and Kirkuk/Erbil during the post-CPA period. The underlying data are reproduced in Table 8 at the end of this Section.

[586] All figures in this list exclude security contractors.

897. Figure 3 shows the relative contributions of the FCO and DFID in Baghdad and Basra:

- FCO personnel were concentrated in Baghdad (an average of 43, against 10 in Basra).
- FCO numbers in Baghdad doubled between March 2005 and June 2009, with no change in Basra.
- DFID deployed more personnel in Basra than Baghdad (an average of 30 in Basra against 20 in Baghdad).
- DFID numbers in Baghdad and Basra fell steadily from mid-2005, with an especially marked dip in Basra when security deteriorated in 2006.

898. The underlying data are reproduced in Table 8 at the end of this Section.

[588] The Inquiry has inserted a figure of four for Kirkuk/Erbil throughout the period and assumed no increase in staffing during the move from Kirkuk to Erbil in January 2007. The FCO source material refers to “five or less” and double counts for Kirkuk and Erbil between December 2007 and June 2008, long after Kirkuk had closed.

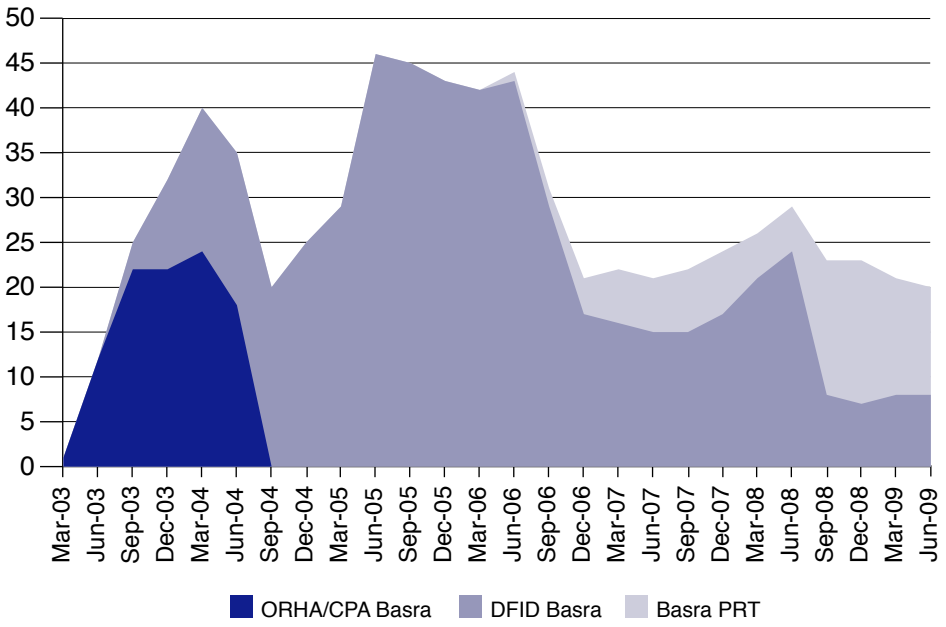
899. There is no continuous set of data for civilians deployed by other departments or organisations during the post-CPA period.

900. In November 2004, Mr Straw sent details of all staff present at the British Embassy Baghdad and the British Embassy Offices Basra and Kirkuk on 24 October 2004 to the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee.[589]

901. The list of staff, reproduced in full below, includes those deployed by the FCO, the MOD, DFID and other government departments and organisations. It is the most comprehensive record seen by the Inquiry of post-CPA civilian staff numbers.[590]



[589] Select Committee on Foreign Affairs Minutes of Evidence, 24 March 2005, Letter to the Chairman of the Committee from the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, 2 November 2004.
[590] The staff list records officials visiting the Embassy and the Embassy Offices on a single day in October 2004. It does not include those on leave.

Total staff	3	(plus one visiting)

902. Figure 4 shows the number of DFID staff and contractors deployed to Basra between 2003 and 2009.

903. The underlying data, reproduced in Table 9 at the end of this Section, show that, between June and December 2006, DFID deployments to Basra more than halved, from 44 to 21.[591] The number of personnel recovered to 29 in June 2008, but never returned to the level seen between June 2005 and June 2006, or during the earlier CPA period.

UK share of the Coalition civilian deployment

904. Data on civilian personnel compiled by the US Government during the CPA period shared many of the flaws of UK data for the same period. An audit of CPA personnel management by the Office of the CPA Inspector General in June 2004 found that:

> "… by the end of January 2004, many distinct personnel tracking mechanisms appeared that were intended to provide accountability for select groups of individuals. In addition, contractors were tracking their own employees. As of March 8, 2004, the CPA believed it had a total of 1,196 personnel assigned to CPA operations in Baghdad. The CPA had been authorized 2,117 positions. The 1,196 included all military and civilian personnel assigned to CPA operations in Baghdad …"[593]

[593] Office of the Inspector General Coalition Provisional Authority, Audit Report Number 04-002, 25 June 2004, Management of Personnel Assigned to the Coalition Provisional Authority in Baghdad, Iraq.

905. The audit stated that CPA officials believed their rosters were 90 to 95 percent accurate, which implied that there could be more than 100 individuals not properly accounted for.

906. The audit found even less information about staff deployed outside Baghdad:

> "CPA officials stated that if personnel departed Kuwait or other rear area to a forward site, other than Baghdad, such as Al Hilla, Basra or Erbil, in support of CPA Operations there were no reliable procedures to identify and account for these individuals. Additionally, personnel hired to work directly for Iraq ministries in Baghdad provide limited, if any, information to the CPA in Baghdad or Washington DC."

907. A report to Congress by the US General Accounting Office (GAO) in June 2004 stated that the total number of CPA civilian and military personnel in Baghdad peaked at 1,239 in April 2004 (see Table 5).[594] That figure was estimated to be about 90 percent accurate, reflecting the difficulty of tracking the arrival and departure of personnel. The GAO stated that no reliable data were available for the period before 1 March 2004.

908. The GAO reported that, although the total number of CPA staff fluctuated, the approximate composition remained steady:

- 28 percent from the US military;

---

[594] US General Accounting Office Report to Congressional Committees, June 2004, Rebuilding Iraq. Resource, Security, Governance, Essential Services, and Oversight Issues.
[595] As listed in the GAO report.

- 26 percent civilian secondees from US federal agencies, including the Department of Defense (DoD);
- 25 percent contractors and temporary US government employees hired to work in the CPA; and
- 13 percent secondees from other Coalition countries.

909. A comparison of the very different US and UK data suggests that the 120 UK secondees in Baghdad in April 2004 (see Table 5) represented 14 percent of the CPA total of 862 (excluding DoD military) recorded in the GAO report to Congress, and 75 percent of the non-US Coalition contribution of 160.

910. In November 2003, 104 staff from eight countries were working in CPA(South) in Basra, of whom 48 (46 percent)[596] were from the UK.[597] The largest contributors after the UK were Italy and Denmark. It is not clear how many were from the US.

911. After the transfer of sovereignty in June 2004, the US established a Mission to Iraq, consisting of the Embassy in Baghdad and four Regional Embassy Offices (REOs) in Basra, Hillah, Kirkuk and Mosul.[598]

912. In addition to its bilateral diplomatic role, the new US Embassy in Baghdad included:

- a large executive secretariat to carry out the residual functions of the former CPA, which quickly reduced in size;
- the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office (IRMO); and
- the Project and Contracting Office (PCO).[599]

913. In October 2005, the US announced the restructuring of part of the US Mission in Iraq as PRTs (see Section 10.2).[600]

914. By September 2006, nine PRTs and eight local governance satellite offices had been established. Seven PRTs were US-led, one (Basra) was UK-led and one Italian-led.

915. A South Korean-led Regional Reconstruction Team (RRT) for the Kurdistan region was established in Erbil in February 2007, with two satellite offices.[601]

916. According to US data for 2005, 2006 and 2009, over 1,000 civilians from US Government agencies (including the State Department and USAID) were deployed to the Embassy, REOs and PRTs (see Table 6).

917. The figure of 1,000 excludes the large number of US civilian contractors employed by the US Mission. A July 2009 report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction recorded that, at that time, 4,079 US civilians were contracted to the State Department in Iraq, 34,846 to the DoD and 8,948 to other agencies, including USAID.[602]

918. Without detailed information on the jobs performed by UK and US contractors, it is not possible to be certain that they were deployed in equivalent roles or to draw a direct comparison between UK and US statistics.

919. A comparison of data from 2005, 2006 and 2009 suggests that the UK provided an average of approximately 6.5 percent of the combined total of US and UK government employees[603] in post-CPA Iraq (see Table 6). When DFID (but not US) contractors are included, the figure is above 9 percent.

920. From 2003 to 2009, DFID consistently deployed significantly more contractors than civil servants to Iraq (see Figure 5). The underlying data are reproduced in Table 10 at the end of this Section.

921. Sir Suma Chakrabarti explained the role of DFID "consultants" to the Inquiry:

> "… what we were very keen to do was use consultants in … project work around certain projects that had to be completed with deep technical skills that DFID staff no longer have. We don't have those water engineers and power engineers we used to have …
> "The DFID staff were working much more at the policy end on capacity. So how do you put a budget together in the Ministry of Finance? What would you need to run a Prime Minister's office properly, and those sorts of things that DFID staff focused on much more."

922. A 2013 report on DFID's use of contractors by the Independent Commission for Aid Impact explained that they were used in roles ranging from procuring equipment and providing technical advice to implementing development programmes.[610]

923. The FCO, with a focus on bilateral and policy work carried out by core FCO staff, employed contractors in smaller numbers, and principally during the CPA period. In January 2004, the FCO employed 23 contractors in Baghdad to work for the CPA.[611] In October 2004, there were just two FCO contractors in Iraq.[612]

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section contains the Inquiry's analysis, conclusions and lessons in relation to the deployment of civilian personnel in Iraq, the evidence for which is set out in Section 15.1.

2. This Section does not address:

- the recruitment, deployment or impact of UK police officers in Iraq, addressed in Section 12;
- whether sufficient civilian personnel were deployed to achieve the UK's objectives in Iraq, or the contribution that civilian personnel made to Iraq's reconstruction, both addressed in Section 10;
- the funding of civilian deployments, including the cost of protective security measures, addressed in Section 13; or
- the Government's reviews of the UK approach to post-conflict reconstruction and stabilisation, and the creation of a deployable UK civilian stand-by capability, addressed in Sections 10.3 and 10.4.

Key findings

- Before the invasion of Iraq, the Government had made only minimal preparations for the deployment of civilian personnel.
- There was an enduring gap between the Government's civilian capacity and the level of its ambition in Iraq.
- There was no overarching consideration by the Government of the extent to which civilians could be effective in a highly insecure environment, or of the security assets needed for civilians to do their jobs effectively.
- The evidence seen by the Inquiry indicates that the Government recognised its duty of care to UK-based and locally engaged civilians in Iraq. A significant effort was made to keep civilians safe in a dangerous environment.

Overview

3. Between 2003 and 2009, UK and Iraqi civilian personnel made an essential contribution to the UK's efforts to help rebuild Iraq. They often did so in extremely dangerous circumstances. Some locally engaged (LE) staff and UK-based contractors lost their lives.

4. The initial deployment of only a handful of civilian personnel reflected pre-invasion assumptions about the limited extent of the likely UK contribution to the post-conflict reconstruction and administration of Iraq.

5. Soon after the invasion, Mr Blair called for a significant increase in the UK civilian effort. Further calls to strengthen the UK civilian presence in Iraq followed.

6. The Government had no pre-existing machinery for recruiting and deploying at speed large numbers of civilians with the appropriate skills. As a result, efforts to deploy larger numbers of civilians to Iraq fell well short of targets.

7. There was a particular shortage of Arabic speakers and reconstruction expertise.

8. From late summer 2003, concern about staff safety led to the progressive introduction of protective security measures for civilian personnel in Iraq and placed additional constraints on civilian deployments.

9. Government departments recognised their duty of care obligations to personnel working in Iraq. Significant effort and resources went into keeping staff safe.

10. In the absence of a government-wide approach to risk or an effective framework for assessing the value of civilian personnel in a highly insecure environment, the Government struggled to establish a co-ordinated approach to the deployment of civilians.

11. The Iraq Reconstruction Service Medal and the Locally Engaged Staff Assistance Scheme were appropriate responses to the issues they addressed.

Pre-invasion planning and preparation

12. Sections 6.4 and 6.5 address the UK's pre-invasion planning and preparation for its role in the Occupation of Iraq. In the absence of effective cross-government machinery for drawing together all aspects of planning and preparation, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), the Ministry of Defence (MOD) and the Department for International Development (DFID) pursued broadly complementary objectives, but did so separately. This left significant gaps in UK civilian capabilities that were overlooked.

13. The UK did not plan or prepare for the deployment of more than a handful of civilians to Iraq, other than in direct support of military operations.

14. The FCO was not equipped by past experience or practice, or by its limited human and financial resources, to prepare for nation-building of the scale required in Iraq, and did not expect to do so.

15. The FCO did make effective preparations, however, for resuming diplomatic representation in Baghdad. The British Office Baghdad opened, on schedule, on 5 May 2003.

16. DFID was reluctant, before the invasion, to engage in planning and preparation for anything other than the immediate humanitarian response to conflict.

17. DFID did, however, make pre-conflict preparations to support those multilateral institutions providing humanitarian assistance in Iraq and the region.

18. The MOD made provision for civilian support to military operations in Iraq, as it would for any military operation. Military planners identified and drew attention to the gap in those UK civilian capabilities that would be needed for post-conflict reconstruction and administration.

19. Neither the FCO nor DFID took responsibility for addressing that gap.

20. The shortage of the requisite civilian expertise within government was a significant constraint on the planning and preparation for post-conflict operations and on the eventual scale of the UK civilian contribution.

21. The review of the UK's approach to post-conflict reconstruction, begun in September 2003, addressed the management of the UK's contribution, including "the identification and training of civilian personnel and the maintenance of databases, with deployable capability".[1]

22. Although successive reviews changed significantly the UK's approach to reconstruction and stabilisation, they had limited impact on the UK's civilian deployment in Iraq.

Meeting the initial demand for civilian personnel in Iraq

23. The Inquiry estimates that, on the eve of the invasion, the UK had between 10 and 16 non-MOD civilians ready to deploy to Iraq. That very small number reflected the assumptions underpinning UK planning and preparation for post-conflict Iraq, including that:

- after a short period of US-led, UN-authorised military occupation, the UN would administer and provide a framework for the reconstruction of post-conflict Iraq;
- substantial international support would follow UN authorisation; and
- reconstruction and the political transition to Iraqi rule would proceed in a secure environment.

24. Between April and October 2003, Ministers and officials pressed for an increase in the UK civilian deployments to the US-led Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA) and its successor, the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), in Baghdad, Basra and elsewhere in Iraq.

25. Government departments were not equipped to respond to those demands.

26. On 17 April, Mr Blair agreed that the UK should "increase significantly the level of … political and practical support to ORHA, including the secondment of significant numbers of staff in priority areas".[2]

[2] Letter Rycroft to McDonald, 17 April 2003, 'Iraq: ORHA'.

27. The FCO, under the direction of Sir Michael Jay, the Permanent Under Secretary, co-ordinated the Whitehall response.

28. The FCO's approach was ad hoc, reflecting the absence of:

- adequate pre-invasion planning;
- a Whitehall mechanism for co-ordinating the urgent recruitment of volunteers; and
- clear US job descriptions for the vacant ORHA/CPA posts in Iraq.

29. On 22 April, with no clear job descriptions to draw on, Sir Michael Jay called on departments to "take a broad view in looking for volunteers".[3] He stated that "enthusiasm and personal qualities are likely to be just as important as specific expertise".

30. Officials informed the 22 May meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR) that 61 UK officials had been seconded to ORHA, five of them in Basra. Officials were able to provide Ministers with only very basic information on the functions of 35 of the 61, explaining: "Some secondees have yet to be allocated specific roles."[4]

31. On 25 July, Sir Michael Jay described the training and deployment since April of "over 100 civilian staff from sixteen different branches of government" as an exercise having "no modern precedent".[5]

32. While recognising that some of the difficulties faced by the UK reflected shortcomings in US plans, the Inquiry considers the deployment to have been unsatisfactory. Volunteers appear to have been recruited in a hasty and haphazard manner, without procedures to assess their suitability for a very challenging task. Civilians arrived in Iraq more slowly than required, with inadequate preparation and to fill positions that were ill defined.

33. As early as June 2003, concerns emerged that some civilians deployed to Iraq were not capable of meeting the physical requirements of working in such a difficult environment.

34. Ms Emma Sky, CPA Governorate Co-ordinator for Kirkuk from June 2003 to February 2004, told the Inquiry that she was not given a briefing by the FCO before travelling to Iraq. Instead she had received a phone call telling her "You've spent a lot of time in the Middle East. You will be fine."[6]

35. Between June and August 2003, Ministers and officials pressed for a more ambitious response to the demand for civilian personnel. The UK sought to deploy individuals with the right skills and appropriate levels of seniority, and to provide leadership by appointing a UK Head of CPA(South):

- On 3 June, Mr Blair called for Whitehall to return to a "war footing".[7] There needed to be "a strong civilian team in the South. In general, there needed to be a much stronger civilian grip".
- On 2 July, Baroness Amos, the International Development Secretary, recommended the deployment of additional staff with the right skills and seniority.
- On 10 July, Ministers agreed that the UK effort in the South should be increased and that a UK figure should be made Head of CPA(South).
- On 28 August, the AHMGIR agreed, "subject to security concerns", that Sir Hilary Synnott, Head of CPA(South), should be given "such assistance and staff as he deemed necessary".[8]

36. Departments did not rise to the challenge:

- Sir Hilary Synnott told the Inquiry that, on his arrival in Basra on 30 July: "The phones didn't work ... and nobody had thought to provide me with any form of computer."[9]
- On 5 September, Mr Neil Crompton, Head of the Iraq Policy Unit (IPU), reported that the view in Iraq was that the job there was "doable", but the UK needed to "throw massive resources at the problem now".[10] CPA(South) was "woefully under-staffed". It was clear that the UK would have to fill the positions itself rather than rely on third-country nationals or CPA Baghdad.
- On 23 September, Mr David Richmond, the Prime Minister's Deputy Special Representative on Iraq, reported that UK "influence in CPA Baghdad is limited; we supply only 100 out of its 1,000 staff there".[11]
- Sir Hilary Synnott told the Inquiry: "One of my key requests was at the end of August when I asked for, I think, 37 additional expert staff ... By 1 January, 18 out of 37 had arrived."[12]

37. Departments' weak response to the instruction to strengthen the UK civilian presence in Iraq represented a missed opportunity to alleviate some of the problems created by the failures of pre-invasion planning and preparation.

38. It is not possible to assert that the rapid deployment of all the additional personnel requested would have materially altered the situation in Iraq. It is, however, the Inquiry's view that the UK's ability to influence developments in Iraq was diminished by their absence (see Section 9.8).

Duty of care and risk management

39. Between 2003 and 2009, decisions on civilian deployment were closely linked to assessments of the security threat in Iraq and departments' interpretation of their duty of care to staff.

40. Steps taken by departments to manage the threat to staff included the provision of:

- pre-deployment security training;
- secure transport;
- close protection teams; and
- hardened accommodation.

41. Protective security could not eliminate the risk of death or injury. A number of LE staff and UK-based contractors working for the UK Government were killed in Iraq.

42. The evidence available to the Inquiry shows that the Government made serious efforts to mitigate the risk of injury and death. In addition to protective security measures:

- The FCO and DFID carried out frequent reviews of security in Baghdad, Basra and other locations in Iraq.
- During 2004, the FCO introduced improved structures for managing security issues at its posts in Iraq, with responsibility shared between named decision-makers in London and Iraq. Those arrangements were kept under review.
- When the threat was assessed to exceed the protection afforded by the security measures in place, officials and, where appropriate, Ministers, took quick decisions to lock down buildings or to withdraw staff temporarily.

43. The number of civilian personnel in Baghdad and Basra fluctuated as Ministers and officials sought to reconcile departments' duty of care to staff with operational needs and the finite resources available for enhanced security in the face of a constantly evolving threat:

- On 27 May 2004, Mr Stuart Jack, Head of the FCO Iraq Operations Unit (IOU) advised Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary: "we are currently at the limit of technical measures we can apply to protect staff in Iraq".[13]
- On 8 October 2004, officials advised Mr Straw that the FCO was "reaching the limits" of its ability to increase effective protection.[14]

[14] Minute Iraq Directorate [junior official] to PS [FCO], 8 October 2004, 'Staff Security in Iraq'.

- On 6 June 2006, Mr Andrew Noble, FCO Director of Security, stated: "we are operating at the limits of what can be achieved, consistent with running a diplomatic mission".[15]
- On 22 January 2007, Dr Rosalind Marsden, the British Consul General in Basra, reported that she had been advised by her Overseas Security Manager that "we are beginning to push our luck".[16]

44. The critical contribution of some of the protective measures introduced in Iraq is reflected in comments by Mr Robert Tinline, Head of the Basra Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) in 2007 and 2008. In April 2007, he informed the FCO that more than 1,200 rockets and mortars had been fired at the Basra Palace site since September 2006.[17] Although the BPC had been hit 70 times:

> "We were fortunate that none of our staff were killed or injured ... But we also made our own good fortune. Four accommodation 'pods', the bar, the gym and both the main office buildings received direct hits – but because they were hardened, no serious injuries resulted."

45. The progressive introduction of protective security measures between 2003 and 2008 placed growing constraints on civilians' ability to carry out their jobs effectively.

46. LE staff and contractors became critically important to the UK reconstruction effort.

47. The limited availability of secure transport had particular consequences for the way civilians operated.

48. Mr Martin Dinham, DFID Director Europe, Middle East and Americas from 2005 to 2007, told the Inquiry that, during 2006 and 2007, access to a number of infrastructure projects was so difficult that "we had to arrange to work through local contractors … taking videos, taking digital images, contacting us by email, meeting them in safe locations so we could actually supervise at one remove".[18]

49. From mid-2003, officials had recognised that measures to protect civilians from the security threat could have implications for the UK's ability to achieve its strategic objectives in Iraq.

50. Despite the warnings, the Government failed to establish a strategic framework for assessing the impact of the security threat and protective security measures on UK objectives or to agree an appropriate response.

51. In July 2003, Mr Peter Collecott, FCO Director General Corporate Affairs, commented on the tension between achieving UK objectives in Iraq and duty of care to staff. He advised Mr Straw:

> "We will inevitably be faced with some very difficult prioritisation decisions: activity v. security in Iraq; activity in Iraq v. priorities elsewhere."[19]

52. Concerns increased after the attacks on the UN headquarters in Baghdad in August 2003.

53. Mr Crompton advised Mr Straw:

> "Resources for security assets are an issue. But the principle should be that we provide the number of security assets we need for people to do their jobs properly, rather than limit the number of tasks we take on to the number of security assets we have on the ground (as some around Whitehall have been suggesting). This will be expensive."[20]

54. Over time, the tasks that UK civilians were able to carry out in Iraq became increasingly limited. In June 2006, the IPU characterised the FCO approach to security as "risk averse".[21] It stated that, where officials judged that a particular task exposed personnel to greater risk than the mitigating measures in place to deal with that risk, the task would not be undertaken.

55. The withdrawal of the majority of civilian staff from the Basra Palace site to Basra Air Station and Kuwait in response to a rapid deterioration in security in late 2006 followed that pattern.

56. Sir Peter Ricketts told the Inquiry that he was clear that the British Embassy Office would have to leave Basra Palace once it was known that the UK military would be moving out.

57. Officials reported in December 2006 that the rapid withdrawal had raised concerns among the UK's partners about its commitment to civilian operations.

58. The Government did not assess to what extent civilians could be effective in a highly insecure environment. Nor did the principal government departments concerned reach agreement on a cross-government framework for managing risk in such circumstances.

59. By late 2006, UK civilian activity in Iraq, particularly in Basra and the South, had become severely constrained by the security situation. Only after the change in the security environment brought about by the Charge of the Knights, the Iraqi military operation in March 2008 to drive Shia militias out of Basra, was there a strategic context in which the effectiveness of UK civilians in the South was no longer determined by the security threat and the availability of protective measures.

Civilian-military co-ordination

60. In the absence of a cross-government framework for managing risk, there was no overarching consideration of the security assets needed for civilians to do their jobs effectively, which UK military assets should be assigned to protect civilians and what constituted an appropriate level of expenditure on protective security in the particular circumstances of Iraq.

61. Sections 6.4 and 6.5 address the shortcomings in UK civilian–military co-ordination during pre-invasion planning and preparation for post-conflict Iraq.

62. Those shortcomings persisted after the invasion.

63. On 11 April 2003, shortly before the opening of the British Office Baghdad, officials advised Mr Straw that no decision had been taken on how to guard the compound perimeter. The MOD was considering the issue, but would "take some persuasion to redeploy to Baghdad from the South".[22]

64. On 15 July 2005, the Iraq Strategy Group (ISG) discussed the first draft of a paper to be signed by Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, on the planned drawdown of UK military forces from southern Iraq. The ISG concluded that the draft, which made no reference to the potential consequences of the drawdown for civilian activities, needed to cover more clearly the implications for other government departments and international actors.

65. In the revised paper, Dr Reid stated that, although the drawdown was likely to result in a significant cost saving to the military, other departments operating in Iraq might face increased security costs as they were "forced to seek commercial alternatives to military force protection".[23] No alternatives were proposed.

66. On 30 September 2005, a joint FCO/MOD/DFID paper recommended the allocation of additional resources to security, including UK military resources. A No.10 official told Mr Blair that Dr Reid did not support the proposal.

67. In October 2005, Dr Reid sought approval to procure a counter-measure to the threat posed to UK troops by Improvised Explosive Devices.[24] Ten days later, Mr Hilary Benn, the International Development Secretary, expressed support for the proposal, pointing out that it would also "significantly reduce the current threat against UK forces and DFID staff".

Locally engaged staff

68. LE staff played an essential role in the UK effort in Iraq. They became increasingly important as security deteriorated and the mobility of UK personnel became constrained.

69. Officials recognised in 2003 the critical role of LE staff and the personal risk they took in working for the UK Government. The issue came into sharper focus in Basra in April 2006, when the British Consul General reported that most LE staff in the city considered it too dangerous to come into work.

70. On 18 June 2006, an LE member of staff at the British Embassy Office Basra was murdered. His wife, also an LE member of staff, was seriously injured.

71. The visibility of LE staff in the local community made them particularly vulnerable to attack. UK officials in Iraq took steps to manage the risk, including the introduction of flexible shift patterns. DFID local staff in Basra, who were particularly exposed to the threat because of the extent of their work outside the Basra Palace site, had standing permission not to come to work if they felt unsafe.

72. Only in August 2007, faced with a further deterioration in security and growing press interest in LE staff, did officials try, with some difficulty, to reconcile FCO, DFID, MOD and, as the department responsible for immigration, Home Office views to establish "a coherent cross-Whitehall approach".[25]

73. The design and implementation of the Locally Engaged Staff Assistance Scheme, announced in Parliament in October 2007, was further hindered by shortcomings in the data on LE staff held by the FCO and the MOD.

74. The evidence seen by the Inquiry indicates that the UK did not fail in its duty of care to LE staff, but the Inquiry concludes that the Government should have recognised sooner that LE staff were uniquely exposed to the security threat and vital to the UK effort in Iraq, and that this was an issue requiring a co-ordinated and agreed approach across departments.

Language skills

75. Several witnesses to the Inquiry commented on the shortage of Arabic speakers among civilians deployed to Iraq throughout the period covered by the Inquiry.

76. There was also a shortage of Arabic speakers available to support the UK military.

77. The deployment of more Arabic speakers would have provided the opportunity to:

- increase UK access to Iraqi institutions and society;
- build greater trust between the UK Government and influential Iraqis; and
- improve UK understanding of political and social undercurrents in Iraq.

---

[25] Minute IPU [junior official] to Private Secretary [FCO], 1 August 2007, 'Iraq: Locally Engaged Staff'.

78. Two main factors appear to have contributed to the failure to meet the demand for Arabic speakers in Iraq:

- the finite number of Arabic speakers in the FCO; and
- the absence of a mechanism for redeploying Arabic speakers from other FCO jobs at short notice.

79. The Inquiry welcomes the steps taken by the FCO since 2010 to increase the number of Arabic speaker positions at FCO posts in the Middle East and North Africa, and Mr William Hague's decision as Foreign Secretary to open a new FCO language school in 2013 and to prioritise Arabic language training.

80. The Inquiry fully endorses Mr Hague's view that expertise in a foreign language makes UK diplomats:

> "... vastly more effective at communicating the viewpoint of the United Kingdom. And it is vital to understanding the political mood in different countries and to spotting trends or anticipating crises."[26]

81. There is little evidence, however, that the Government has considered how to respond effectively to a sudden surge in demand for particular language skills, especially where demand may be unforeseen.

Lessons

82. The Inquiry recognises that, since 2003, significant changes have been made to the UK's strategic and operational approach to reconstruction and stabilisation. Some of those changes, including the establishment of a deployable UK civilian stand-by capability, are the direct result of lessons learned from serious shortcomings in the deployment of civilian personnel in post-conflict Iraq.

83. The lessons identified in this Section remain relevant to the UK's evolving approach to reconstruction and stabilisation.

84. Other lessons relating to the strategic role of civilians in post-conflict reconstruction and stabilisation operations, the relationship between civilian and military deployments, and the impact of the UK's civilian-led programmes in Iraq are addressed in Section 10.4.

85. The effectiveness of the UK civilian effort in post-conflict Iraq was compromised by a range of factors, including the absence of effective cross-government co-ordination on risk, duty of care and the terms and conditions applicable to personnel serving in Iraq.

---

[26] Foreign & Commonwealth Office and the Rt Hon William Hague MP [from GOV.UK], 19 September 2013, Foreign Secretary opens Foreign Office language school.

86. The difficult working conditions for civilians in Iraq were reflected in short tour lengths and frequent leave breaks. Different departments adopted different arrangements throughout the Iraq campaign, leading to concerns about breaks in continuity, loss of momentum, lack of institutional memory and insufficient local knowledge.

87. Different departments will continue to deploy civilian staff in different roles. Standardisation of all aspects of those deployments may not be appropriate, but greater harmonisation of departmental policies should be considered wherever possible. The same approach should be applied to LE staff.

88. At all stages, including planning, departments must give full consideration to their responsibilities and duty of care towards LE staff, who have an essential contribution to make and will face particular risks in insecure environments.

89. All civilian deployments should be assessed and reviewed against a single, rigorous, cross-government framework for risk management. The framework should provide the means for the Government as a whole to strike an effective balance between security and operational effectiveness, and to take timely decisions on the provision of appropriate security measures.

90. Standardising tour lengths for civilians deployed by different departments would have eased the overall administrative burden and, perhaps, some of the tensions between individuals from different government departments serving in Iraq. But the environment was difficult and individuals' resilience and circumstances varied. The introduction of the option to extend a tour of duty was an appropriate response.

91. Throughout any operation of this kind, departments should maintain two procedures for the systematic debriefing of staff returning to the UK: one to meet duty of care obligations, the other to learn lessons from their experience.

92. It is difficult to separate the issue of the seniority or personal impact of individual civilians from the wider question of UK influence on the US, which is addressed in Section 9.8.

93. In order to identify individuals with the right skills, there must be clarity about the roles they are to perform. Wherever possible, individuals should be recruited for and deployed to clearly defined roles appropriate to their skills and seniority. They must be provided with the equipment needed to perform those roles to a high standard.

94. The Government should consider the introduction of a mechanism for responding to a surge in demand for a particular language capability.

95. The Inquiry views the inability of the FCO, the MOD and DFID to confirm how many civilian personnel were deployed to or employed in Iraq, in which locations and in what roles, as a serious failure. Data management systems must provide accurate information on the names, roles and locations of all staff for whom departments have duty of care responsibilities.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- the military covenant and the Harmony Guidelines, which provided a framework for the provision of welfare support to Service Personnel, including Reservists, and their families;
- the provision of welfare support during deployments;
- changes to the welfare support available to Service Personnel, including Reservists, and their families; and
- the consideration given to the effects on Service Personnel in decisions to deploy troops, in particular in terms of the Harmony Guidelines.

2. The provision of medical care, in particular for seriously injured Service Personnel, is addressed in Section 16.2.

3. The preparations made for repatriating the bodies of those who lost their lives serving on Operation TELIC, how their deaths were investigated, and the support provided for bereaved families is addressed in Section 16.3.

4. The problems caused by deployments consistently exceeding the Defence Planning Assumptions in respect of the provision of military equipment are addressed in Sections 6.3 and 14.

5. The decision to deploy to Helmand province in Afghanistan, and the implications of that decision, are addressed in Section 9.

The military covenant and the Harmony Guidelines

6. The concept of a "covenant between the Army and its soldiers" was first articulated in the March 2000 British Army publication, Values and Standards of the British Army.[1] The foreword to that publication, written by General Sir Roger Wheeler,[2] Chief of the General Staff, stated:

> "As a soldier in the British Army, much is expected of you. You may be required to deploy on operations which will be dangerous, to obey orders which could put your life at risk, and to live and work for long periods under extremely challenging conditions. Your comrades, your commanders and ultimately the Nation will depend on your courage, loyalty and commitment. They will rely on you to maintain the highest standards of professionalism and self-discipline at all times. In short, they must trust you and you need to trust them.
> "This two-way obligation forms a covenant between the Army and its soldiers … By volunteering as a soldier in the British Army you accept that, by putting the needs of the Service before your own, you will forgo some of the rights enjoyed by those outside the Armed Forces. But in return you can at all times expect fair treatment, to be valued and respected as an individual, and to be rewarded by reasonable terms and conditions of service."

7. The Armed Forces' capacity to deploy and sustain expeditionary operations was determined by decisions in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review (SDR 98).[3]

8. SDR 98 set out the UK's defence policy and translated that policy into detailed guidance for defence planning by using a number of "planning assumptions" which defined the required level of forces, or scale of effort, required for specific Military Tasks (see Section 6.1).

9. SDR 98 stated that the UK should be able to:

"– respond to a major international crisis which might require a military effort and combat operations of a similar scale and duration to the Gulf War when we deployed an armoured division, 26 major warships and over 80 combat aircraft.

or – undertake a more extended overseas deployment on a lesser scale (as over the last few years in Bosnia) while retaining the ability to mount a second substantial deployment – which might involve a combat brigade and appropriate naval and air forces – if this were made necessary by a second crisis. We would not, however, expect both deployments to involve war fighting or to maintain them simultaneously for longer than six months."

10. The principal scales of effort defined in SDR 98 were:

- Small scale: "a deployment of battalion size or equivalent".
- Medium scale: "deployments of brigade size or equivalent" for war-fighting or other operations.
- Large scale: deployments of division size or equivalent. The most recent example was the UK contribution to the 1991 Gulf Conflict, "although on that occasion the British division deployed with only two of its three brigades". This was "the maximum size of force we would plan to be able to contribute to peace enforcement operations, or to regional conflicts outside the NATO area".
- Very large scale and full scale: all the forces that would be made available to NATO to meet a major threat such as significant aggression against an ally.

11. SDR 98 also defined:

- Endurance: the likely duration of individual Military Tasks. Each Service needed to be able to sustain tasks for the required period, including where necessary by rotating individual units deployed and, where units were deployed on operations, allowing units a period of respite between each deployment as set out in the Service's Harmony Guidelines.

- Concurrency: the number of operations of a given scale of effort and duration that could be sustained by the force structure. SDR 98 concluded that "not to be able to conduct two medium scale operations at the same time would be an unacceptable constraint on our ability to discharge Britain's commitments and responsibilities".[4]

12. SDR 98 also considered the "underlying problems of under-manning and overstretch that we have inherited".[5] It defined overstretch as "trying to do too much with too little manpower". One result was that units and individuals were separated from their families too often and for too long. Another was that preparation for other tasks and longer-term training suffered. The additional pressures from "persistent overstretch" contributed to higher exit rates from the Armed Forces, which exacerbated under-manning. SDR 98 concluded:

> "We must break this vicious circle. To do so we must match the commitments we undertake to our planned resources, recognising that there will always be the risk of additional short-term pressures if we have to respond rapidly to an unforeseen crisis. We need to improve recruitment and retention so that our units are properly manned. And we need to use our manpower in the most effective manner, particularly seeking to avoid unnecessary separation or disruption to individuals and their families.
> "The Review [SDR 98] has designed a future force structure matched to the level of commitments we plan to be able to undertake. These structural changes, combined with measures to increase recruiting and retention, will ease overstretch."

13. The Harmony Guidelines described the maximum time that Service Personnel should spend away from their families (known as Individual Separated Service)[6] and the minimum time that they should have between operational deployments (known as tour intervals).[7]

14. The MOD told the Inquiry that the Harmony Guidelines were developed to help it "get the work/life balance right" for Service Personnel and that, as the name suggested, these were for guidance and were not "rules".

15. Each Service (the Royal Navy, the Army and the Royal Air Force) derived its own Harmony Guidelines based on an "analysis of historical norms and judgements, training requirements, deployment patterns and the unique culture of each Service", and on the "routine level of concurrency" that the Armed Forces were resourced and structured to sustain.

16. The table below shows the Harmony Guidelines for each Service in 2003.[8]

Table 1: Harmony Guidelines, 2003

	Royal Navy	Army	Royal Air Force
Individual Separated Service	In any 36 month period, no one to exceed 660 days.	In any 30 month period, no one to exceed 415 days.	In a 12 month period, not more than 2.5% of personnel to exceed 140 days.
Unit tour intervals	Fleet Units to spend maximum of 60% deployed in 36 months.	24 month average interval between Unit tours.	16 month average interval between Unit tours.

17. On 17 January 2003, Mr Blair agreed the deployment of a large scale UK ground force, comprising the headquarters 1st (UK) Armoured Division and three combat brigades, to Iraq (see Section 6.2).

18. There is no indication that the potential pressure on Service Personnel, including with respect to the Harmony Guidelines, was a consideration in that decision.

19. The Service Personnel Board (SPB), chaired by Lieutenant General Anthony Palmer, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Personnel) (DCDS(Personnel)), discussed the effect of current operations on personnel welfare on 21 January 2003.[9] The SPB commented that the "shift to expeditionary operations was having a significant impact on people". The lesson from Operation FRESCO[10] was that "wider welfare considerations needed to be taken into account in advance of decisions on commitments".

20. Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Min(AF)), told the Inquiry that the Government knew that the invasion of Iraq would put additional strain on the Harmony Guidelines:

> "… we had been involved in both Iraq and Afghanistan, still engaged in Northern Ireland, still having people in Cyprus, still having people in Sierra Leone and other parts of sub-Saharan Africa, and still having a significant lay-down in the Falklands.
> "All of that made it very difficult to meet harmony guidelines, although it varied between the Services – the Army under most strain … and significant key enablers within the Army … They would be under quite considerable stretch. So medics, engineers, a raft of people who were under very significant strain. We knew that.

"However, what was the solution? That [Iraq] was then something we then had to attend to."[11]

Early priorities and concerns

Operational Welfare Package

21. The MOD provided an Operational Welfare Package (OWP) to deployed Service Personnel. Although tailored to each deployment, it typically included access to television and films, books, the internet, and a weekly telephone allowance.

22. This support was provided "consistent with the operational and environmental circumstances in which they [Service Personnel] are placed, and the availability of resources".

23. In late January 2003, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), asked senior officers to scrutinise the lessons identified during Op JACANA (a UK operation in Afghanistan in 2002), and to report on progress in addressing lessons relevant to Op TELIC.[12]

24. Lt Gen Palmer responded on 31 January, outlining progress towards addressing several of the lessons that had been identified, including the importance of a workable "Welfare Telephone" system early in an operation.[13] The Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) had made this, along with the delivery of mail, their priority for Op TELIC. The ratio of Welfare Telephones had been increased from one to 50 to one to 30 to meet the needs of manoeuvre forces.

Review of allowances

25. From 1 April 2003, all units (Regular and Reserve) from which more than five Service Personnel had deployed received a Family Welfare Support Enhancement (FWSE) of £1 per week per individual deployed.[14] The FWSE was to be used by the unit to improve communications between families and deployed Service Personnel (for example by providing internet and telephone facilities) and to support welfare activities for families.

26. Lt Gen Palmer advised the Chiefs of Staff on 9 April 2003 that he had reviewed the MOD's allowance policy "in support of Op TELIC Service Personnel and their families", and had established a close link with the Treasury to ensure a rapid response to individual cases.[15] A number of changes had been agreed, including:

- the Longer Separated Service Allowance and Longer Service at Sea Bonus enhancements would be introduced earlier than planned;
- the introduction of new arrangements to support close relatives of injured Service Personnel hospitalised in the UK; and
- enhanced support for Service Personnel and their dependants evacuated from permanent posts in the Middle East.

27. The new arrangement to support close relatives of injured Service Personnel referred to by Lt Gen Palmer was the extension of the Dangerously Ill Forwarding of Relatives (DILFOR) scheme (which previously provided for two people to visit seriously injured Service Personnel in hospitals overseas for up to 10 days, at public expense) to include hospitals in the UK.[16] The support provided to injured Service Personnel and their families is described in Section 16.2.

28. The MOD reported in December 2003 that the FWSE had been well received.[17] A survey undertaken by the Army Families' Federation (AFF) suggested that communication between families and deployed Service Personnel was good.

29. The FWSE was increased from £1 to £2.20 per week per person deployed on 1 November 2008.[18] The increase meant that a typical infantry battalion could expect to receive in the region of £30,000 to support families during an operational tour.[19]

Delivery of the Operational Welfare Package

30. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that, rather than deliver a fixed OWP for Op TELIC, he worked closely with PJHQ to ensure that the OWP evolved over time to reflect "the views from soldiers on the ground".[20]

The free parcel service

On 24 March 2003, in an exchange with Mr Frank Roy in the House of Commons, Mr Blair undertook to try to ensure that arrangements to provide a free parcel service to troops in the Gulf were put in place as soon as possible.[21]

The free parcel service began on 17 April.[22]

Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry:

> "… free parcels, two kilograms, engraved on my heart … this was a debate about how far we could stretch the logistic operation. I mean, delivering two kilograms of parcels to everybody in theatre over distances with … not enough helicopters for operations, let alone for administration, was a real issue, but it was critical for the families back in the UK that they could send to their loved ones … things that would remind them of home."[23]

The free service was terminated in April 2004.[24] In a written statement to Parliament, Mr Ingram stated:

> "The provision of a free packet service recognised the difficult conditions Service Personnel were operating in and that it was not possible to provide the full spectrum of welfare support normally available to Service Personnel on operations. Whilst southern Iraq is not yet a benign environment, the level of welfare support and the facilities available on Operation TELIC are now comparable to those provided in other operational theatres.
> "It has therefore been decided that from 8 April 2004 … this free service will cease."

31. Mr Ingram visited Iraq from 13 to 15 May 2003.[25] His Military Assistant reported that the Minister had been impressed by the morale of the troops, but he had been briefed that it could be undermined by (unspecified) small-scale and easily rectified "irritants". Mr Ingram's Military Assistant concluded:

> "The Minister would be disappointed if we lost opportunities for 'quick wins' here (though he appreciates that troops in theatre examine these issues from one end of the telescope)."

32. On 22 May, Major General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Joint Operations (Operations) (DCJO(Ops)), listed those irritants and the actions being taken to rectify them in a report for Air Chief Marshal (ACM) Sir Anthony Bagnall, Vice Chief of Defence Staff (VCDS):

- insufficient portaloos (more could be supplied);
- insufficient fresh rations (sufficient fresh rations were available; commanders had chosen to mix these with ration packs);
- a desire for a second Op TELIC medal covering Phase IV operations[26] (being discussed by Chiefs of Staff);

[26] Phase IV is the military term for the post-conflict phase of operations.

- the recent decision to withdraw the second free welfare families warrant (that decision had been waived for Land forces deployed on Op TELIC);
- the troops' desire to be able to send parcels back to their families without charge (that facility was not available for any other operation, and would not be provided for Op TELIC);
- inadequate access to TVs (the absence of a final UK "disposition plan" for Phase IV and the low standard of camp infrastructure, and in particular the lack of reliable power supply, was hindering the installation of equipment); and
- inadequate access to the internet (equipment was being rolled out).[27]

33. Maj Gen Fry concluded that sufficient weight was being given to providing support for deployed Service Personnel, who would see "incremental improvements" in the delivery of the OWP and infrastructure.

34. Mr Ingram told the Inquiry that he saw his role as one of getting "ground truth" of what was happening in Iraq, including by talking to soldiers in theatre.[28]

35. A small team from the Army's Personnel Directorate and PJHQ visited MOD civilian staff in Iraq from 18 to 20 May.[29] They reported that comments on the OWP:

> "… ranged from a claim that there wasn't a package in existence to the fact that in reality it didn't run smoothly. At Basra there was only one internet terminal available from 0000 to 0700 for [military and civilian] staff to send messages home … Telephone facilities were similarly limited …"

36. The team reported that other issues such as the availability of exercise equipment were being addressed by local purchases in theatre.

37. The 28 May meeting of the SPB was advised that Service Personnel were currently living in "basic tented accommodation, existing Iraqi buildings, or fighting vehicles".[30] Tier 1 facilities (hard-skinned or tented accommodation with air-conditioning) should be fully deployed by September and Tier 2 facilities (hard-skinned, semi-permanent accommodation) by December. A limited OWP, comprising telephone facilities, British Forces Post Office mail, British Forces Broadcasting Service radio and an electronic letter service, was currently available in all locations; internet and TV were available in some locations. PJHQ intended to provide the full OWP in all locations.

38. The SPB was also advised that a rest and recuperation (R&R) package would be introduced once roulement and force alignment had taken place; "Operational Stand-Downs" would begin on 30 May.

39. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that, initially, R&R was taken in theatre but, as the situation stabilised and in response to the needs of Service Personnel and their families, this was extended to allow Service Personnel to travel back to the UK.[31] Lt Gen Palmer highlighted the costs of the initiative, particularly in terms of removing Service Personnel from their roles and the demand placed on air transport.

40. The R&R allowance established in Iraq was two weeks, including travel time from and to Iraq.

41. Air Marshal (AM) David Pocock, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel) from 2005 to 2007, told the Inquiry that the practice of flying Service Personnel back to the UK for R&R had evolved over the first years of Op TELIC:

> "… as far as I can tell, there was never a careful policy discussion about what we were going to do and why. It started off as a means of getting the troops away from particular areas of danger, hardship. They could have a break, clean up, a rest and go back again, and then it gradually evolved from moving back from the actual areas of fighting to perhaps out of the country …
> "… it was never actually, so far as I could tell a formal policy. Like Topsy, it grew."[32]

42. The demands placed on air transport by that practice are considered later in this Section.

43. Lt Gen Palmer visited Iraq in early June 2003. He reported to General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, on 20 June that the OWP had been "well received".[33] The main effort now was to provide air-conditioned accommodation as temperatures in Iraq rose.

44. An MOD official advised Mr Ingram on 27 June that many of the "welfare irritants" had already been resolved.[34] In general, problems in delivering the OWP had been caused by the rapid pace of operational deployment. The advice concluded:

> "Overall, the OWP policy has held up well given the scale of operation and the specific demands imposed in Op TELIC."

45. The MOD reported in July that, owing to the austere nature of the deployment and the lack of infrastructure in some locations, the OWP had been implemented in stages.[35] The first stage comprised:

- air letters (commonly known as Blueys) delivered electronically;

- mail;
- welfare telephones;
- newspapers;
- radio broadcasting;
- limited internet access; and
- basic shop facilities.

46. By July, the OWP was being extended to provide additional internet access, fitness equipment, TV broadcasting and free books.

47. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that, over time, the MOD delivered a "very good" OWP.[36]

48. Lieutenant General Sir Alistair Irwin, the Adjutant General from 2003 to 2005, added that a key factor in delivering the OWP was managing and meeting increasing expectations.[37]

49. The Inquiry heard mixed reports on the OWP from families and veterans of Op TELIC. Limited access to telephones early in the campaign and the fragility of the air bridge between Iraq and the UK were particular sources of frustration.

50. The Inquiry put those concerns to Mr Ingram.[38] On the issue of limited access to telephones, he told the Inquiry:

> "… at the beginning of a war phase, and shortly after it, it is very hard to deliver full communication and infrastructure. Indeed, even the military infrastructure, ie in terms of operational demand, was pretty fragile as well.
> "So you couldn't honour the commitment in terms of the amount of time that each soldier … would have to phone back to their family, but as the lay-down became more established, and investment could then be made in communications, and when we had the communications infrastructure, we could then improve the availability and the time …"

THE AIR BRIDGE

51. In January 2004, in response to concerns over the increasing threat to Air Transport (AT), the Chiefs of Staff agreed that only aircraft fitted with a Defensive Aids Suite (DAS)[39] should fly into Basra.[40]

[39] A Defensive Aids Suite (DAS) is a military aircraft system which acts to defend the aircraft from attack. A DAS typically comprises chaff, flares, and electronic countermeasures combined with equipment to detect threats.
[40] Minutes, 28 January 2004, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

52. General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, visited Iraq from 10 to 13 October 2005.[41] In his report to Gen Walker, he set out the heavy demands on the UK's Support Helicopter (SH) fleet, and continued:

> "If our SH capability is inadequate, our AT fleet is worse. The air bridge to theatre is now so fragile that sustaining an efficient R&R schedule is nigh on impossible. Quite apart from the morale effect of inordinate delays, the difficulties with R&R are now beginning to impact significantly on the operational effectiveness of the Division. The situation is so bad that I am asking HQ Land to re-examine, at least in principle, whether we might not re-adopt 4 month operational tours without R&R. Since I suspect there will be very many reasons against this – continuity and our current training cycle to name but two – we really need to take stock of our AT capability in the round, especially in light of our impending commitment to Afghanistan."

53. Later that month, the Chiefs of Staff "noted" that the UK's AT capability was "unable to meet current and prospective demands", and that General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, Vice Chief of Defence Staff, would undertake a stocktake and scope increased availability.[42]

54. Gen Granville-Chapman reported to Gen Walker in December that the main constraint on AT was the lack of DAS-equipped passenger aircraft to support current operations.[43] The decision that only DAS-equipped aircraft could carry passengers to Iraq and Afghanistan meant that only three RAF TriStar aircraft were currently available to support the air bridge.

55. Gen Granville-Chapman described the work that was under way to address the shortfall in AT availability. A further three TriStar would be fitted with DAS, and a fourth for DAS. Those aircraft would become available between May 2006 and February 2007. The MOD had chartered civil aircraft to shuttle between the UK and a "hub" at Al Udied airbase in Qatar, reducing the burden on TriStar. The first charter flight had been on 6 December.

56. The deployment of additional forces to Afghanistan in 2006 would "demand a surge in AT requirement". To handle that demand, the MOD was exploring the possibility of establishing a Forward Mounting Base (FMB) for TriStar that shortened the transit time to and from theatre.

57. Gen Granville-Chapman also addressed a number of "more radical approaches" including using civil aircraft fitted with DAS to fly into theatre, and procurement of additional aircraft. On the latter, the only viable option that would make a difference to lift capacity within two years was the early acquisition of a fifth C-17 (currently scheduled for procurement in 2011). The MOD was considering "innovative finance arrangements", including leasing arrangements.

58. Gen Granville-Chapman provided Gen Walker with an update on the stocktake on 6 January 2006.[44] After further work, the early acquisition of a fifth C-17 remained a possibility. The "less good news" was that the Treasury now contended that fitting the additional TriStar with DAS was not a legitimate charge to the Reserve, given that the "hub and spoke" arrangement using Al Udied was now operational. Officials advised that the MOD should continue fitting DAS "at risks".

59. In his post-operational tour report on 18 January, Major General James Dutton, General Officer Commanding Multi-National Division (South-East), wrote:

> "The reliance on only 3 suitably equipped TriStar C-2 aircraft to support the UK-BAS [Basra Air Station] air bridge task has again created significant problems, especially as one aircraft has been in long term major maintenance for most of the period and the others have occasionally been required for Op HERRICK tasks … consequently there is an indisputable need for additional Defensive Aids Suite (DAS) equipment for air transport assets."[45]

60. Gen Walker directed on 24 January that the MOD should "explore innovative funding operations for the early procurement of a fifth C-17 aircraft".[46]

61. In April 2006, the MOD's Directorate of Operational Capability (DOC) published its third report of Op TELIC lessons, covering the period from 1 December 2004 to 28 February 2006.[47] The report is described in detail in Section 14.1.

62. On AT, the DOC reported:

> "The availability of air transport assets became critical in October 2005. The strategic and tactical requirement for all aircraft to be equipped with Defensive Aids Suite (DAS) in theatre has compounded the problem. The air bridge to theatre became so fragile that the Rest and Recuperation (R&R) plot became close to untenable in Oct/Nov 2005 … This affected morale and the operational effectiveness of the British personnel in MND(SE). The situation became so pronounced that HQ LAND was tasked to look at initiatives that would allow a shortened tour length without R&R … the Op HERRICK deployment [to Helmand province, Afghanistan] brings with it more pain rather than respite and, as a result, the imperative to improve our AT capacity is stronger than ever."

63. The DOC recommended:

> "There is a requirement to assess and improve our AT capacity as an operational priority. The UK should consider civilian air charter to off-load capacity …"

64. The House of Commons Defence Committee visited Iraq from 4 to 8 June.[48] On the air bridge, the Committee wrote:

> "During our visit to Iraq, we heard that air bridge reliability remained a key concern among UK Service Personnel. We witnessed at first hand the disruption caused by delays of flights in and out of, and around, theatre. The difficulties stem from problems both with the commercial service between the UK and Al Udeid and with the C-130 Hercules in theatre and the availability of RAF air bridge TriStar, VC10 and C-17. Troops travelling home on leave are frequently delayed and this reduces their time on leave."

65. The Defence Committee concluded:

> "It is unacceptable that Servicemen and women, many of whom are serving greatly in excess of Harmony Guidelines, should have their leave disrupted by the MOD's inability to provide a reliable air bridge."

66. The MOD ordered a fifth C-17 aircraft in July 2006, and took delivery of that aircraft in February 2008.[49]

67. In its 2009 report entitled Support to High Intensity Operations, the National Audit Office (NAO) wrote:

> "The Department's [the MOD's] air transport fleet is small, consists of aircraft types that are old by comparison to modern civilian fleets and is therefore susceptible to mechanical breakdown. In addition, the integration of modern Defensive Aids Suites on to these aircraft has caused reliability problems. The availability of the TriStar fleet, the Department's main passenger carrying aircraft, has been low. Of the seven TriStar passenger-carrying aircraft, on average 45.5 percent since January 2006, have been unavailable to support operations. Significant effort by those responsible for the air transport fleet has enabled the Department to deliver the overall task but the air bridge remains under considerable strain."[50]

68. On the fragility of the air bridge, Mr Ingram told the Inquiry:

> "The air bridge … was very fragile. We were dealing with ageing aircraft, you just need an aircraft to break down for a few hours and the whole thing is thrown into dislocation.

"It is why … the procurement of commercial aircraft was then put in place, but they could break down as well, and there was nothing more frustrating than hundreds of personnel hoping to get home and then being contained somewhere else, whether it was Cyprus or Oman or Kuwait or wherever …

"These were real issues, and there were not easy solutions to it."[51]

69. AM Pocock, DCDS(Personnel) from 2005 to 2007, told the Inquiry:

"The first time I went out to Iraq … the subject [the air bridge] was raised with me more often than anything else and, when I came back, I immediately went to see the Chief of the Air Staff, and he was already aware of it, but I made plain to him that, apart from it being a morale issue generally, it was disastrous for the reputation of the Royal Air Force. He understood completely."[52]

70. AM Pocock told the Inquiry that the problems with the air bridge were very well known, and were regularly discussed in Chiefs of Staff meetings.[53] He commented that "if there had been a solution, it would have been implemented".

Concerns over the effect of Operation TELIC on retention

71. In late April 2003, Lt Gen Palmer wrote to Rear Admiral (RAdm) Timothy McClement, Assistant Chief of the Naval Staff, Major General David Richards, Assistant Chief of the General Staff, and Air Vice Marshal (AVM) Philip Sturley, Assistant Chief of the Air Staff, requesting a subjective assessment of the likely impact of current operations on retention over the short, medium and long term, and how retention could be improved.

72. RAdm McClement assessed that Op TELIC would have a positive impact on retention in the Royal Navy in the short term (though there might be a slightly negative impact in some areas, including the Royal Marines).[54] A key factor in retention would be ensuring that Service Personnel had a period of "relative programme stability" after operations, to enable them to take leave and spend time with family and friends.

73. Maj Gen Richards assessed that there would be a "net benefit" on retention in the Army.[55] However, much would depend on how the recovery and recuperation phases were managed; the demobilisation of Reservists required particular attention. Measures which would improve retention included:

- recognition, possibly in the form of a memorial service and early agreement on the processes for Honours, Awards and medals;

- minimising the impact on Harmony Guidelines by reducing other commitments;
- rolling out the OWP developed for Op TELIC – which had been well received – to other operations;
- establishing and resourcing appropriate immediate and long-term arrangements for stress management, including for Reservists; and
- improving accommodation.

74. Maj Gen Richards also highlighted measures which would improve the retention of Reservists, including:

- greater consistency with Regular Service Personnel, in terms of eligibility for operational benefits, allowances and medals; and
- ensuring that no Reservist was financially disadvantaged because of Op TELIC.

75. AVM Sturley assessed that "the combined effect of [Ops] FRESCO, TELIC and our other commitments has hurt".[56] AVM Sturley identified a number of measures to improve retention, the first of which (for Regular Service Personnel) was to reduce future commitments.

76. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that, as DCDS(Personnel), his "major preoccupation" was to reduce the number of troops in Iraq quickly, to reduce the pressure on individual Service Personnel and the Harmony Guidelines.[57] He emphasised that those efforts were always in consultation with PJHQ and never at operational risk.[58]

77. Commodore Noel Preston-Jones, Director Service Personnel Policy, briefed the 28 May 2003 meeting of the SPB that the responses from RAdm McClement, Maj Gen Richards and AVM Sturley "had, inter alia, highlighted the need for a reduction in commitments".[59] The assessments of the impact of current commitments on retention varied. Overall, the Royal Navy and Army anticipated a net benefit from Op TELIC, while the RAF and Defence Medical Services anticipated a net loss. The emerging conclusions of the "people" work strand of the Recuperation Initiative included the need to relieve pressure on pinch points,[60] "for example by reducing commitments, resolving under manning or adjusting the force structure".

78. At its 28 May meeting, the SPB also discussed priorities for the MOD's Short Term Plan for 2004 (STP04),[61] and in particular the "significant structural under-funding across the people area". Lt Gen Palmer concluded that any STP bid needed to be underpinned by evidence "for example to demonstrate the link between retention and improved accommodation … The process had to be placed on a more scientific basis."

79. In advance of the 26 November meeting of the SPB, Lt Gen Palmer circulated a personal "think-piece" on STP04.[62] It described STP03 as "relatively good for personnel", although "recruiting and retaining Service Personnel is becoming increasingly difficult and expensive as demographics change, expectations rise and technology evolves".

80. Looking ahead to STP04, Lt Gen Palmer assessed that, while the Services had made significant progress towards achieving manning balance targets and premature voluntary retirement (PVR) rates remained relatively low, "the current level of operational commitments … is threatening to undermine or reverse the progress made".

81. Emerging problems were:

- The Army reported that Op TELIC was having a "marked impact" on tour intervals, rendering it unable to meet Harmony/Separated Service Guidelines.
- The RAF reported a significant worsening in their figures for Separated Service.
- Across all three Services, pressure on pinch point trades was increasing. Medical services continued to be a specific concern.
- The number of Reservists available for mobilisation was falling.

82. Lt Gen Palmer concluded that the MOD's forthcoming planning round was likely to be particularly challenging; the SPB would need to give direction on which personnel priorities should be "reprieved".

83. Mr Ingram visited Basra in December 2003.[63] He reported to Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, that, while UK Armed Forces were in "excellent shape", he had concerns for the future:

> "Some units in Iraq have had exceptionally busy operational and training cycles before deployment … I detected signs that the pressures of repeated long separations may be building in some areas. We will need to manage this carefully in the New Year …"

Supporting Reservists

84. There are two key types of Reserve Forces:

- members of the Volunteer Reserve Forces (VRF) who serve within VRF units and usually train in the evenings, at weekends and for at least two weeks each year; and

---

[62] Paper DCDS(Pers), 17 November 2003, 'STP 04 – A Paper by DCDS(Pers)'.
[63] Letter Ingram to Secretary of State [MOD], 30 December 2003, 'Visit to UK Forces in Basra 17-19 December 2003'.

- members of the Regular Reserve, who are ex-members of the Regular Forces who still have a liability for mobilisation.[64]

85. The VRF comprises the Royal Naval Reserve, the Territorial Army (TA), the Royal Marines Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force.

86. In 2003, there were approximately 40,000 members of the VRF, of whom 35,000 were in the TA.[65]

87. The Reserve Forces have three primary roles:

- to augment Regular Forces for enduring operations;
- to provide additional capability for large scale operations; and
- to provide specialist capability.

88. Lieutenant General Mark Mans, the Deputy Adjutant General from 2005 to 2008, told the Inquiry that for Op TELIC, as for other operations, Reservists were:

> "… more often than not mobilised as individuals to support regular Army units. Sometimes they were mobilised in teams of 10 to 20, but that was quite unusual."[66]

89. Lt Gen Mans described the welfare support provided to members of the TA:

> "As far as the support to the Territorial Army, when they were mobilised, they got exactly the same as the Regulars. So there was no distinction whatsoever. As far as support to their families, the same applied, but of course, it is more difficult, because the families of Territorial [Army] soldiers are spread far and wide …
> "… when they are mobilised, the [Territorial Army] soldiers do support a Regular unit of one form or another and, therefore, it is incumbent upon that Regular unit, and particularly the rear party back at the home base, to make sure that those individuals within the TA, and their families, are appropriately looked after in terms of maintaining contact, and also making sure they are aware of all the support and sustenance they can achieve."[67]

90. Lt Gen Mans added that once a member of the TA was demobilised, responsibility for their welfare reverted to their TA unit.

91. The MOD told the Inquiry that it had considered providing a separate "welfare pathway" for Reservists, but concluded that it would not aid integration.[68]

92. The initial call-out notice for Reservists for Op TELIC was issued in early January 2003.[69] By 19 March (when military operations against Iraq began), over 5,000 Reservists had been mobilised (comprising some 12 percent of total UK forces).

93. All TA and Regular Reservists deployed for Op TELIC 1 (the major combat phase of operations) were mobilised through the Reserves Training and Mobilisation Centre (RTMC) at Chilwell in Nottingham.[70] The briefing and preparation process at RTMC Chilwell provided Reservists with medical and dental examinations, additional operation-specific equipment, and information on pay and allowances.

94. In early June, the DOC produced a short note on lessons identified on personnel issues during Op TELIC 1; the note was sent to Mr Ingram's office on 11 June.[71] The DOC stated that, although the mobilisation of Reservists had gone well, Op TELIC had thrown up "many issues" including:

- Many Reservists had found themselves "financially disadvantaged" because of mobilisation and deployment, or had not been paid properly.
- Some medical Reservists had been compulsorily mobilised from key NHS jobs but were not subsequently deployed where they could use their specialist skills. For many medical Reservists, it was their second or third operational deployment in recent years and this might affect retention.
- In some areas it had proved difficult to provide "active support" to the families of deployed Reservists, because of the dispersed and isolated locations of people's homes, particularly in relation to other Reservists and military bases.

95. The lessons identified were:

> "A review of Reservist pay procedures is required to eliminate inefficiencies and to take into account the financial penalties likely to be incurred by Reservists as a result of mobilisation.
>
> "A review of the mobilisation and employment of Reservist medical personnel on operations is required.
> "A review of practical and emotional support to Reservist families is required."

96. The MOD has not been able to provide the Inquiry with papers on a number of issues relating to Reservists, including whether and how these recommendations were taken forward.

97. The Inquiry asked Lt Gen Palmer what lessons had been learned from the mobilisation of Reserves for Op TELIC 1. He told the Inquiry that there were "big changes" between Op TELIC 1 and Op TELIC 2:

> "We put in place a mounting centre at Chilwell, in order to try to administer them better, because there were issues definitely about inadequacies in handling Reserve mobilisation to do with their pay, to do with their jobs, and we were very involved in trying to make sure … they could get their jobs back. Actually, I think we did have to resort to law on a couple of occasions.
> "We also made sure that they had access to the same packages as the Regulars and obviously the same training, but I did take a number of criticisms from Reservists who did not feel they had been properly looked after administratively or, indeed, in a training sense, but … they performed magnificently during the operation, and we simply could not have done without them."[72]

98. In October, the Army issued instructions on welfare provision for Op TELIC 3.[73] The instructions detailed the specific support available for mobilised Reservists, including:

- A TA cell had been established in theatre to handle any employment, administrative and pay concerns.
- All TA units were to ensure that they had a "proper focus established" to support the families of mobilised Reservists, and that there was regular contact with those families. The FWSE was designed to help with that work.
- All units were reminded that on mobilisation, "a Reservist becomes a Regular soldier". There had been a number of cases where a mobilised Reservist had not been given full access to medical and dental care.

99. The instructions directed recipients to take "particular note" of the "aftercare policy" for demobilised Reservists. On demobilisation, TA soldiers should be advised that they should re-establish contact with their TA unit or the Reserve Force and Cadet Association (RFCA) if they experienced any difficulties associated with their operational service. The formal departure interview should impart "the clear understanding" that the Army remained engaged in their welfare.

100. In December, an MOD report on lessons from Op TELIC highlighted the particular difficulties faced by families of Reservists:

> "The families of Reservists need particular consideration, as they may have had little or no contact with the Services and may not understand Service structures, administrative procedures, roles or jargon. Such families knew whom to contact, but … still found it much more difficult than Regular Army families to find the information and answers they wanted. This will be borne in mind in considering how best to improve the support they need."[74]

101. The report also stated that, in order to preserve the volunteer ethos of Reservists and the goodwill of families and employers, the MOD had revised the "desired notice" period for mobilisation from 14 to 21 days. Operational requirements meant that for Op TELIC 1, some Reservists received only four days' notice.

102. The report did not specify what action would be taken to address these difficulties.

103. In the same month, an NAO report on Op TELIC stated that some Reservists received as little as two or three days' notice, due to absence from home, postal times and incorrect addresses.[75]

104. The MOD set out the role of the Reserve Forces in the February 2005 publication Future Use of the UK's Reserve Forces.[76] The paper stated that:

- In recognition of the fact that most members of the VRF joined to undertake activities which were a contrast to their civilian employment, the MOD would not mobilise a Reservist to take advantage of his or her civilian skills except with the express agreement of the Reservist and their employer. This would not preclude a commander on operations ordering an already mobilised Reservist to carry out a task for which he or she was qualified, as a short-term expedient and where no other alternative existed.
- While the Reserve Forces Act 1996 set a limit on the time any Reservist could be mobilised (generally one year over a three-year period), the MOD believed that this level of mobilisation was "unsustainable". The MOD would therefore, where possible, limit the time that any Reservist would be mobilised to one year over a five-year period.
- The MOD would seek to provide 28 days' notice of mobilisation (21 days previously).

105. In April 2005, the MOD introduced a new remuneration package for Reservists deployed on operations.[77] Under the new scheme, if Reservists were mobilised and their civilian pay was higher than their Service pay, they could claim the difference, including certain benefits in kind. There were additional allowances to compensate for other losses.

106. Reservists had previously applied for allowances to cover the additional costs of deployment. The scheme required a Reservist to collate a great deal of evidence of personal earnings and expenditure in the short time available before deployment.

107. The NAO reported that the new scheme was "generous and less bureaucratic, and has been generally welcomed by the Reservists".

108. The NAO published a report on the MOD's use of the Reserve Forces in March 2006.[78] The NAO highlighted the finding from its survey of Reservists, that 41 percent of those intending to leave within one year agreed that inadequate support (relating to welfare and administration) played a part in their decision to leave. The NAO reported that, while the most used form of support was the unit's welfare representative, some units had no full-time welfare representative to support deployed Reservists and their families.

109. The NAO recommended that the MOD should focus its attention and resources on those welfare services which were most used by Reservists and their families, especially those provided by local Reserve units. In particular, it should:

- ensure that information supplied to Reservists' families was written in plain English;
- ensure that all TA regiments had adequate, dedicated welfare support, and that similar measures were available for Royal Naval Reservists and Royal Auxiliary Air Force Personnel; and
- improve the welfare support available to the families of deployed Volunteer Reservists who lived far away from the Reserve unit with which they trained and those Regular Reservists who had no unit.

110. The NAO also highlighted the lack of medical support for Reservists after their demobilisation, and recommended that the MOD should:

- undertake to provide medical treatment to all Reservists injured on operations to enable them to rejoin their civilian lives and careers as quickly as possible; and
- institute procedures for the diagnosis and treatment, through Defence Medical Services (DMS), of Reservists who develop mental health problems after the demobilisation process had been completed, as a result of an operational deployment.

111. In November 2006, the MOD established the Reserves Mental Health Programme (RMHP), to provide enhanced mental health care for current and former Reservists who had been demobilised since 1 January 2003 following deployment on an overseas operation. The RMHP is described in Section 16.2.

Increasing pressure on Service Personnel, 2004 to 2008

The decision not to deploy a headquarters and brigade to Iraq, June 2004

112. In mid-April 2004, the US made an informal request to the UK to send additional troops to Iraq.[79] Section 9.2 describes the Government's consideration of that proposal, which focused on the question of the contribution that those troops might make to achieving strategic success.

113. On 12 May, Lieutenant General Robert Fry, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Commitments) (DCDC(Commitments)), advised the Chiefs of Staff meeting that the effect of an additional deployment on "Harmony", previously identified as one of the main concerns, was now assessed to be "less stressing".[80]

114. Lt Gen Palmer wrote to Lt Gen Fry the following day:

> "You know my serious concerns about increasing the current level of commitments … At best, deployment of an additional brigade would reduce average unit separation from our target of 24 months to 12 months. Within this, some trades and individuals (including pinch point trades) will inevitably suffer considerably shorter tour intervals. While recruitment and retention currently remain satisfactory in most areas, the situation is potentially fragile not least because the risk is difficult to quantify."[81]

115. Lt Gen Palmer suggested that, if a "do nothing" option was judged to be unacceptable, the MOD should develop a "battlegroup only" option which would minimise "the stretch on our people". He also highlighted the difficulty of following a decision for an additional deployment with the announcement of planned measures to reduce manpower costs.

116. The Chiefs of Staff considered the US request for additional UK military assets to Iraq on 19 May.[82] Although they recognised there were risks and benefits to all the possible options, they agreed that the "best military option" was the deployment of HQ Allied Rapid Reaction Corps (HQ ARRC) and a brigade to replace US forces in the provinces of Najaf and Qadisiyah (option six).

117. During the meeting, Lt Gen Fry cautioned against the long-term effects on the Armed Forces of an additional deployment, which militated against that option. Lt Gen Palmer rehearsed the arguments he had set out in his 13 May minute to Lt Gen Fry, adding that he feared a "precipitant retention problem".

[82] Minutes, 19 May 2004, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

118. Gen Walker summarised the conclusion of the Chiefs of Staff, that option six was the "best military option" although "there was current doubt whether it could be delivered and sustained".

119. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary wrote to Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs on 25 May, setting out the Chiefs of Staff's advice.[83] Mr Hoon's Private Secretary stated that the option which would have the greatest effect and the least military risk was the deployment of HQ ARRC with an associated battlegroup, and a brigade to replace US forces. However, that option carried "significant penalties" including with regard to the wider impact on the Armed Forces.

120. Mr Hoon's Private Secretary set out those penalties. Deploying HQ ARRC with an associated battlegroup would further reduce tour intervals for many Service Personnel. Some 40 percent of infantry soldiers already had tour intervals of less than 12 months (against a guideline of 24 months). The deployment would reduce tour intervals for combat service support units to an average of less than 10 months; some units would have even less.

121. Reduced tour intervals would effect training and future capability, and also significantly reduce the time that Service Personnel and their families could spend together. The letter concluded:

> "For some, this may be the straw that breaks the camel's back and leads to experienced personnel leaving the Service."

122. Holding a brigade at readiness, even if it was not deployed outside the UK, would have even more significant impacts.

123. Given those penalties, and the fact that the situation in Iraq would evolve, Chiefs recommended that the Government should deploy HQ ARRC and an associated battlegroup now, but retain the brigade in the UK to be deployed if necessary.

124. In late May, Lt Gen Palmer asked the Chiefs of Staff to agree that he should develop a costed package of measures, focused on protecting untaken leave and enhanced allowances, to ameliorate the "worst consequences" of the increasing "operational load".[84] It was conceivable that an increase in the UK's commitment in Iraq would reduce tour intervals for some units, including medical units, to six months.

125. Lt Gen Palmer advised that the MOD did not have the management information to determine the extent to which increasing pressure on Service Personnel would translate into worsening retention, or when a "tipping point" in retention would be reached (work was under way to generate that information). Recruitment and retention were holding up well, but there was already evidence that people were starting to feel undervalued, particularly over the issue of pay.

126. Lt Gen Palmer concluded: "Every time we increase the operational load we increase the risk of a sudden, serious downturn in retention."

127. Section 9.2 describes discussions between Mr Blair, Ministers and senior officials on the deployment of additional troops between late May and mid-June. The extent to which personnel issues featured in those discussions is not clear.

128. On 15 June, Mr Blair, Mr Hoon, Mr Jack Straw (the Foreign Secretary), Mr Hilary Benn (the International Development Secretary), Mr Paul Boateng (Chief Secretary to the Treasury), Gen Walker and others met to discuss Iraq.[85] The meeting concluded that the UK:

> "… should not close the door to the possibility of sending further UK troops. We should keep the option open until around the time of the NATO Summit [28-29 June]. But there was no pressing military reason to send them, nor were we coming under much pressure from the US to do so."

129. On 24 June, Lt Gen Palmer provided an update on his work to develop a package of welfare measures for Mr Ingram, at his request.[86] Lt Gen Palmer advised that, with only a limited understanding of the relationship between operational tempo, separation and behaviour, he was taking a "broad view" of potential measures. These might include new financial incentives for groups under "critical stress", enhanced separation allowances, improvements to Service Accommodation and measures to protect untaken leave.

The decision to deploy troops to Afghanistan

130. In February 2005, Mr Hoon announced that the UK intended to switch its existing military effort in Afghanistan (around 1,000 Service Personnel based in northern Afghanistan) to Helmand province.[87]

131. Sir Nigel Sheinwald, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser from 2003 to 2007, told the Inquiry that "this was a proposal … which came from the Chiefs of Staff".[88]

132. The 21 July meeting of the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy (DOP) agreed in principle proposals presented by Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, for both the transfer to Iraqi control of the four provinces in southern Iraq for which the UK had security responsibility, and for the redeployment of the UK effort in Afghanistan from the north to Helmand province in the south, with an infantry battlegroup and full helicopter support.[89] Section 9.4 addresses the decision in detail.

133. The MOD paper which informed the decision advised that this option, which comprised "around 2,500 personnel in total", would:

> "Place greatest pressure on internal MOD resourcing. It would impact on the individual personnel deployed, particularly those in 'pinch-point' trades who may have been deployed on operations significantly more than Departmental guidelines advise; stretch the MOD's logistic capability at a time when force level reductions in Iraq cannot be guaranteed; and place strain on key enablers …"[90]

134. The MOD paper concluded with a brief report on plans for UK military drawdown in Iraq. It cautioned that:

> "… any substantial prolongation of the UK military commitment in Iraq at current force levels would have significant impact on individual personnel, the logistic feasibility of any commitment in Afghanistan, and overall resourcing."

135. The minutes of the DOP meeting do not indicate that there was any discussion of the specific impact on the Iraq campaign of the proposed deployment to Helmand.[91]

136. Gen Jackson was briefed, in advance of a 17 January 2006 meeting with the House of Lords Defence Group, that:

> "Depending on campaign progress in Iraq, there is potential for some 'concurrency challenges' in 2006/07. We must try to avoid 'overstretch', but not end up 'under stretched' – particularly when the competition for resources in Whitehall is so fierce."[92]

137. On the same day, Dr Roger Hutton, MOD Director Joint Commitments Policy, provided Dr Reid with advice on the timing and detail of the deployment of UK forces to Helmand province.[93] Dr Hutton advised that the Chiefs of Staff recommended the immediate deployment of the full Helmand Task Force (HTF). That recommendation was "crucially dependent" on fulfilling three criteria, including:

> "Achievability within current UK commitments. The HTF, taken together with the HQ ARRC deployment, calls on a variety of capabilities, and a lengthy and complex logistic tail. With the continued commitment to Iraq through 2006, this presents significant but manageable challenges, particularly for logistic enablers (including air transport). During this period we will still be able to undertake immediate contingency operations, but on a limited basis."

138. Annex C to Dr Hutton's briefing provided more detail on key issues, including the sustainability of the proposed deployment. It stated:

> "It remains the case that, with likely timelines for transition in Iraq, the HTF deployment is achievable without serious damage to Harmony, though certain niche trades and capabilities (particularly air transport) will be placed under increased, but manageable, stress."

139. The decision to deploy to Helmand was approved in Cabinet on 26 January.[94] The minutes record that Dr Reid "was looking carefully at where the burden on our troops could be reduced, including in Iraq and Bosnia and hoped to be able to report troop and cost reductions in coming months".

140. There were different views within the MOD over the effect of the deployment on personnel. Lt Gen Palmer, DCDS(Personnel) from 2002 to August 2005, told the Inquiry that, as he left post, he expressed his concern that deploying two brigades simultaneously (to Iraq and Afghanistan) would breach the Harmony Guidelines and the Defence Planning Assumptions, and was "too big a risk".[95]

141. Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary from 2001 to 2005, told the Inquiry:

> "I was apprehensive [about the deployment of UK forces to Helmand] and I made my concerns known to my planning staff and to the Chiefs of Staff. I think their view was that they could do it and it was manageable … since it was [the Chiefs of Staff] who would actually have to ensure they could do this, I did not press my objections fully."[96]

142. The impact of the decision on the availability of key equipment capabilities for Iraq is addressed in Section 14.1.

143. UK troops began to deploy to Helmand in May 2006.

Concern that the Army is "running hot", autumn 2006

144. In August 2006, concerns emerged over the treatment of injured Service Personnel being treated on civilian wards at Selly Oak hospital in the UK, and the adequacy of the welfare package provide to them and their families. The concerns are described in Section 16.2.

145. General Sir Richard Dannatt, Commander-in-Chief Land Command, wrote to Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, on 31 August setting out his most serious concerns.[97] His letter focused on the pressures on Service Personnel:

> "… as an Army, we are running hot, and our operational deployments are well above planned levels set out in current Defence Planning Assumptions … you should be aware that, in my opinion, the demands of the organisation are currently greater than our ability to provide satisfactorily for the needs of the individuals … Quite properly, we often talk about an implied contract – the 'military covenant' – that as an Army we have with our soldiers and their families and I fear that it is somewhat out of balance."

146. Gen Dannatt stated that the concerns might seem misplaced, given that current "outflow levels" of personnel (which he described as the classic gauge of morale) were low. But the cumulative effect of the high tempo of operations, short tour intervals, hectic training and activity between tours, and under-manning gave rise to "a severe risk akin to a cliff-edge experience".

147. Gen Dannatt identified several pre-emptive actions to prevent any increase in outflow, including:

> "Away from the field, I sense that basic pay for our more junior people is becoming an issue, as are some allowances, particularly those that are related to operational deployment. I am not at all sure that a take home pay of £1,150 a month is fair return for a month's work in Helmand or Basra. But it is the standard of both single and family accommodation when our people are back home that is probably the most emotive issue …"

148. Improvements in those areas would require a "modest shift" of resources from the Equipment Programme into the Short-Term Programme.

149. Gen Dannatt took up post as Chief of the General Staff the following month.

150. Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry:

> "When the military covenant is in balance, then the engine [the Army] can do a lot of work. When the covenant is out of balance, we have problems. I think we progressively got out of balance as the amount of work we were being asked to do increased through 2005 and 2006.
> "I say this not in any shape or form as a criticism of any of my predecessors, but merely as a reflection of the additional work that we were being asked to do as a consequence of decisions taken to stay in Iraq until we had successfully completed our operations there, but also take on Afghanistan as well.

---

[97] Letter Dannatt to Browne, 31 August 2006, [untitled].

> "The way to bring the covenant back into balance was to make sure we were expending sufficient resources on looking after the legitimate needs of individuals, soldiers and their families in terms of their pay allowances, accommodation, and the equipment … you would want to give these people.
> "That's where I think we were deficient. That's where we had to work quite hard to get it back in balance. I know I said in 2006 the army was running hot. That is correct … I think we were getting quite close to a seizing-up moment in 2006."[98]

151. The Inquiry asked Gen Dannatt whether work to bring the military covenant back into balance should not have begun earlier.[99] He told the Inquiry that he had no criticism of his predecessor, and that it was:

> "… often easier to start something at the start of an appointment when you have had the chance to survey the landscape … and coming from the position of Commander-in-Chief … with time to go round the Army, [I] could sense both at home and abroad the pressures building on soldiers and their families and deciding something had to be done."

Introduction of the Operational Allowance

152. Mr Browne's Private Secretary wrote to No.10 on 9 October, setting out proposed new arrangements for supporting Service Personnel on operations.[100] The letter reported that, to reflect the current, high operational tempo and provide an immediate boost to the lowest paid Service Personnel, Mr Browne had agreed with Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Government would introduce a tax-free Operational Allowance of £2,400 for all Service Personnel who completed a six-month tour in either Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans or certain other operations. Proportional amounts would be paid to those who completed shorter tours. The Allowance would be backdated to 1 April 2006.

153. The MOD had considered offering tax-free pay while on operations, but had concluded that this would not target the lowest paid and would be difficult to administer.

154. The letter also advised that the MOD would discuss the scope for abating Council Tax charges for Service Personnel deployed on operations with the Department of Communities and Local Government (DCLG). The failure of Local Authorities to exercise discretion on those charges was a "regular complaint".

155. The letter also advised that the free telephone call allowance would be raised from 20 to 30 minutes a week.

156. In his autobiography, Gen Dannatt described the Operational Allowance as the product of "some journalistic pressure and keen discussions with the Treasury".[101] He also described it as the beginning of his campaign to "improve the soldiers' lot".

157. Mr Browne announced the introduction of the Operational Allowance on 10 October.[102]

158. Mr Browne raised the issue of Council Tax charges for deployed Service Personnel with Ms Ruth Kelly, the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government, on 19 October.[103] MOD and DCLG officials subsequently met to explore options for abating Council Tax charges. The MOD's preferred option was a statutory discount of 25 percent (which would equate to a discount of £132 based on the average Council Tax bill).

159. Mr Browne announced in September 2007 that Service Personnel serving in Iraq and Afghanistan would receive a £140 rebate on their Council Tax bill (based on a six-month tour).[104]

Reports on recruitment and retention

160. The NAO published a report entitled Recruitment and Retention in the Armed Forces in November 2006.[105] The report stated that, at July 2006, the trained strength of the Armed Forces stood at around 180,690 Service Personnel, a shortfall of some 5,170 (2.8 percent) against the MOD's estimated requirement.

161. This figure masked significant shortages in 88 "pinch point" trades, where there was insufficient trained strength to perform operational tasks while enabling the Harmony Guidelines to be met. While 14.5 percent of the trained strength of the Army had exceeded the Harmony Guidelines at some point in the previous 30 months, this percentage rose to more than 33 percent for some pinch point trades.

162. The NAO concluded:

- Although the Armed Forces had consistently operated at or above the most demanding combination of operations envisaged by the Defence Planning Assumptions (DPAs) since 2001, and the MOD expected that this would continue to be the case for some time, the Armed Forces' manning requirements had not been adjusted to reflect the current levels of activity. The NAO reported that, while the MOD accepted that operating at that level could result in it placing additional strains on its people, the DPAs were guidelines only and were not intended to constrain decisions taken on the employment of the Armed Forces.

[105] National Audit Office, Recruitment and Retention in the Armed Forces, November 2006.

- There were signs that the numbers of Service Personnel choosing to leave the Armed Forces early were beginning to increase for some key groups.
- A variety of factors influenced Service Personnel in their decisions to leave the Services, but workload, separation and the impact on family life were key factors.
- Service Personnel considered that the increased operational tempo had led to heavier workloads and more separation from families.

163. The NAO reported that the MOD was successfully using a range of short-term measures (including financial incentives) to improve retention and alleviate under-manning.

164. The NAO also reported that the MOD was facing current and future challenges to its ability to recruit sufficient numbers of new entrants as a result of demographic changes, changing attitudes to careers, and negative publicity affecting public perceptions of the Armed Forces. The MOD was taking steps to respond to each of those challenges.

165. The NAO made a number of recommendations, including:

> "The Department should review the overall manning requirements within individual operational pinch point trade groups to determine whether they are set at sufficient levels to support enduring operational commitments.
> "The Department is constrained in its ability to reduce the operational tempo, which is impacting on personnel, but should look to investigate measures to provide greater stability and certainty of work patterns for personnel between operational deployments. Whilst recognising the limitations in how much workload can be reduced, the Department should look to improve its ability to let serving personnel know their work patterns over a longer time horizon."

166. Mr Bill Jeffrey, MOD Permanent Under Secretary, responded to these conclusions later that month in his evidence to the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) during its consideration of the NAO's report.[106] He argued that frequency of deployment was only one factor in people's decisions to stay or leave, and that polling and opinion survey evidence suggested that it was not quite as significant a factor as it might appear.

167. Mr Jeffrey told the PAC that he agreed with the view expressed by Ministers, that the Armed Forces were "stretched quite significantly, by the combination of deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan with other things", but not overstretched. He described overstretch as the inability of the Armed Forces to fulfil the tasks allocated to them.

---

Uncorrected transcript of Oral Evidence given by Mr Bill Jeffrey CB, Permanent Secretary, Mr Chris Baker OBE and Brigadier Stephen Andrews CBE, Ministry of Defence.

168. He also stated that there was not a direct link between the MOD's Defence Planning Assumptions and the "degree of stretch". Each operation was different and required different capabilities. Deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan had stretched different capabilities to different degrees; it was a "matter of military judgement" whether the Armed Forces were overstretched. Manning requirements (which flowed from the Defence Planning Assumptions) would be reviewed at the next spending review.

169. In early March 2007, Gen Dannatt wrote to Mr Browne:

> "Two overall themes dominated my introductory letter [of 31 August 2006]: the Army is running hot; and the 'military covenant' is out of balance. I am pleased to say that I think both these concerns are now well understood across the Department and, importantly, we are taking steps to address both. Nevertheless … the level of operational commitments is still well above Defence Planning Assumptions and looks set to remain so for some years. There is now an acceptance, however, that the Army is effectively fully operationally committed and hence any rebalance between theatres – as we will undertake this year in Iraq and Afghanistan – has to be a 'zero sum'…"[107]

170. Gen Dannatt:

- welcomed the Operational Allowance and the recent pay award which together sent Service Personnel a "powerful message" on how highly they were valued;
- confirmed that the "general care" provided to casualties was, slowly, improving; the issue would continue to require constant, senior level attention; and
- restated his concerns that there was a risk of a "cliff-edge fall" in Army manning (although retention was holding up, recruitment was falling).

171. The PAC published its report on recruitment and retention in the Armed Forces in June 2007.[108] It echoed the conclusions and recommendations of the NAO's November 2006 report. The PAC reported that:

> "Deployments overseas have been more frequent because the Department has been operating above Defence Planning Assumptions for several years and manning levels have not kept pace with commitments … Decisions about whether the Armed Forces can undertake operations above the Assumptions are matter of military judgement. The Department intends to review [the] Defence Planning Assumptions and the funding of the Armed Forces in the light of the demands placed on them, as part of the next Comprehensive Spending Review."

[107] Minute CGS to SofS [MOD], [undated], [untitled].
[108] Thirty-fourth Report from the Public Accounts Committee, Session 2006-2007, Recruitment and Retention in the Armed Forces, HC43.

172. The PAC concluded:

> "The increasing frequency of deployments on overseas operations and time away from home are factors causing people to leave the Armed Forces. More than 15 percent of Army Personnel are away from home more often than is planned for under the Department's 'Harmony' Guidelines which are being consistently broken. The Department has little scope to reduce the operational tempo which is impacting on personnel but in case of enduring operations, such as those in Iraq and Afghanistan, it needs to provide people with greater stability of work patterns.
> "There are indicators of overstretch in specific areas, such as the severe shortfalls in personnel in some specialist trades, such as nurses, linguists and leading hands, and the routine breaking of harmony guidelines. The longer this situation continues the more it will begin to affect operational capability. The Department maintains that the Armed Forces are stretched, but not overstretched, and would only be overstretched if there was a failure to meet military commitments. But the Department also needs to ascertain the 'tipping points' where the degree of stretch itself precipitates the loss of scarce skills, putting operational capability at risk."

173. The Inquiry asked AM Pocock what he understood by the concept of "overstretch".[109] He told the Inquiry:

> "This is a subject where it is easy to let the heart rule the mind. If we are going to be completely objective about it, I would say there are two things … can we retain our people? And … are we doing them long-term harm? The first one, for virtually the whole period of the 2000's, certainly up to 2007, retention was virtually static. The Services were short of people, yes, but that was largely down to recruitment issues …
> "On the subject of, 'Were we doing our people harm?' we didn't know, but we were looking really hard [at that issue] …"

174. Vice Admiral (VAdm) Peter Wilkinson, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel) from 2007, added that, in his view, the Harmony Guidelines provided a useful, objective measure of the degree of stretch:

> "I think they [the Harmony Guidelines] were a very good check on the department to make sure they understood, perhaps better than before, what actually they were asking of their people."[110]

[109] Public hearing, 19 July 2010, pages 70-71.
[110] Public hearing, 19 July 2010, page 72.

175. Lt Gen Mans told the Inquiry:

> "… recruiting is quite a complex area, so although … on balance, I think Iraq was positive [for recruitment], there were some other issues which made recruiting more difficult. At this stage, the economy in the country was doing very well and, therefore, unemployment was comparatively low. Therefore, we were competing for recruits in quite a difficult market in that respect. There were other issues associated with the phrase that has been used before, 'gatekeepers', parents and teachers. Were they actually going to encourage either their children or their pupils to join the military? Well, on balance, they probably weren't, in terms of that sort of overall perception. So overall, you had to take into consideration all these other rather complex factors, because the army was under-recruited during the period in question."[111]

The impact of operations on the Harmony Guidelines

176. The MOD told the Inquiry that, since 2002, the Armed Forces had been consistently operating at or above the level of concurrency defined in SDR 98.[112] That had "inevitably constrained" their ability to meet Harmony Guidelines particularly for Service Personnel in "Pinch Point specialist trades".

177. The MOD provided the Inquiry with figures for the percentage of Service Personnel in each Service for whom the Harmony Guidelines on Individual Separated Service were breached between 2002 and 2009; these figures are presented at the end of this Section.[113] The Navy's Guidelines were breached in respect of less that 1 percent of Navy Personnel in each of the years covered by the Inquiry. The Army's Guidelines were breached in respect of over 18 percent of Army Personnel in early 2004 (the first period for which data is available), falling to 10 percent in early 2007. The RAF's Guidelines were breached in respect of between 2 and 10 percent of RAF Personnel over the period covered by the Inquiry.

178. Professor Christopher Dandeker, Professor of Military Sociology at King's College London and Co-Director of the King's Centre for Military Health Research, told the House of Commons Defence Committee in March 2008:

> "… so far as our own research is concerned … I think that the Harmony Guidelines have been well constructed because the evidence suggests that if you stay within them they [Service Personnel] do not suffer; if you go beyond them there is a 20 to 50 percent likelihood that they will suffer in terms of PTSD [Post Traumatic Stress Disorder]."[114]

179. In his evidence to the Inquiry, AM Pocock questioned whether Professor Dandeker was right to suggest that the Harmony Guidelines were an appropriate basis for assessing the effect of operational deployment on individuals.[115] The Guidelines had been derived in a straightforward way from the planning assumptions used in SDR 98 ("what operations have we got? How many people have we got? … that means that they can spend this long away"). AM Pocock's focus had been on the broader relationship between time deployed on operations and the risk of mental health issues.

180. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that, while his "prime concern" with regard to reducing tour intervals was for individuals, he was also concerned that reduced tour intervals could affect operational capability, as units would not be able to undertake collective training and other development and preparatory activities.[116]

Rebuilding the military covenant

181. In September 2007, in response to growing concerns that the military covenant was being steadily undermined, the Royal British Legion (RBL) launched its "Honour the Covenant" campaign.[117] The RBL argued that the covenant was being breached with respect to three key issues:

- the operation of the Armed Forces Compensation Scheme;
- healthcare and welfare support for serving Service Personnel, their dependants and veterans; and
- support for bereaved families at inquests.

182. In July 2008, partly in response to that campaign and the support it generated, the Government published a command paper entitled The Nation's Commitment: Cross-Government Support to our Armed Forces, their Families and Veterans (known as the Service Personnel Command Paper).[118] The paper was underpinned by two principles:

- to end any disadvantage that armed service imposes upon Service Personnel, their families and veterans; and
- to better support and recognise those who have been wounded in the service of their country.

183. The paper covered a wide range of topics: compensation, health, housing, education and skills, transport, support for families, benefits, careers and pay.

184. Mr Bob Ainsworth, the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, described the production of the Command Paper to the Inquiry as an:

> "… opportunity … to get for the first time at every single area of Government and deal with the things that had never been given the importance that they had been given before. There are lots of ways in which Government accidentally, local Government and central Government, discriminates against our Armed Forces because of the juxtaposition of the way that services are delivered and the way that we make them work and the way that we keep moving them around … So in the Services Personnel Command Paper what I wanted to try to do was sweep up as many of those complaints as there were, analyse them, see whether or not there was a reality to them and have them dealt with as a one-off process, but set up an ongoing process."[119]

185. Mr Ainsworth went on to describe how the Command Paper was used to co-ordinate the Government's response to veterans' needs, including on issues which had not been explicitly considered in the paper:

> "We had the Prime Minister's stamp on the Service Personnel Command Paper. We were able to use that as we went round different departments and say 'This is the Government's intent' …
> "I had problems from different Departments, but that's understandable … Government tends to work in silos … So you have to go political in order to get those things sorted out."[120]

186. VAdm Wilkinson told the Inquiry that the implementation of the Command Paper had been challenging, but that progress had been made:

> "The challenges were that there was very little new money attached to the proposals and therefore, to gain the support of other Government departments was very difficult … the second challenge was to make the gains made enduring. I think we have achieved both of those, in that other Government departments were made to change their plans and programmes to take account of the Command Paper …"[121]

187. In May 2010, the new Government committed to "work to rebuild the Military Covenant".[122]

188. An independent Task Force on the Military Covenant, chaired by Professor Hew Strachan, was established in summer 2010 to inform that work.[123] The Terms of Reference of the Task Force were to identify innovative ways in which the Government, and society as a whole, could fulfil its obligation to rebuild the covenant.

189. The Government published a written Armed Forces Covenant in May 2011.[124] The Covenant incorporated a number of the Task Force's recommendations. The Covenant stated that members of the Armed Forces should expect respect, support and fair treatment in return for the sacrifices they made on behalf of the nation. The Covenant set out two core principles:

- No current or former member of the Armed Forces, or their families, should be at a disadvantage compared with other citizens in the provision of public and commercial services.
- Special consideration was appropriate in some cases, particularly for those who had been injured or bereaved.

190. These core principles were enshrined in law in the Armed Forces Act 2011.[125] The Act did not create legally enforceable rights for Service Personnel, but required the Defence Secretary to report annually to Parliament on the Covenant with a particular focus on four areas: healthcare, education, housing and the operation of inquests.

191. The Inquiry's conclusions and lessons on the pressures on Service Personnel and the support provided to them and their families are set out in Section 16.4.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- the arrangements for providing medical care to Service Personnel;
- the provision of medical care and welfare support for seriously injured Service Personnel and their families; and
- the support provided for veterans.

2. The welfare support provided to Service Personnel and their families is addressed in Section 16.1.

3. The preparations made for repatriating the bodies of those who lost their lives serving on Op TELIC, how their deaths were investigated, and the support provided for bereaved families are addressed in Section 16.3.

4. The decision to deploy to Helmand province in Afghanistan, and the implications of that decision, are addressed in Section 9.

System for providing medical care for Service Personnel

5. The healthcare system in the UK comprises three tiers:

- Primary care is provided at the first point of consultation, including by General Practitioners (GPs).
- Secondary care is provided by medical specialists who do not usually have first contact with patients, including in a hospital. It includes acute care.
- Tertiary care is specialised consultative healthcare, for example for cancer management.

6. Primary care for Service Personnel in the UK and Service base areas overseas is provided by the MOD's Defence Medical Services (DMS).[1]

7. Secondary care for Service Personnel is generally provided within the National Health Service (NHS).

8. Following the closure of military hospitals in the 1990s, the Government established five MOD Hospital Units (MDHUs) within NHS Trusts. MDHUs are not discrete military wards or units, but comprise medical Service Personnel (including substantial numbers of Reservists) integrated into a host NHS Trust. MDHUs:

- provide accelerated access for elective referrals of Service Personnel, to meet operational requirements; and
- allow medical Service Personnel to develop and maintain their skills.

9. In April 2001, the MOD established the Royal Centre for Defence Medicine (RCDM) within the University Hospital Birmingham Foundation Trust (UHBFT), as "a centre of military medical excellence, with academic, teaching and clinical roles".

10. During the period covered by the Inquiry, the main receiving centre for casualties evacuated from operational theatres was RCDM Selly Oak (one of the hospitals within the UHBFT).[2]

11. If Selly Oak was unable to cope with the flow of casualties, the Government could activate the Reception Arrangements of Military Personnel (RAMP) plan, engaging the wider NHS in the treatment of military casualties.

12. Military patients requiring further rehabilitation once released from hospital might be referred to the Defence Medical Rehabilitation Centre (DMRC) at Headley Court in Surrey, the principal medical rehabilitation centre run by the Armed Forces.[3] DMRC Headley Court also accepted direct admission from hospitals, and most combat casualties were referred directly to DMRC Headley Court from RCDM Selly Oak.

13. DMRC Headley Court provided both physiotherapy and group rehabilitation for complex musculo-skeletal injuries, and neuro-rehabilitation for brain-injured patients.

14. Operation TELIC was the first major military operation after the closure of the military hospitals in the 1990s. Many medical Service Personnel were therefore withdrawn from NHS Trusts, and military casualties were treated in NHS Trusts.

15. Tertiary care for Service Personnel is provided by the NHS.

16. From 2002, the MOD reconfigured its mental health services to focus on community rather than in-patient services, including by establishing 15 military Departments of Community Mental Health (DCMH) throughout the UK to provide out-patient mental healthcare for Service Personnel.[4]

17. From 2004, in-patient mental healthcare was provided by The Priory Group of hospitals, through a contract with the MOD.

18. Those changes were in line with NHS best practice, which held that individuals should be treated in as normal as environment as possible, close to their units, families and friends.

19. The Ex-Services Mental Welfare Society (generally known as Combat Stress) runs three short-stay residential treatment centres for men and women who have served in the Armed Forces or the Merchant Navy. The MOD meets the cost of fees charged by Combat Stress for "remedial treatment" at the three centres.[5]

20. Veterans' healthcare is generally provided by the NHS. Charities and welfare organisations also play an important role.

Medical care during the combat phase of operations

Planning and preparing to provide medical care

21. In July 2002, the MOD defined three options for a UK contribution to US-led military operations in Iraq:

- Package 1 – an "in-place support package" using forces already in the region;
- Package 2 – an "enhanced support package" comprising Package 1 with additional air and maritime forces; and
- Package 3 – a "discrete UK package" based on deployment of an armoured division, in addition to the forces in Package 2.[6]

22. Those three options provided the broad framework for discussions within the UK Government until the end of 2002.

23. A Strategic Medical Estimate was prepared for the MOD's Strategic Planning Group on 1 September 2002.[7] The Estimate – which assumed an entry into Iraq from Turkey – set out the expected number of Role 3 hospital admissions from an operation in Iraq, as a basis for medical planning:

- 157 (best case) to 241 (worst case) battle casualties;
- 152 (best case) to 212 (worst case) casualties from chemical warfare;
- 15 percent of those exposed to biological warfare; and
- 34 Disease and Non-Battle Injuries (DNBI) a day.

24. The Estimate stated that 55 individuals a week would require medical evacuation back to the UK.

Structure of medical support to operations

Military medical support was organised in four tiers, on the basis of the medical capabilities and resources available:

- Role 1 (broadly equivalent to Echelon 1 for maritime forces) medical support was integral or allocated to a small unit, and included the capabilities for providing first aid, immediate lifesaving measures, and triage.
- Role 2 support was normally provided at larger unit level, and included pre-hospital care.
- Role 3 support was normally provided at Division level and above. It included specialist diagnostic resources, and specialist surgical and medical capabilities. Support would usually be provided in field hospitals and (as Echelon 3) in hospital ships.
- Role 4 support was the definitive hospital and rehabilitative care of patients. That would usually be provided in the UK.[8]

25. General Sir Kevin O'Donoghue, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Health) (DCDS(H)) from September 2002 to 2004, told the Inquiry that medical planning was "quite advanced" by the time he took up post.[9] Staffing plans were in place and gaps in medical equipment and supplies had been identified, although approval had not yet been received to begin procurement to fill those gaps.

26. On 31 October, Mr Blair agreed that the UK should offer Package 3 to the US on the same basis as Package 2, for planning purposes.[10]

27. In early December, an MOD official invited Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, to agree that the MOD should hold detailed talks with the Department of Health (DoH) on the withdrawal of Regular and Reserve medical personnel from the NHS, and on the reception of casualties under the RAMP.[11] Package 3 would require around 2,000 medical personnel, of whom approximately 60 percent would be Reservists. The majority of those Reservists would be working within the NHS; their withdrawal would have a "local impact". DoH was pressing the MOD for details on the withdrawal of medical Reservists.

28. The official also advised that the procurement of medical equipment through the Urgent Operational Requirement (UOR) mechanism to support Packages 0 (Special Forces only) and Package 1 was under way. The Treasury was expected to authorise procurement of medical equipment to support Package 2 shortly. The MOD's Directorate of Capability, Resources and Scrutiny (DCRS) had not yet approved the business case for the medical equipment to support Package 3; that approval, and the subsequent Treasury authority to commence procurement, was needed as soon as possible.

29. The official advised that in "about three months time" the DMS would have "minimised medical risk by being properly equipped in mission critical areas".

30. On 11 December, Gen O'Donoghue told the Chiefs of Staff that the DoH had been engaged on Iraq planning, and had responded "positively and pragmatically".[12]

31. The DCRS agreed the business cases for the medical modules (packages of equipment and supplies) to support Package 3 on 16 December.[13] The modules were expected to achieve "full capability in theatre" on 15 March 2003.

32. At the beginning of 2003, in the light of continued uncertainty on whether Turkey would agree to the use of its territory by Coalition ground forces, the focus of UK military planning shifted from the North to the South of Iraq (see Sections 6.1 and 6.2).

33. The Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) assessed that the shift made the UK medical mission "less demanding in terms of supporting manoeuvre".[14] A revised Estimate specified that the Role 3 medical support required:

- the Royal Fleet Auxiliary (RFA) Argus, as the Primary Casualty Receiving Facility (PCRF), with 100 beds;
- two 200-bed field hospitals deployed;
- a third 200-bed field hospital in reserve;
- casualty staging flights through Cyprus; and
- the augmentation of the Princess Mary Military Hospital in Cyprus.

34. RFA Argus deployed on 15 January and was operational in the North Arabian Gulf by mid-February.

35. Mr Alan Milburn, the Health Secretary, wrote to Mr Hoon on 10 March to inform him that the DoH was ready to activate the RAMP, when required.[15]

36. Mr Hoon was advised by PJHQ on 14 March that an "effective medical capability", scaled to the expected number of casualties, was now operational in theatre.[16] Arrangements were also in place for the aeromedical evacuation of casualties to the UK.

37. Gen O'Donoghue told the Inquiry that by 19 March, when military operations against Iraq began, there remained some "shortfalls" in medical modules:

> "We had worked out what equipment we needed. We were allowed to discuss that informally with industry in, I think, mid-November. We weren't allowed to place the orders until early to mid-December, which we did with £34m/£35m worth of UORS, and those came in between then and March.
> "Some items may not have arrived by March, but they came fairly shortly afterwards and we topped up the modules."[17]

38. Sections 6.3 and 13 describe the development and approval of UOR business cases within the MOD and discussions with the Treasury on funding UORs. A mechanism for funding UORs was agreed between Mr Hoon and Mr Brown on 23 September; the mechanism did not require individual UORs to be agreed by the Treasury. Mr Hoon agreed that the MOD could begin discussions with industry on the provision of UORs on 2 December.

39. Brigadier Alan Hawley, Commander Medical of the Joint Force Logistic Command during Op TELIC 1 (which covered the initial combat phase of military operations in Iraq), told the House of Commons Defence Committee in October 2003:

> "From where I was, no one informed me of any clinical care that was compromised by a lack of equipment. I have to say that it was very tight."[18]

40. Brig Hawley assessed that a number of factors had combined to produce that "rather tight, fraught situation", including the late release of money for UORs, a new process for building medical equipment modules, and a change in responsibility for medical supply from the medical to the logistical Command.

41. Vice Admiral Ian Jenkins, Surgeon-General from 2002 to 2006, agreed with Brig Hawley's assessment:

> "… I can categorically assure you that clinical outcomes [during Op TELIC 1] were uncompromised. Yes there were problems with supply, equipment and everything else, mobilisation of Reserves, support … but the clinical outcomes were first class. I can put my hand on my heart and say that nobody suffered inappropriately because of a lack of medical requirement."[19]

42. Lieutenant General Louis Lillywhite, the Director General of Army Medical Services from 2003 to 2005 and Surgeon General from 2006 to 2009, told the Inquiry that cost had not been an issue in providing medical care:

> "As far as care on operations are concerned, it is effectiveness that counts, not cost-effectiveness. As far as providing care for Servicemen was concerned, I was – I personally, and I have to say Ministers supported me – did not allow cost to be an issue. If it was required, it was provided."[20]

43. A July 2003 MOD report on Op TELIC 1 stated that the medical component of the deployment was fully staffed, with 2,800 medical staff including 760 Reservists.[21] Trained psychiatric staff were also deployed.

Arrangements for supporting mental health

44. Lt Gen Lillywhite described for the Inquiry, the Armed Forces' general approach to identifying and tackling mental health issues at the beginning of Op TELIC:

- using initial and subsequent training to identify individuals with less ability to withstand stress, and to help prepare people to withstand stress;
- training commanders to identify issues as early as possible; and
- deploying field psychiatric teams to help identify those "who had true psychological disability, that … needed care and evacuation or simply support and return to duty".[22]

45. Prior to deployment on Op TELIC, Royal Navy and Army units received a pre-deployment presentation by a psychiatrist or community psychiatric nurse (or non-medical personnel if medical personnel were unavailable).[23] As the RAF deployed as individuals rather than formed units, it produced an equivalent booklet for all deploying personnel.

46. The Services also prepared post-deployment stress prevention packages, comprising two handouts and a post-operational psychological briefing.

47. MOD demobilisation policy at the beginning of Op TELIC required that:

- At the end of an operational tour but while still in theatre, all individuals should attend a presentation and be given an information leaflet covering post-traumatic stress reactions and the problems that might be encountered on returning home to families. Families should be offered a presentation and information leaflets on the possible after-effects of an operational deployment.

- All personnel should undertake a period of "normalisation", lasting two to three days, before taking post-operational tour leave. It would usually be spent on routine duties. This requirement stemmed from the MOD's assessment that:
  - The immediate release of personnel after an operational tour could be a contributory factor to the likelihood of developing post-conflict syndromes.
  - Personnel should be given time to deal with issues raised by combat in the company of those who understood and had shared those experiences.[24]

48. This policy applied to Reservist as well as Regular Personnel.

49. Lieutenant General Anthony Palmer, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Personnel) (DCDS(Personnel)), wrote to General Sir Mike Jackson, Chief of the General Staff, on 23 April 2003, advising:

> "At this morning's Op COS meeting you mentioned concerns among some of the deployed Personnel that their return to the UK was being delayed because of the requirement for a period of 'normalisation' …
>
> "Ultimately the implementation of the overall policy guidance lies with PJHQ and the FLCs [Front Line Commands] … However, the lessons learned from the last Gulf Conflict in particular have demonstrated how important it is – not least in terms of demonstrating due diligence – that we are rigorous in adopting formal procedures to reduce the risks and incidence of psychological illness."[25]

Delivery of medical care

50. The MOD reported in July 2003 that more than 4,000 British patients had been treated in British field hospitals, and over 800 evacuated to the UK by air, during the deployment and combat phases of Op TELIC.[26] The majority of those patients had suffered disease and non-battle injuries.

51. Around 200 Iraqi Prisoners of War and 200 Iraqi civilians had also been treated in British medical facilities.

52. The number of admissions to Role 3 hospitals during Op TELIC 1 are set out in the table below.[27]

53. In July, PJHQ assessed that medical support during Op TELIC had been "a success by any measure".[29] The aeromedical evacuation of casualties (by VC 10 to Cyprus then by civilian aircraft to the UK) had been particularly effective.

54. PJHQ reported that some evacuated Service Personnel were nursed in NHS hospitals without other military patients and had therefore lacked "peer support".

55. The issue of treating injured Service Personnel in NHS hospitals, and on civilian wards, would come to prominence in 2006.

56. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that in the early part of Op TELIC, the MOD did not have the data to make an objective assessment of the effectiveness of emergency care.[30] Analysis of data relating to later phases of Op TELIC indicated that UK medical support was achieving a significantly greater than expected survival rate.

57. Gen O'Donoghue told the Inquiry that the DMS drew two major lessons from its experience during the invasion:

- It needed more Regular medical Personnel, to take account of the limited time that any individual could spend in theatre given their NHS commitments and the need to retain "medical dexterity".
- UORs allowed DMS to respond to particular threats and secure the latest equipment, but it needed more equipment and supplies "on the shelves" ready to deploy.[31]

58. Lt Gen Lillywhite described a number of changes in the provision of medical care after Op TELIC 1.[32] During Op TELIC 1, the MOD generally used armoured ambulances to move casualties from aid posts to medical regiments and a mixture of ambulances and helicopters to get from (Role 2) medical regiments to hospital. From Op TELIC 2, the military generally used helicopters to move from the point of wounding or the aid post to hospital.

Support for injured Service Personnel and their families

60. The number of casualties and aeromedical evacuations relating to Op TELIC are set out in the table below.[33] The figures for 2003, 2004 and 2005 reflect military casualties only; the figures for 2006 onwards reflect military and civilian casualties.

Establishing a Military Managed Ward at Selly Oak hospital

61. MOD Ministers and senior military officers made regular visits to injured Service Personnel, both in the UK and Iraq.[34]

62. Mr Blair made a private visit to RCDM Selly Oak in February 2005.

63. Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, visited RCDM Selly Oak on 15 August 2006.

64. Lt Gen Freddie Viggers, the Adjutant General, visited RCDM Selly Oak on 21 August.[35] He reported on 22 August that:

- The quality of clinical care was excellent.
- Morale among military medical staff was “fragile”, due to under-manning, the joint military/civilian structure, and the physical environment.
- Wounded soldiers wanted to be looked after in a military environment “within which they can be with their mates, be looked after by named military nurses and be treated like soldiers (including security)". Enhancing the military environment was "essential" for soldiers' physical and psychological recovery.

- It was iniquitous that soldiers being treated at the RCDM Selly Oak lost their entitlement to the Operational Welfare Package (OWP) and some other allowances. The OWP would provide much of the support (including TVs, DVDs and telephone calls) that were currently being provided from "assorted non-public funds" or paid for by the soldiers themselves.

65. Lt Gen Viggers identified a number of immediate actions, including:

- informing wounded personnel what the MOD was planning to do to create a military environment;
- starting to create that military environment, by putting soldiers together in one area of a ward; and
- extending the OWP to patients.

66. On 23 August, General Sir Timothy Granville-Chapman, Vice Chief of Defence Staff (VCDS), reported that Mr Browne had given him a "very thorough de-brief" on his 15 August visit to RCDM Selly Oak.[36] Key points included:

- Mr Browne was "very seized" with the need for injured personnel to recover in a military environment, and was clear that a "military ward solution" was needed.
- Mr Browne was "very much behind" Lt Gen Viggers' recommendation that the OWP should be extended to injured personnel.

67. The following week, the MOD's Service Personnel Board (SPB) considered a package of financial and non-financial measures which aimed to replicate the effects of the OWP for in-patients, whether at the RCDM or elsewhere.[37] The SPB was advised that, although the package was "work in progress", Gen Granville-Chapman was clear that the proposal "cannot bear the delay inherent in the usual staff circulations".

68. The package, which included the payment of Incidental Expenses to in-patients and an extension to the Dangerously Ill Forwarding of Relatives (DILFOR) scheme, was agreed and implemented by the end of September.[38]

69. The extension of the DILFOR scheme provided for two close family members to visit the permanent residence of a hospitalised Service person, so that they could support the family members there. The DILFOR scheme was extended again in 2008 to allow multiple journeys to and from a hospital if the family was unable to remain at the bedside.[39]

70. In early October, there was considerable press coverage of alleged verbal abuse of military patients at Selly Oak hospital by members of the public.[40]

71. On 24 October, the SPB assessed that action to establish a Military Managed Ward (MMW) at RCDM Selly Oak was "well in hand", and that:

> "Security had been the biggest issue, and a weekly meeting was now in place between the local police (who have security primacy), MOD Police, RCDM and NHS Staffs."[41]

72. General Sir Richard Dannatt made his first visit to RCDM Selly Oak as Chief of the General Staff (CGS) in December.[42] He reported to Air Chief Marshal Jock Stirrup, Chief of the Defence Staff, that while progress was being made, the "whole 'system' for dealing with those wounded on operations, once back in the UK, has been allowed to sink to such a woefully inadequate level that the task to rebuild it … is huge". He identified two underlying problems:

- RCDM was principally focused on delivering trained medical staff, rather than treating the wounded.
- The MOD had implicitly accepted that the NHS level of care was "good enough" for Service Personnel. That was reasonable for clinical care, but not for other issues such as the nurse to patient ratio, access to specialist units, and food.

73. Gen Dannatt concluded that efforts to establish an MMW needed to be re-invigorated and, more fundamentally, that the MOD should "operationalise" Selly Oak as a Role 4 military medical facility.

74. The MMW reached Initial Operating Capability in December 2006 and Full Operating Capability in July 2007, when it comprised 39 medical Service Personnel (compared with 12 in summer 2006):

- 11 orthopaedic nurses;
- 15 general nurses; and
- 13 healthcare assistants.[43]

75. Gen Dannatt visited the MMW at Selly Oak on 22 June 2007 and reported that it was "at last moving in the right direction".[44] Clinical care, welfare support and administration were better led and co-ordinated, and there was a greater sense of urgency, although "we should not take any satisfaction in reaching what is only the basic level of care that our wounded servicemen deserve".

76. The challenge now was to ensure that clinical, welfare and administrative support was delivered to injured personnel in a holistic manner wherever they were in the healthcare system.

77. In February 2008, the House of Commons Defence Committee described the clinical care for Service Personnel injured on operations as "second to none".[45] The Committee commented, however, that "many of the improvements … are relatively recent, and there has been a great deal of change over the past 18 months. The MOD should not be complacent: they have had to learn important lessons and it is now clear that the picture at Selly Oak was not always so positive."

78. Specific issues cited in the report included the provision of toiletries and basic clothing for Service Personnel, travel assistance for the families of injured Service Personnel, and accommodation for the relatives of parents. The report stated that improvements were taking place, but "some of the slack had been taken up by welfare organisations".

79. Mr Adam Ingram, Minister for the Armed Forces from 2001 to 2007, told the Inquiry:

> "It became very clear early on that there was a problem at Selly Oak. It wasn't the question of the quality of the medical care. It was the fact that they were in mixed [military/civilian] wards. You had soldiers who had been attended to by civilian nurses, civilian doctors and in the next bed there may well be a civilian injured person or old person.
>
> "That became a big issue. My instinct initially was … that if I was injured, I just wanted the best medical care …
>
> "But, as a result of a number of visits, Ministerial visits, it became abundantly clear we needed to do other things. So progressively, the number of military personnel, in terms of the medical care, changed …"[46]

80. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry:

> "It quickly became apparent that returning casualties actually wanted to be looked after by the military …
> "Although at no stage … was the clinical care of casualties coming back from Iraq compromised, there was an unhappiness amongst the patients themselves and their relatives about the lack of military involvement in both their care, although actually much more so in their welfare support.

> "So there was a period when the plan, which was working, was not in accord with what people had expected or wanted. So that led to a significant period of adverse press and internal adverse press as well, whilst both the medical services, but even more so the chain of command, organised themselves to actually provide that military bubble around the care in the hospital."[47]

81. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that, while establishing a "military bubble" – such as the MMW – around a military patient did not improve the quality of clinical care, "one should not underestimate the beneficial impact upon recovery, upon family dynamics, and upon psychological wellbeing of actually being content".[48] He added that the importance of continuing to provide a military bubble during treatment was one of the main lessons learned by DMS and the MOD from Iraq.

Improvements at Headley Court

82. The facilities at DMRC Headley Court had been significantly enhanced by the end of Op TELIC, including through:

- the opening of a Complex Rehabilitation and Amputee Unit in June 2006: a contract was let to a private company that manufactured individually tailored prosthetics on site;[49]
- construction of a 30-bed temporary ward annex, which was brought into use in May 2007;[50]
- construction of a 58-bed staff and patient accommodation block (Wood House) in January 2009; and
- the opening of the Centre for Mental and Cognitive Health, to provide mental health and clinical psychology services, in spring 2009.

83. In May 2008, Ministers announced £24m in capital funding over four years for a Headley Court development programme. Over the first two years, this funding was mainly applied to the MOD contribution to the "Help for Heroes" rehabilitation complex (which was officially opened in June 2010) and a utilities upgrade for the whole site.

84. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that, while Headley Court was a "centre of excellence", it was also "the greatest area of risk in actually managing casualties".[51] The first risk area was its capacity:

> "We were seeing far more cases that needed in-patient care in beds than we had ever seen probably since Korea … and the capacity of Headley Court was not sufficient to have met it. Luckily, the building programme, the temporary ward, the relationships with the local planning authority, enabled us just to keep ahead of the surge. A close run thing, I think, but we kept ahead of the surge."

85. The second risk area was the building itself:

"Headley Court is a fine listed building, which had in essence for many years treated sports injuries, complex sports injuries, but not open wounds. What we have started doing in this conflict is starting rehabilitation ever earlier, with significant success. But it posed risk in the type of surroundings that they were being managed in, in that Headley Court was not set up to look after cases that were open wounds or complex medication that required ongoing non-rehabilitation specialist care."[52]

86. The Inquiry visited Headley Court in October 2010, and spoke to a number of members of staff and Iraq veterans. Members of staff told the Inquiry that it would be helpful if they were given more forewarning about deliberate operations with potential for high casualties.

87. In early October 2006, Gen Dannatt directed Major General Mark Mans, the Deputy Adjutant General (DAG), to lead an assessment of in-Service welfare provision to see where improvements could be made.[53] Gen Dannatt directed that the assessment should include discussions with the Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen and Families Association (SSAFA) on bringing back SSAFA Social Workers.

88. Maj Gen Mans replied to Gen Dannatt on 30 November, recommending that he should:

- invite the SSAFA to:
  - provide short-stay hostels for families at Selly Oak and Headley Court;
  - provide additional support for vulnerable Service leavers;
  - provide enhanced support for Service parents of children with disabilities and special needs; and
  - provide enhanced adoption services;
- enhance the current Army Welfare Service (AWS) structure with additional Civil Service Social Workers and Welfare Workers; and
- invite DCDS(Personnel) to organise a "wide-ranging, tri-Service, Ministerially-led" conference to increase understanding of welfare and healthcare support to the ex-Service community.

89. Maj Gen Mans advised that the AWS, like the rest of the Army, was "running hot". The "heavy burden" of operational commitments and increased casualties had led to a 20 percent increase in the AWS's workload over the past year. Using Civil Service (rather than SSAFA) Social Workers would give the AWS access to an established and trained delivery network with a national footprint. SSAFA could be best deployed to provide support on discrete activities to specific groups.

90. Lt Gen Mans advised colleagues in December 2006 that Gen Dannatt considered it was timely to hold a wide-ranging conference on welfare and aftercare provision for Service leavers and veterans, "[a]gainst a background of changing operational imperatives, high commitment levels and evolving welfare demands, as well as a steadily declining knowledge and consciousness amongst the public and in the media of military needs and expectations during and after service".[54]

91. The Tri-Service Welfare Conference was held in April 2007.[55]

92. Gen Dannatt wrote in his autobiography that although no major decisions were taken at the conference, "all those present were left in no doubt that those of us at the top of the organisation [the MOD] knew what the problems were, understood them, and had a determined commitment to tackle them".[56]

The role of charitable organisations

In the UK, charitable organisations have traditionally played an important role in providing care to Service Personnel and veterans, often working closely with the MOD, the NHS and the private sector.

Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that the MOD welcomed the involvement of charitable organisations (although it might not always agree with their approach):

> "They all have a desire to actually progress the care of Servicemen … and they actually contribute significantly to; one, promoting the cause of particularly the ex-Servicemen; secondly, they are quite good at challenging us on what we are doing or not doing; and thirdly, they often bring a degree of expertise or approach that we might not otherwise have recognised.
> "… it is a complex relationship but they are an essential part, in my view, of our society in terms of actually ensuring that veterans in particular, but to a lesser extent, serving soldiers, get the appropriate care that they require."[57]

In his autobiography, Gen Dannatt described how, in 2007, charitable organisations became increasingly involved in military medical and welfare issues, as the number of casualties in Iraq and Afghanistan grew and the "fragility of the … arrangements for our seriously injured become painfully apparent".[58] That fragility related not to clinical care, which was excellent, but to the broader support that was available to injured personnel and their families.

Gen Dannatt wrote that the increasing involvement of charitable organisations was, in his view, not a response to "a challenge thrown down by the Government, merely evidence that the nation was beginning to get behind its soldiers and their families".

Handling complex cases

93. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that survival rates improved significantly over the course of Op TELIC.[59] He also highlighted the increasing number of Service Personnel with "complex injuries" that would be seen in civilian life extremely rarely, and for which civilian medical and social services have not been set up to manage.

94. Lt Gen Lillywhite also told the Inquiry that since the start of the Iraq conflict, the MOD had taken a more flexible approach to determining the appropriate date for discharge, which now depended on the individual's circumstances.[60] He described that to be "a compassionate response to … very, very serious injuries and sometimes family situations".

95. A particular challenge was managing the transfer of care from the military system to the NHS, when an individual with complex injuries was discharged.[61] The military system was holding onto casualties for longer, and in some cases to a point where it did not have all the capability required to care for the individual. However, at that same point, the NHS was not set up to provide the comprehensive care that was required.
Lt Gen Lillywhite commented:

> "So arranging that care package requires individual persuasion, discussion, debate, with the local authorities in the place where that individual is at home. Of course, the issue of funding can then come into it …
> "So the ongoing care of the complex casualty is throwing up issues that we have not seen before."

96. Lt Gen Lillywhite suggested that individuals with complex injuries should be treated by the Government as a group with specific clinical needs, in recognition of their service and on clinical grounds to enable specialist care to be arranged and provided more consistently.[62] He subsequently stated:

> "I had general agreement when I was in office that that was what was required, but it needs giving effect to, and there are ongoing issues that can be only addressed in my view by treating them as a group … for example, giving them the advanced prostheses in the future, giving them access to new techniques that are becoming available as a result of research."[63]

Clinical developments during Op TELIC

The MOD told the Inquiry that it had identified five major "lessons" from the provision of medical care during Op TELIC, and had incorporated those lessons into its medical procedures.[64] The lessons were:

- Novel haemostatics. Experience during Op TELIC showed that control of catastrophic bleeding in the first 10 minutes after wounding led to a significant improvements in mortality and morbidity rates. New blood clotting agents, the Combat Applied Tourniquet, and an improved First Field dressing were introduced to arrest the flow of blood more effectively.
- Medical Emergency Response Teams (MERTs). Experience during Op TELIC led to the creation of Immediate Response Teams (IRTs), to deliver medical care at the point of wounding. The concept was developed into MERTs, which deliver consultant-led, pre-hospital emergency care.
- The introduction of a more capable "ground evacuation platform" (based on the Mastiff) which improved soldiers' confidence in the casualty evacuation chain and significantly improved the delivery of medical care during evacuation.
- The introduction of digital imaging which allowed casualties to be diagnosed more quickly and more accurately.
- The development of an enhanced system for capturing medical data from all parts of the operational medical chain which improved casualty care and treatment regimes.

The Inquiry asked Lt Gen Lillywhite what the MOD had learned from Op TELIC about trauma care.[65] Lt Gen Lillywhite highlighted three areas:

- how to save life at the point of injury, including through the use of haemostatic dressings and massive transfusion protocols;
- how to sustain the quality of life of seriously injured individuals into the long term; and
- pain management.

Lt Gen Lillywhite added that those advances, and others, were being transferred to civilian medicine.

Support for mental health

Research into the physical and psychological health of Operation TELIC personnel

97. Following a meeting of the Veterans Task Force on 10 April 2003, and as major combat operations in Iraq continued, Dr Lewis Moonie, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence, discussed with MOD officials the value of initiating a long-term study of the health of Op TELIC veterans.[66]

98. In early May, an MOD official asked Dr Moonie to agree that the UK Government should support a large-scale programme of research on the physical and psychological health of personnel deployed on Op TELIC.[67] The cost could not yet be precisely estimated, but could be around £3m.

99. The official commented that the UK Government had moved "far too late" to initiate research programmes after the 1990/1991 Gulf Conflict, leading to a loss of trust from veterans and the public:

> "By the time we [the Government] responded concern was widespread and the idea of a 'Gulf War Syndrome', for which there is still no scientific evidence, had taken root.
>
> "We therefore need to act early this time and put in place as soon as possible a robust programme of research … and respond as necessary."

100. Dr Moonie agreed that recommendation.[68]

101. The MOD subsequently commissioned the King's Centre for Military Health Research (the King's Centre) at King's College London to undertake a large-scale epidemiological study into the physical and psychological health of personnel deployed on Op TELIC.[69] The "primary objectives" of the study were:

- to assess the physical and psychological health of personnel deployed on Op TELIC in comparison with personnel not deployed on Op TELIC; and
- to ascertain whether an "Iraqi War Syndrome" had emerged following deployment, similar to the Gulf War Syndrome.

102. Secondary objectives included:

- to compare the health of Regular and Reservist Personnel; and
- to assess risk-taking behaviours (alcohol consumption and risky driving) in personnel deployed on Op TELIC.

103. In December 2003, the MOD published a report on lessons it had drawn from operations in Iraq.[70] The report provided a brief update on the King's College work, and concluded that "to date, we are not aware of any unusual pattern of ill-health in returning personnel".

104. The initial findings of the King's College research were published in May 2006.

Over-Arching Review of Operational Stress Management

The MOD completed its Over-Arching Review of Operational Stress Management (OROSM) in September 2004, and a second phase covering Training and Communications Strategies in April 2005.

The OROSM defined six steps in operational stress management:

- pre-service entry beliefs and attitudes;
- in-service training and promotion courses for career development;
- pre-deployment;
- operational deployment;
- post-operational recovery; and
- on discharge from the Armed Forces.

Implementation and delivery of operational stress management within that framework remained the responsibility of the individual Services.

The OROSM clearly identified operational stress management as a management, rather than a medical, responsibility.

Decompression

105. Over the course of Op TELIC, in addition to the requirement for a period of "normalisation" at the end of an operational tour, commanders increasingly opted for their units to undertake a formal period of decompression at the end of an operational tour, as part of post-operational stress management.[71]

106. Decompression involved "placing groups into a structured and – critically – monitored environment in which to begin winding down and rehabilitating to a normal, routine, peacetime environment". Any individual considered to be vulnerable to any form of post-operational stress should be identified, so that the appropriate support could be provided as the individuals passed through the demobilisation process.[72]

107. The MOD assessed that decompression was best suited to formed teams and units.[73] Where possible, units should include individual augmentees (including Reservists) in their decompression arrangements. In the cases of individuals who were not available for the decompression period, the "clinically relevant" elements of the decompression process could be covered by pre-departure briefings and the subsequent normalisation period.

108. For Army units on Op TELIC, decompression usually took place in Cyprus over a period of 36 hours.

109. The first formal period of decompression took place in 2004, at the end of Op TELIC 3.[74]

110. By July 2007, the MOD's policy was that formed units should have a period of decompression unless a formal application to opt out had been agreed by the chain of command.[75] Air Marshal (AM) David Pocock, the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel), advised Gen Granville-Chapman that, in the absence of evidence of "clinical efficacy", the policy was based on the "military judgement" that decompression promoted adjustment and re-integration into a normal environment.

111. In August 2010, the MOD produced an analysis of Op TELIC from a Land perspective.[76] The analysis stated that many units reported that individual augmentees and members of the TA could "fall between the cracks" and not carry out decompression. Some units reported that members of the TA could not remain with the unit during normalisation when it took place in the unit's barracks, and therefore went home.

112. The MOD concluded:

> "… a debate remains to be had about whether the main effort for Reservists should be to return them to civilian life as quickly as possible or extend their period in mobilised service to effect full normalisation … What is vital is to ensure that all TA Personnel are given adequate transition back to civilian life, and this includes important information on where to get assistance if he/she needs it. POSM [Post-Operational Stress Management] must continue through their chain of command."

[76] Report Land Command, 31 August 2010, 'Operations in Iraq: An Analysis from a Land Perspective'.

Variations in the level of support after an operational deployment

113. The Inquiry heard from a number of veterans and witnesses that the level of support received by personnel returning from Op TELIC varied significantly.

114. The Inquiry asked Lieutenant General Sir Alistair Irwin, Adjutant General from 2003 to 2005, whether he was aware of that variation and, if so, what was done to address it.[77] He told the Inquiry:

> "… we were aware that there were varying standards … That was obviously a worry because, where the standard was good, that was fine. Where the standard was not good, then something clearly needed to be done about it.
> "So there was a constant interchange between my people, who were producing the advice, the guidance, the policy, and the people who were actually delivering these things, which were … the welfare staffs … the field Army and the chain of command.
> "… there was, amongst us all collectively, a desire to deliver as good a product as we could for those who needed it but, when it boils down to it, when you have a complex machine that consists of over 100,000 individual people, you can be absolutely certain, no matter what it is that you do, that there will be people who one way or another don't live up to the standard required.
> "So much to the regret of all of us involved, there were unquestionably people who weren't looked after as well as they should have been. There is no doubt about that and each one of them represents, in some degree or another, a failure.
> "I hope, though … without in any way wanting to sound complacent about it, that that number was probably relatively small."

115. Lt Gen Irwin agreed that those individuals were more likely to have returned to environments without significant military support around them, including Reservists returning to civilian life and Regular Personnel living away from barracks.

116. Vice Admiral Peter Wilkinson, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel) from 2007, told the Inquiry:

> "Certainly, when we started the campaign, we were much more adept at looking after the large, formed units than we were on those individuals who had either gone out as single staff or on an augmentee basis.
>
> "I think, as we have gained greater experience of the operation and of the likely pressures on the troops, then we have become more adept and more proactive at looking after their likely needs."[78]

First reports from the King's Centre study

117. Professor Simon Wessely and Professor Christopher Dandeker presented the early findings of the King's Centre study to the 25 May 2005 meeting of the Service Personnel Board (SPB).[79] The record of the meeting reported:

> "The initial observations suggest that for Regulars, there was no Iraqi War syndrome, no increases in general mental health problems and PTSD [Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder], or increases in alcohol intake. These observations were different to Op GRANBY [the 1990/1991 Gulf Conflict]. For Reservists, there have been increases in general mental health problems and a doubling of PTSD, but no increase in alcohol intake."

118. Two papers from the King's Centre study into the physical and psychological health of personnel deployed on Op TELIC were published in May 2006.

119. The first paper concluded that for Regular Personnel, deployment to Iraq had not, so far, been associated with significantly worse health outcomes, apart from a modest effect on multiple physical symptoms.[80] There was, however, evidence of a clinically and statistically significant effect on the health of Reservists, in relation to PTSD symptoms, multiple physical symptoms, and general perceptions of health.

120. The second paper concluded that there had been no substantial increase in symptomatic ill-health amongst members of the Regular Armed Forces who had taken part in the invasion of Iraq, and there was no pattern suggestive of a new syndrome.[81] That finding was in contrast to the situation after the 1990/1991 Gulf Conflict, when a substantial increase in symptomatic ill-health had been observed.

121. On 16 May, Mr Tom Watson, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence, set the conclusions of the papers and the Government's response in a written statement to Parliament:

> "… a small but measurable number of Reservists (when compared either with Regulars who did deploy or Reservists who did not deploy) are showing some increased health effects as a result of deployment – particularly for common mental disorders (such as anxiety, depression and stress), post traumatic stress disorder and fatigue. It remains the case, though, that the reported rates of indicators of common mental ill-health for both Reservists and Regulars are broadly of the same order as found in the general UK population."[82]

122. Mr Watson described the issue of Reservists' mental health as the "key finding" of the study, advised that the Government was already monitoring the issue closely and looking at possible solutions, and announced that the Government would introduce an enhanced post-operational mental health programme for recently demobilised Reservists later in the year.

123. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that there might be several reasons why Reservists might suffer more from mental health issues:

- less preparatory training throughout their careers than Regular Personnel;
- a less supportive environment for the families of Reservists than for Regular Personnel;
- a less robust selection process; and
- an absence of "ongoing support from their peers" when Reservists left the military environment and returned to civilian life.[83]

124. The King's Centre study was extended in 2006 into a second phase (2007 to 2010), and broadened to include all subsequent Iraq deployments and deployments to Afghanistan.[84]

Reserves Mental Health Programme

125. In November 2006, in response to the findings of the King's Centre study, the MOD launched the Reserves Mental Health Programme (RMHP), to provide enhanced mental healthcare to current and former Reservists who had been demobilised since 1 January 2003 following deployment on an overseas operation.[85]

126. The RMHP provided a mental health assessment and, if appropriate, out-patient treatment at one of the MOD's Departments of Community Mental Health (DCMHs). In-patient treatment was provided through the NHS.

127. The MOD assessed that there could be, in the worse case, a "backlog" of 680 individuals (who had been demobilised since 1 January 2003 and who had concerns over their mental health), who would be referred to the RMHP when it launched.[86] Thereafter the RMHP was expected to receive 75 referrals a year.

128. A 2011 study concluded that the RMHP was an effective method of treatment for those who accessed it.[87]

Concerns over mental health issues, late 2006

129. Section 16.1 describes the concerns of General Sir Richard Dannatt, Chief of the General Staff (CGS) from August 2006, that the Army was "running hot" and the military covenant was out of balance.[88]

130. Gen Dannatt visited Iraq in late September 2006.[89] His report to Air Chief Marshal Jock Stirrup, Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS), highlighted the psychological welfare of Service Personnel as one area where action was required:

> "I was concerned to hear that there had been 99 referrals to the Field Mental Health Team from 20 Bde alone during their tour. This number seems high, though I suspect as people start returning to Iraq (or Afghanistan) for the third or fourth time it will not be atypical. I am aware … that we do not equip our soldiers as well as we might during their pre-deployment training for the combat stress of operations. I am discussing this with AG [the Adjutant General, Lt Gen Viggers], and we will shortly be taking steps to improve our commanders' understanding of, and ability to deal with, psychiatric casualties in theatre. I will ensure that this work informs DCDS(Personnel)'s Overarching Review of Operational Stress Management.
> "I am less sanguine, however, about what happens to psychological casualties evacuated back to UK – in the case of 20 Bde about 20 individuals. As I understand it, once in the UK these casualties are managed by The Priory, a civilian contractor, for psychiatric treatment. Not only do we tend to lose track of these casualties thereafter, but I feel intuitively that rustication from a military environment is hardly the best way to treat all but the very worst of our stress casualties. Indeed, experience from recent major conflicts tells us that soldiers suffering from combat stress are best treated in as military an environment as possible. Once the psychological props of discipline, esprit de corps, ethos and humour are removed, the road to recovery for stress casualties grows that much longer. Now that we have decided, quite rightly, to run RCDM Birmingham on more military lines,[90] we should at least ask ourselves similar questions over our care of psychiatric casualties."

131. Gen Dannatt subsequently tasked Major General Mark Mans, the Deputy Adjutant General (DAG), to address those concerns.[91]

132. Mr Ingram visited Iraq from 30 September to 1 October.[92] His Private Secretary reported that three concerns had been raised with Mr Ingram with regard to "psychiatric treatment":

- There was an "apparent upward trend (if not surge)" in the number of people requiring support in the second half of six-month tours.
- The US provided "significantly more in-theatre welfare/counselling support" than the UK (although the US deployed personnel for longer than the UK).
- Personnel evacuated back to the UK to receive treatment at The Priory had, from their unit's perspective, been "'lost' for weeks at a time".

133. Maj Gen Mans replied to Gen Dannatt on 30 November, advising that:

- The high level of psychiatric casualties being referred to the Field Mental Health Team (FMHT) was a positive feature rather than a cause for concern, as it reflected a willingness by personnel to consult the FMHT. The number of personnel evacuated from theatre was lower than might be expected from the number of referrals to the FMHT.
- The current system for providing care for personnel evacuated from theatre with mental health problems (treatment at The Priory and/or the MOD's Departments of Community Mental Health) conformed to psychiatric best practice. The recently activated RMHP would also help.
- Regarding commanders' understanding of and ability to deal with psychiatric issues, the OROSM had recommended that personnel receive stress management training at points throughout their career. This recommendation had been partially implemented; full implementation required resources and training time.[93]

134. In November, Mr Derek Twigg, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence, expressed his concern that the MOD was not providing a "comprehensive rehabilitation package" for personnel returning from operations.[94]

135. AM Pocock responded in December.[95] He advised that a forecast that the current downward trend in Road Traffic Accidents would stall, and a recent King's Centre paper indicating an increased tendency towards risk-taking behaviour after deployment, both supported Mr Twigg's "nagging concern" that the MOD might not be providing the support that personnel (including Regulars, Reservists, formed units, individuals, and individuals who had been medically evacuated) required.

136. AM Pocock set out the six-step process defined by the MOD's Operational Stress Management Policy and highlighted the role of decompression as one element of step 5 (post-operational recovery). Work to evaluate the effectiveness of decompression was under way.

137. In July 2007, AM Pocock advised Gen Granville-Chapman that, following the 2005 OROSM review, the MOD's policy on operational stress management was "both comprehensive and robust".[96] The MOD had now undertaken an analysis within the three Services and the Civil Service of how much training for operational stress was available and how effective it was. This "gap analysis" indicated that the three Services "already do much to address [operational stress management] training needs". A bid for resources to plug the gaps, including the wider implementation of the Royal Marines' Trauma Risk Management programme proposed by the Army, would be submitted.

Trauma Risk Management

138. In 2008, the Armed Forces rolled out Trauma Risk Management (TRiM) in all three Services.[97]

139. Lt Gen Lillywhite described TRiM as a form of debriefing after a traumatic event,[98] but undertaken in peer groups rather than by an external counsellor. The person who was leading the debriefing was taught to identify whether their colleagues were under stress and might need referral elsewhere.[99]

Further findings from the King's Centre study

140. Further reports from the King's Centre study in 2009 and 2010 reported that:

- There was no increase in mental health problems in Regular Personnel serving in Iraq or Afghanistan, compared with Regular Personnel not deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan.
- The rate of symptoms of PTSD remained "relatively low" among Regular Personnel deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan; estimates ranged between 1.3 and 4.8 percent following deployment. The rate of symptoms of PTSD in the general UK population was approximately 3 percent.
- Between 16 and 20 percent of Regular Personnel reported common mental disorders, such as depression and anxiety. This was similar to the rate in the general UK population.

[99] Public hearing, 20 July 2010, pages 56-57.

- Alcohol misuse was a common problem among Regular Personnel deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan. In the first phase of the King's Centre study (2003 to 2006), only "combat troops" were found to have a higher prevalence of alcohol misuse following deployment to Iraq. Later analyses showed a higher prevalence of alcohol misuse among all Regular Personnel who were deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan, regardless of their role on deployment.
- "Combat troops" deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan showed a small but significant increase in the risk of symptoms of PTSD compared with non-combat troops. Approximately 7 percent of combat troops had symptoms of PTSD following deployment.
- Reservists deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan were at a higher risk of reporting symptoms of PTSD, when compared with Reservists not deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. The King's Centre commented that many factors could contribute to the excess of mental ill-health observed in deployed Reservists, including their relative inexperience of combat operations, lower unit cohesion, and problems in the home and work environment during or after deployment. The King's Centre also commented that despite the introduction of measures focused on helping Reservists (including the RMHP and better support for Reservists' families), the excess of mental health problems (specifically PTSD) observed among Reservists deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan was "disappointingly persistent".
- Multiple deployments were not consistently associated with an increased risk of mental health problems. However, the cumulative duration of deployments did affect mental health; if troops deployed for more than 13 months over a three-year period they were at increased risk of mental health problems, particularly an increased risk of PTSD symptoms. The King's Centre commented that the finding supported the MOD's Harmony Guidelines for Army Personnel. Ensuring that the Guidelines were not exceeded could help to reduce the risk of mental health problems in the UK's Regular forces.
- Regular Personnel were at increased risk of alcohol misuse and PTSD symptoms where the tour length was extended during the deployment itself.[100]

141. The King's Centre concluded:

> "Despite extended campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the prevalence of mental disorders in the UK's Armed Forces remains low. PTSD is in fact an issue for a relatively small proportion of military personnel. Of particular concern, however, are the high levels of alcohol misuse in Regulars, the mental health of combat troops and also the mental health of Reservists. These three issues require attention over the coming years."

The Harmony Guidelines and mental health

Professor Christopher Dandeker, Professor of Military Sociology at King's College London and Co-Director of the King's Centre for Military Health Research, told the House of Commons Defence Committee in March 2008 that:

> "… so far as our own research is concerned … I think that the Harmony Guidelines have been well constructed because the evidence suggests that if you stay within them they [Service Personnel] do not suffer; if you go beyond them there is a 20 to 50 percent likelihood that they will suffer in terms of PTSD [Post Traumatic Stress Disorder]".[101]

In his evidence to the Inquiry, Air Marshal David Pocock, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel) from 2005 to 2007, questioned whether Professor Dandeker was right to suggest that the Harmony Guidelines were an appropriate basis for assessing the effect of operational deployment on individuals.[102] The Guidelines had been derived in a straightforward way from the planning assumptions used in SDR 98 ('what operations have we got? How many people have we got? … that means that they can spend this long away'). AM Pocock said that his focus had been on the broader relationship between time deployed on operations and the risk of mental health issues.

142. The Inquiry asked Lt Gen Lillywhite how the MOD's approach to mental health had changed over the course of Op TELIC.[103]

143. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that the "perennial challenge" was to overcome the stigma associated with mental health issues:

> "A lot of effort has gone into educating both commanders and individuals that psychological adverse effects is not something that needs to be hidden. We have not fully succeeded, nor has any other nation, and neither has the civilian population. Mental health continues to have a stigma amongst many that actually inhibits its presenting for care early."

144. Lt Gen Lillywhite highlighted the introduction of a decompression period after an operational deployment and TRiM, as two significant developments in the MOD's approach to supporting mental health.

Compensation

145. The MOD provided compensation to Service Personnel who suffered from illness or injury, including mental health problems.

[102] Public hearing, 19 July 2010, pages 68-70.
[103] Public hearing, 20 July 2010, pages 55-57.

146. For illnesses and injuries caused before 6 April 2005, compensation was provided under two separate compensation arrangements, the War Pensions Scheme (WPS) and the Armed Forces Pension Scheme 1975 (AFPS 75).

147. In September 2003, after a consultative process which began in 2001, the Government announced that it would introduce a new Armed Forces Pension Scheme (AFPS 05) (see Section 16.1) and a new compensation scheme.[104] The new compensation scheme would be introduced in April 2005 and would replace provisions under the War Pensions Scheme and attributable benefits under AFPS 75.

148. Mr Ivor Caplin, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence, told Parliament that the new compensation scheme would have "more focus on the more severely disabled" and would provide a lump-sum payment for "pain and suffering" – a benefit that was not available under the current arrangements.

149. The new compensation scheme – the Armed Forces Compensation Scheme (AFCS) – was introduced on 6 April 2005.[105] The AFCS:

- Provided compensation for any injury, illness or death which was caused by service on or after 6 April 2005. That included injury or illness which occurred while participating in a "service related activity", such as organised sport.
- Covered all current and former members of the Armed Forces, including Reservists. For the first time, serving members of the Armed Forces could make claims.
- In the event of service-related death, paid benefits to eligible partners and children. An eligible partner was described as "someone with whom you are cohabiting in an exclusive and substantial relationship, with financial and wider dependence".
- Provided lump sum payments and, for the most severe injuries and illnesses, Guaranteed Income Payments (GIPs) to provide a regular income stream. Those payments were made according to a comprehensive tariff reflecting, for lump-sum payments, the severity of the injury or illness and, for GIPs, estimated loss of future earnings. The most severe injuries and illnesses qualified for a lump-sum payment of £285,000.
- Used the balance of probabilities standard of proof, in line with similar schemes for civil claims.[106]

150. Public concern over the level of compensation paid to injured Service Personnel grew in autumn 2007, following press coverage of the compensation awarded to Lance Bombardier Ben Parkinson.[107] Lance Bombardier Parkinson was severely injured in Afghanistan, losing both his legs and suffering a brain injury and multiple other serious injuries.[108] The BBC reported that he had been awarded £152,150 in compensation.

151. In February 2008, the MOD amended the AFCS to take account of individuals who had suffered more than one injury in a single incident and to increase the lump-sum payments to those with the most serious multiple injuries (within the £285,000 maximum).[109] The MOD stated that, when the AFCS was developed, the MOD had not envisaged the "severe, multiple injury cases of the type that are now unfortunately occurring". The changes enabled the AFCS to respond to that challenge.

152. In July 2008, within the Service Personnel Command Paper, the Government doubled the lump-sum payment for the most serious injuries, from £285,000 to £570,000.[110] All payments were increased by at least 10 percent. The Government committed to apply those increases retrospectively to all those who had already made claims under the AFCS. GIPs remained unchanged.

153. Mr Ainsworth told the Inquiry that when he pressed for that increase, he had experienced "some resistance" from some officials in the MOD:

> "… I can remember a particular official amusing me no end when he told me, 'You cannot, Minister, double the upfront compensation payment' … I think he had worked on the scheme for quite some time and was pretty dedicated to it, and he knew some of the other consequences of doubling the upfront payment, [that] potentially it would cause disparities with other people, but my attitude was 'So what? I can't defend the level of upfront payment as it exists today and you do not have to, and you are not injured and we are going to double it', and we did."[111]

154. Further increases in lump-sum payments (though not to the maximum amount) and to GIPs, and changes to the operation of the AFCS, were made in 2010 following a review of the AFCS.[112]

Support for veterans

155. In March 2001, the Government launched the Veterans Initiative to identify and address the needs of veterans, in close partnership with ex-Service organisations.[113] It also announced the appointment of Dr Moonie as the first Minister for Veterans' Affairs. The Initiative's priorities included:

- co-ordinating the Government's response to issues affecting veterans;

- improving communications between veterans and the Government; and
- promoting partnership between the Government and ex-Service organisations.

156. In June 2001, the War Pensions Agency was transferred to the MOD and in April 2002 it was re-launched as the Veterans Agency, with a remit to provide financial and welfare support to all former members of the Armed Forces, their widows/widowers and dependants.

157. The Veterans Agency published the Strategy for Veterans in March 2003, to "help ensure" a coherent Government policy and a structured plan of action.[114] The Strategy stated that services for veterans were increasingly delivered on a cross-Government basis, or through a partnership between Government and the private or voluntary sectors. Partnerships between Government and the voluntary sector should not detract from the Government's responsibilities or impinge on charities' independence.

158. The Veterans Agency published the Communications Strategy for Veterans in September 2003, in response to research commissioned by the MOD that indicated that many veterans, members of the general public, and "statutory and charitable service providers" were unaware of the services, advice and support available to veterans.[115]

Mental healthcare for veterans

159. The Medical Assessment Programme (MAP) was established in 1993 to examine veterans of the 1990/1991 Gulf Conflict who were concerned that their health had been adversely affected by their service.[116] The majority of cases seen by the MAP were mental health related and the service evolved into a mental health assessment programme. The MAP was extended in 2003 to include Op TELIC veterans.

160. The MAP provided a thorough assessment by a physician with knowledge of veterans' physical and mental health issues. The physician would provide a report for the referring doctor including any diagnosis made and recommendations for treatment.

161. In July 2003, King's College London published its final report on the delivery of cross-departmental support and service to veterans.[117] The study (which ran from July 2002 to March 2003) had been commissioned by the MOD to examine key areas of need not already addressed under the Veterans Initiative and the Strategy for Veterans.[118]

162. Key findings from the study included:

- There was very little published information on the experience of UK veterans.
- For "many (indeed most)" personnel, military life was a positive experience.
- Most veterans did not develop mental health problems as a result of serving in the Armed Forces. The minority of veterans who did, fared badly.
- There had been a decline in "civilian-military understanding", which adversely affected veterans' dealings with Local Authorities and Social Services.
- Only half of veterans with mental health problems were currently seeking help. Of those who had sought help, many were receiving anti-depressant therapies but few were receiving specialist advice or treatment.[119]

Community mental health pilots

163. In 2005, following recommendations on mental health services for veterans presented by the independent Health and Social Care Advisory Service (HASCAS), the MOD, in collaboration with the DoH and the Devolved Administrations, launched six community NHS mental health pilots.[120] The purpose of the pilots was to provide expert, evidence-based assessment and treatment, led by a mental health therapist with an understanding of the issues faced by veterans, and to improve local health professionals' awareness and understanding of veterans and military life.

164. The first pilot, in Stafford, started in November 2007; the sixth pilot, in Edinburgh, started in April 2009.

Priority treatment within the NHS

165. From 1953, it was Government policy that war pensioners (not all ex-Service Personnel) should receive priority examination and treatment within the NHS for the condition for which they received a pension or gratuity.[121]

166. In spring 2007, in response to a series of Parliamentary questions on the efficacy of the arrangements underpinning that policy, the MOD tasked the Service Personnel and Veterans Agency (SPVA) to record all complaints relating to priority access.

167. In June 2007, a junior MOD official advised Gen Dannatt that the arrangements for ensuring priority access had several "inherent weaknesses":

- The MOD owned the policy but was reliant on the DoH for delivery. The DoH did not regularly remind NHS clinicians and GPs of the policy. Even when clinicians and GPs were aware of the policy, the allocation of priority treatment was determined by a number of factors.

- The arrangement between the MOD and the DoH had never been formalised, but was rather a "gentleman's agreement". "Priority access" had never been defined.
- The MOD did not regularly remind war pensioners of their right to priority access.

168. The official stated that the only alternative to the current arrangement, the provision of treatment in the private sector, was unlikely to be affordable. To mitigate the weaknesses of the current arrangement, the MOD's current level of engagement with the DoH, including at Ministerial level, should be sustained. The information that was now being collected by the SPVA would, in the future, allow better analysis and "evidence-based" action.

169. On 23 November, Mr Alan Johnson, the Health Secretary, and Mr Derek Twigg, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister for Veterans, announced that the NHS would provide priority treatment for all veterans (not just those in receipt of war pensions), whose ill-health or injuries were attributed to their military service.[122]

170. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that the arrangement on priority access was of limited – but some – utility to veterans.[123]

171. In July 2008, the Government published a command paper entitled The Nation's Commitment: Cross-Government Support to our Armed Forces, their Families and Veterans (known as the Service Personnel Command Paper).[124] The paper contained a number of measures to address the disadvantages experienced by veterans, including:

- a commitment that the standard of prosthetic limbs provided to veterans by the NHS, would match or exceed the standard of limbs provided to injured personnel by the DMS;
- a commitment to raise awareness amongst healthcare professionals of the healthcare needs of veterans;
- funding for supported housing for Service leavers;
- a commitment to fund tuition fees in further and higher education for Service leavers; and
- measures to improve veterans' access to transport and employment opportunities.

172. The Inquiry's conclusions and lessons on the care provided to Service Personnel are set out in Section 16.4.

Introduction

1. Between 2003 and 2009, 178 British Service Personnel and one Ministry of Defence (MOD) civilian lost their lives serving on Operation TELIC.[1] A breakdown of those fatalities by year is shown in the table below.

2. This Section addresses:

- the preparations made for repatriating the bodies of those who lost their lives on Op TELIC, and for investigating their deaths;
- changes to military investigative processes and to the civilian inquest process;
- the support offered to the next of kin and bereaved families; and
- how the Government honoured those who lost their lives.

3. This Section does not consider other UK citizens who also lost their lives in Iraq, in a variety of different roles and as the result of hostage-taking.

4. The provision of welfare support for Service Personnel is addressed in Section 16.1.

5. The provision of medical care, in particular for seriously injured personnel, and the support provided to their families, is addressed in Section 16.2.

6. The problems caused by deployments consistently exceeding the Defence Planning Assumptions in respect of the provision of military equipment are addressed in Sections 6.3 and 14.

7. The decision to deploy to Helmand province in Afghanistan, and the implications of that decision, are addressed in Section 9.

Planning and preparing for fatalities

Estimates of UK military fatalities

8. Sections 6.1 and 6.2 describe military planning for operations in Iraq.

9. In early September 2002, the MOD estimated that between 31 and 48 Service Personnel would be killed in action during the initial combat phase of operations of an attack on Iraq (and that between 157 and 241 Service Personnel would be admitted to Role 3 hospitals).[2,3] Those figures excluded possible casualties from chemical and biological warfare.

10. The MOD regularly updated its casualty estimates as the military plan developed. The estimates did not consider casualties beyond the initial combat phase of operations.

11. Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, wrote to Mr Blair on 16 January 2003, recommending that the UK agree a US request to provide a large scale ground force for operations in southern Iraq.

12. Mr Hoon's advice did not include the estimates of UK military casualties (including fatalities) that had been developed.[4]

13. Mr Blair agreed Mr Hoon's recommendation the following day.[5]

14. On 3 February, the MOD produced a Casualty Estimate paper for the Chiefs of Staff meeting later that week.[6] The paper stated that:

- There could be between 30 and 50 fatalities in the Land Component.
- There could be between 5 and 9 fatalities in the Air Component.
- No simple estimate could be made of fatalities in the Maritime Component, given the high impact/low probability nature of incidents.
- Fatalities from a "single small-scale but well executed" chemical attack could be between 0 and 96 fatalities, depending on a range of factors including the target, the chemical agent used, and the weather.
- No useful estimate could be made of fatalities from a biological attack in the absence of more specific information about the circumstances of any attack.

15. The Chiefs of Staff concluded on 5 February that the Casualty Estimate paper would need to be shown to Ministers before any decision to commit UK troops was made.[7]

16. On 20 February, in response to the publication of a paper, Iraq at the Crossroads: State and Society in the Shadow of the Regime, by the International Institute of Strategic Studies (IISS),[8] Mr Blair asked for advice on a number of questions, including: "What is our military's assessment of the likely consequences of an attack on Iraq; i.e. how many casualties; how quickly the collapse?"[9]

17. On 24 February, Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, wrote to Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, advising that the MOD estimated that there would be between 30 and 60 British and between 500 and 1,200 Iraqi "land battle" fatalities.[10] Mr Watkins also advised that work to estimate Iraqi civilian casualties continued.

18. Lord Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff from 2001 to April 2003, told the Inquiry that Ministers would have been informed of the MOD's casualty estimates, as part of the routine briefing process.[11]

19. By 1 May, when President Bush declared that major combat operations in Iraq had ended, 33 British Service Personnel had died serving on Op TELIC.[12]

20. Both Lord Boyce and Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary from 2001 to 2005, told the Inquiry that the actual number of casualties had been fewer than the MOD had estimated.[13] Sir Kevin commented:

> "… as far as casualties are concerned, the assessment was that they would not be any higher than we faced in the Gulf war 12 years earlier. So the figures were relatively ... modest. In the event, they were even lower than that. The uncertainty was ... the possible use of chemical/biological weapons against us. I think the original assessment was that Saddam was unlikely – but we couldn't rule it out militarily – unlikely to use them early ... but he might use them, and we expected him to use them, as a matter of last resort, which, of course, informed the nature of military planning."

Repatriation policy

21. Until the Falklands Conflict in 1982, Service Personnel who died on major operations were normally buried in theatre.[14]

22. After the Falklands Conflict, all bereaved families were offered the opportunity to have the bodies of their relatives returned to the UK, largely because of the difficulty of travelling to the Falkland Islands to visit their graves. In subsequent operations, it became MOD policy to repatriate bodies to the UK in all but the most exceptional circumstances.

23. The MOD's policy on the repatriation of the dead was set out in a paper produced by Lieutenant General Anthony Palmer, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Personnel) (DCDS(Personnel)), on 14 March 2003:

> "Repatriation to UK of the dead is to take place wherever possible and as soon as practicable."[15]

24. If fatalities were suspected to have been caused by Chemical Biological Radiological Nuclear (CBRN) agents, then repatriation should only proceed once the presence of a CBRN agent had been confirmed or ruled out, and then on the basis of a risk assessment. In certain circumstances, repatriation might require mitigating actions (such as decontamination or special isolation of the body), or the body might need to be officially cremated in theatre with the ashes repatriated. In exceptional circumstances, the body might need to be cremated and permanently buried in theatre.

Preparing to hold civilian inquests

The legal frameworks for inquests

Coroners are independent judicial officers. They are appointed and paid for by the relevant local authority and their officers and staff are employed by the local authority and/or the police.

Coroners in England and Wales had a statutory duty, under Section 8 of the 1988 Coroners Act, to investigate deaths which are reported to them when the body is lying in their district and there is reason to believe that the death was violent or unnatural, or was a sudden death of unknown cause, or in some other circumstances.[16] That duty applied "whether the cause of death arose in his district or not".

Section 14 of the 1988 Coroners Act provided that, if it appeared to the coroner for the district where a body was lying that the inquest ought to be held by another coroner, then he may request that coroner to assume jurisdiction.

The position in Scotland and Northern Ireland was different.

In Scotland, the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 required the appropriate procurator fiscal to investigate (through a Fatal Accident Inquiry) any death which occurred within Scotland in the course of an individual's employment, or in legal custody.[17] The Act also provided for the Lord Advocate to instruct a procurator fiscal to investigate a death if it appeared to him that an investigation would be in the public interest.

[16] Coroners Act 1988. The Act was replaced by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009.
[17] Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths (Scotland) Act 1976.

The Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959 provided that coroners in Northern Ireland within whose district a dead body was found, or an unexpected or unexplained death or a death in suspicious and certain other circumstances occurred, "may" hold an inquest.[18] The Act also provided for the Advocate General for Northern Ireland to direct that an inquest should be held in other circumstances.

In the case of military deaths overseas, civilian inquests usually took place after the internal military investigation had concluded, although this was not formally required. The military investigation could provide evidence that would be extremely difficult for a coroner to source elsewhere.

25. An MOD official wrote to Mr Nicholas Gardiner, the Coroner for Oxfordshire, on 17 January 2003 to advise him that the Services were currently considering the administration for "potential mass casualties in the event of war", and that the majority of fatalities might be repatriated to RAF Brize Norton, which fell within his area of responsibility.[19] The official asked whether "normal peacetime rules" would apply and specifically whether, if there were a large number of fatalities, he would expect to hold an inquest into each case.

26. Mr Gardiner replied on 20 January, confirming that:

- If the cause of death appeared unnatural, then there would be an inquest. This would normally be held in public.
- Normal practice where there was a single death was to transfer responsibility for the inquest to the "home town coroner". Where there were a number of deaths in the same incident it was "clearly sensible" for the same coroner to hold those inquests; that would commonly be the coroner for the point of entry.[20]

27. Mr Gardiner and officials in the Home Office (the Department which was then responsible for coronial policy) and the MOD worked together during February and March to refine the arrangements for receiving UK fatalities.

28. Mr Gardiner advised a Home Office official on 20 February that he understood that in "contamination cases", the bodies of deceased Service Personnel would not be returned to the UK.[21]

[21] Letter Gardiner to Home Office [junior official], 20 February 2003, 'Service Deaths Overseas'. Mr Gardiner's letter provides no further details on the nature of those "contamination cases". The Inquiry believes that Mr Gardiner was referring to casualties from chemical and biological weapons.

29. Mr Gardiner wrote to a Home Office official on 18 March, the day before military operations against Iraq began:

> "There are a few matters outstanding but, generally, I think we are reasonably well prepared, although there are bound to be things we have not thought of."[22]

30. The Home Office issued guidance to all coroners on handling deaths arising from hostilities in Iraq on 26 March.[23] The guidance stated:

- The MOD had advised that, while hostilities lasted, it would not be possible to provide evidence of the incidents on the battlefield which led to injury. In those circumstances, the Home Office recommended that coroners should adjourn inquests pending the conclusion of hostilities. Coroners "could expect to receive in due course advice on when it might be appropriate to consider the resumption of such inquests".
- Coroners should notify the Home Office "if the numbers of adjourned cases in their jurisdiction seem likely to cause problems in terms of workload".

31. A Home Office official wrote to Mr Gardiner on 2 April to advise that, while the Home Office appreciated Mr Gardiner's "willingness to undertake the handling of all these cases", the extra costs involved would fall to Oxfordshire County Council and they should be invited to agree the commitment that Mr Gardiner was taking on.[24]

32. The official went on to suggest that, "wherever appropriate, it would be better for the substantive inquests to be held by coroners local to the family concerned, as with any other deaths overseas". While that approach had not been adopted for the inquests into the deaths caused by the 9/11 attack and the Bali bombing, in those cases the deaths all arose from a single incident:

> "In the case of Iraq, the deaths are occurring in different places, at different times and in different circumstances. It seems to me, that unless there is good reason to the contrary, single deaths, and multiple deaths arising from the same incident and involving personnel from broadly the same place in England and Wales, ought to be subject to local inquests where the family or families involved can attend conveniently. Inquests into multiple deaths involving individuals from different parts of the country might properly be undertaken by you, unless there seems to be a more appropriate local coroner (e.g. if the deceased were all from the same military base)."

33. Mr Gardiner replied on 4 April, agreeing that it was certainly appropriate for some inquests to be transferred to other coroners.[25] Those would generally be single deaths, and multiple deaths where there was a “significant common factor” indicating that an inquest outside of Oxfordshire would be appropriate.

34. Mr Gardiner also agreed that there were “significant financial implications” for his office, and advised that he was copying the exchange to Oxfordshire County Council.

Support for bereaved families

The Casualty Notification Officer and Visiting Officer

35. Lieutenant General Sir Alistair Irwin, the Adjutant General from 2003 to 2005, described the role of a Casualty Notification Officer (CNO) for the Inquiry:

> “It is the hope and expectation that those involved [CNOs] will be from the unit but sometimes, particularly if it was an individual based elsewhere, it had to be done by somebody else ... The general principle was that it should be based on the family entity, the military family entity.
> “Once the casualty has been identified beyond peradventure and all the details are correct ... the CNO ... has the unenviable task of knocking on the door and presenting the bad news.”[26]

36. Vice Admiral (VAdm) Peter Wilkinson, Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel) (DCDS(Personnel)) from 2007, told the Inquiry:

> “... it is the very first official contact that a bereaved family has with the MOD or the Armed Services that determines how the journey will go from there. If that official notification is carried out appropriately from all sides, then there is a chance that we may be able to help the family as they go through the grieving and bereavement process. If, for whatever reasons, that initial official contact doesn’t go well, then it is very hard to recover. Sometimes we never do.”[27]

37. Lt Gen Irwin described the role of a Visiting Officer (VO) for the Inquiry:

> “... that person [the CNO] then stays with the family until the notified casualty Visiting Officer appears. The CNO, the one who has broken the bad news, then departs the scene and the VO then remains with the family...
>
> ...
> “These people were trained ... to hold the family’s hand through the awful aftermath of this. First of all, the realisation that it has happened, then the business of going to the repatriation ceremonies, then, in many cases, going through the whole of the coroner’s process, then the funerals, and then the gradual trying to piece together life again. Some families, of course, needed their VOs only briefly; others needed them ... for really quite a long time."[28]

38. VOs were not generally specialists, but Service Personnel who were asked to take on the role in addition to their regular duties because they were thought to be suited to it.[29]

39. In December 2002, following a number of high-profile cases, the Army acknowledged that its procedures for supporting bereaved families "fell short of modern expectations" and introduced a number of changes, including:

- CNOs and VOs were briefed to try to identify any issues that might affect communications with the immediate and wider family (such as divorced or separated parents). If necessary, a second or third CNO could be appointed.
- All Notifying Authorities were instructed to maintain a pool of CNOs and VOs "who must have attended a seminar at Brigade or Divisional level".
- Notification was to take place at any time of day or night, to avoid families hearing the news from elsewhere.
- The VO would remain in contact with the family as the focus for all communication, as long as the family wished.[30]

40. The Army refined that approach through 2003 and 2004, in the light of their experience of supporting the families of Service Personnel killed in Iraq.

Immediate remedial action on bereavement procedures

41. The prospect of military operations against Iraq prompted the MOD to bring forward plans to extend some benefits to unmarried partners.

42. Mr Hoon was advised on 26 February 2003 that, with conflict in Iraq looming, the Government should end the uncertainty on whether unmarried partners of Service Personnel were eligible for benefits in the event of their death.[31]

43. Unmarried partners were not entitled to benefits under the Armed Forces Pension Scheme (AFPS) and only certain unmarried partners were entitled to benefits for death attributable to service under the War Pension Scheme (WPS). The MOD advised that the new Armed Forces compensation and pension schemes would extend benefits to unmarried partners (both heterosexual and homosexual) for attributable and non-attributable injury and death, but the new schemes would not be implemented before 2005/06.

44. Ministers had already indicated that, in certain circumstances, the Government would extend benefits to unmarried partners on a "case-by-case" basis.

45. That position now needed to be clarified and formalised, by agreeing that AFPS benefits should be extended to unmarried partners for deaths attributable to service.

46. On 20 March, Dr Lewis Moonie, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence, announced that, with immediate effect, where a member of the Armed Forces died as a result of service related to conflict, ex-gratia payments equivalent to the benefits paid to a surviving spouse under the AFPS could be awarded to their unmarried partner, where there was a substantial relationship.[32]

47. In late March, the MOD's Armed Forces Personnel Administration Agency (AFPAA) wrote to the spouse of a Serviceman who had been killed in Iraq advising that an overpayment of her late husband's salary – relating to the period between his death and formal identification – would be recovered from her benefits.[33]

48. The bereaved spouse also felt that the AFPAA was pressuring her to leave her Service Family Accommodation (SFA).

49. The MOD's policy at that time was to allow spouses of deceased Service Personnel to remain in SFA for up to six months.[34] That period could be extended in some circumstances.

50. The case attracted significant press attention.

51. The bereaved spouse wrote to Mr Blair on 26 March, setting out her concerns. Mr Blair replied on 7 April, stating that Mr Hoon would consider the detailed points raised in her letter, but assuring her that she would be given all the time she required to consider her future housing needs.[35]

52. Mr Hoon told Lt Gen Palmer on 15 April that he was "very uncomfortable" with the MOD's handling of the case, including both the tone and content of the AFPAA's letter.[36] Lt Gen Palmer confirmed that the letter was "factually incorrect", as there were no grounds for seeking repayment.

53. The following day, Mr Hoon tasked Lt Gen Palmer to oversee "a comprehensive review of the way in which all three Services handled bereaved families".[37]

54. Lt Gen Palmer wrote to Mr Hoon's Private Office on 17 April, confirming that work was already in hand to conduct that comprehensive review (an initial report would be available by 16 May), and reporting the "immediate remedial action" that had been taken in response to the individual's experience:

- Lt Gen Palmer had "declared" that all except one of the Op TELIC fatalities to date were attributable to service. That declaration meant that the usual assessment of attributability would not be required, and that families could be notified now that the higher benefits associated with deaths attributable to service would be paid.
- The letters used by the AFPAA were not appropriate. As of 16 April, all letters dealing with Op TELIC had been "personally vetted" by the AFPAA's Chief Executive and checked by the appropriate Service Casualty Co-ordination Centre.
- Families of Service Personnel were now able to stay in their service accommodation for "as long as they feel they need to in order to assess their longer-term housing requirements". If pressed, VOs should "talk in terms of nine months although stressing that each case will be examined on its merits".
- The MOD had asked the deceased insurer's to accelerate their procedures.[38]

55. Lt Gen Palmer was advised on the same day that the MOD was facing a new challenge: "Policy ... changing 'on the hoof'".[39]

56. Lt Gen Palmer provided his first report to Mr Hoon on bereavement procedures on 16 May.[40] It identified six recent, specific lapses in the MOD's handling of bereaved families (two of which pre-dated Op TELIC), and three broader areas where improvement was necessary:

- the volume, timing and style of correspondence between multiple MOD organisations and bereaved families;
- a lack of clarity over the sources of specialist advice available to bereaved families; and
- the "training/education" of CNOs and VOs.

57. Lt Gen Palmer reported the actions that had already been taken to prevent a recurrence of those specific lapses, and restated the decisions of the previous month to relax the MOD's policy on the retention of SFA and to improve the quality of AFPAA correspondence. Lt Gen Palmer also advised that:

- He had directed that all MOD correspondence should be routed through the deceased's unit and the VO, and all MOD visits to bereaved families should be co-ordinated by the VO.
- Further work would be done to develop "simple and readable" guidance, to improve the tone of correspondence, and to develop a comprehensive guide to the sources of advice and support available.
- Further work would be done to assess the selection, training and education of CNOs and VOs.

58. In March 2004, the MOD concluded a study to identify improvements to their investigative and Board of Inquiry (BOI) processes.[41] While the study focused on the investigative and BOI processes themselves, it recommended that:

- Commands should establish a senior focal point with responsibility for pro-actively monitoring all investigations and BOIs;
- all communication with families should be routed through a "single established and known contact", who could explain the context of any correspondence and "head-off any infelicitous or insensitive drafting"; and
- a "knowledgeable and consistent" officer should regularly brief families on the detail and progress of the entire investigation and BOI process.

59. On 24 June, Lt Gen Palmer reported to Air Chief Marshal (ACM) Sir Anthony Bagnall, Vice Chief of Defence Staff (VCDS), that each Service had now appointed a "Senior Co-ordinator" to act as a focal point for monitoring investigations and Inquiries.[42] Lt Gen Palmer also gave ACM Bagnall the "specific reassurance" that he had requested that each Service had undertaken to provide regular briefings to next of kin on process and progress. All communication with the next of kin would be routed through a single contact (normally the VO) who would "act as a sift" to filter out any insensitive or inconsistent drafting.

60. Lt Gen Palmer advised ACM Bagnall that a study into Services' bereavement support procedures, including the training provided to CNOs and VOs, had now reported. The study had concluded that:

- While it might seem logical to adopt a tri-Service approach to bereavement support procedures, it was reasonable for each Service to continue to use their "slightly different" approaches given their differing geographical spread, unit organisations and ethos.

- With the exception of the Royal Navy, which generally used qualified welfare workers, "bereavement support personnel" were appointed on an ad hoc basis from the junior officer cadre. While bespoke training for the entire cadre was neither cost-effective nor deliverable, it should be possible to provide "awareness briefings" during general staff training, supplemented by "thorough briefings" by specialist personnel when an individual was appointed to be a VO.[43]

61. Lt Gen Palmer advised ACM Bagnall that he supported those findings, but commented that ACM Bagnall might wish to "revisit" the conclusion that it would not be financially or practically viable to develop a bespoke training course for individuals involved in bereavement support.[44]

62. ACM Bagnall accepted the findings, but commented that existing single-Service or tri-Service courses could include some coverage of bereavement support procedures.[45]

63. On 30 June, Lt Gen Palmer provided Mr Hoon with an update on work to improve the BOI process.[46] The update also covered progress on improving communications with families.

64. Lt Gen Palmer advised Mr Hoon that it was "clear that we are failing to meet some families' expectations in respect of the quality and quantity of information we are providing to them". A key step in improving communications between families and the MOD would be the appointment of a Senior Co-ordinator in each of the Services to ensure that families were briefed, through their VOs, on the progress of investigations and BOIs; the role of the Senior Co-ordinator, and progress in improving the BOI process, is described later in this Section.

65. Lt Gen Palmer recalled the steps that had been taken to improve the tone and accuracy of the MOD's correspondence with bereaved families and advised that, as far as practicable, all routine correspondence now followed standard templates. The production of a joint casualty procedures manual[47] and the formation of a Joint Casualty Co-ordination Cell (JCCC) by January 2005 would further improve communication with families. As a "final filter", all communication with families was now routed through a single point of contact, usually the VO.

66. Lt Gen Palmer reported that the review of training for personnel involved in bereavement support had concluded that a bespoke training course would be neither "financially nor practically viable", but had identified a number of ways in which they would be better supported. The "problems of picking VOs from a necessarily ad hoc pool" could be overcome by including VO duties in general staff training, ensuring that specialist advice was available when needed, and ensuring that the "often junior" VO was properly briefed and supervised. Lt Gen Palmer expected that senior commanders would take a close and personal interest in ensuring that this was done properly.

67. In April 2005, Lt Gen Palmer recommended that the MOD's policy on the occupation of Service Family Accommodation by bereaved spouses should be changed to be "less prescriptive":

> "... while bereaved spouses should be offered retention of SFA for two years we should acknowledge that there might be some ... who seek to retain their SFA for an indefinite period thereafter."[48]

68. Mr Hoon agreed that recommendation, subject to a number of amendments, including that Ministers should be consulted before any decision was taken to withdraw housing entitlement beyond the two-year period.[49]

69. Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces from 2001 to 2007, recalled the exchange in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "... the view [in the MOD] was, 'Well, this is going to dislocate all the other arrangements, if you let this widow stay in the house', and Geoff Hoon just said 'So what? Fix it', and it was fixed. I think, to the best of my recollection, we didn't have a deluge of demand in that area. It may have been beneath the surface, but it never became a reality and, if it had been: yes, they can stay there, yes, we have to be sympathetic."[50]

Joint procedures and a Joint Casualty Co-ordination Cell

70. The Joint Casualty Co-ordination Cell (JCCC) was established in early 2005 to provide a focal point for casualty administration and notification and requests for compassionate travel.[51]

71. Air Marshal David Pocock, the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel) from 2005 to 2007, told the Inquiry that in 2004:

> "... there was clear dissatisfaction with the notification procedures because ... it was a single-service responsibility and we were required very quickly to set up a Joint Casualty and Compassionate Cell ... and that took over getting the information from theatre, identifying a [Casualty] Notification Officer and setting the whole notification procedure in place ... on a joint basis."[52]

72. Lt Gen Irwin told the Inquiry that during his time as Adjutant General (from 2003 to 2005):

> "... I think [there were] 57 Army casualties ... and I would think, looking back on it, that I may have heard about issues in the notification process, and by 'issues' I mean either delays in doing it or calling on the wrong person, or the wrong sort of words being said at the wrong sort of time, I think maybe I had cases of that kind maybe between six and ten, so something of that order."
>
> "... as an individual, that family, there was nothing in the world was more significant. So we had to keep asking ourselves, 'Are we doing this right?'
>
> "So as each issue developed, we tried to close it off, but even after all this time and even with the establishment of the new joint system, with the new central training, even then, I am afraid I can guarantee that, in the future, there will be people who have a bad experience with this for one reason or another, and it is because we are all human beings."[53]

73. The first version of the Joint Casualty and Compassionate Policy and Procedures (JSP 751) was produced in March 2005 (policy and procedures had previously been set and managed by the individual Services).

74. Lt Gen Palmer described the JSP as drawing together into one publication the best practices and procedures currently in place across the three Services.[54]

75. Shortly after the JCCC was established, the Army established the Army Investigations and Aftercare Support Cell (AIASC) to improve and extend the Army's support for families.[55] The AIASC had two main roles:

- to maintain close contact with bereaved families on a regular basis for as long as they wanted, including estranged family members. This included regular letters on the progress of Service Police investigations and BOIs; and
- on behalf of the Army's Senior Co-ordinator, to oversee the BOI process and ensure that delays were kept to a minimum.

76. The AIASC had a number of secondary roles, including developing and maintaining a formal, standardised training package for CNOs and VOs. The AIASC aimed to implement that package by the end of 2005.

TRAINING AND SUPPORT FOR CASUALTY NOTIFICATION OFFICERS AND VISITING OFFICERS

77. JSP 751 stated that CNOs should "if possible ... have received some training or instruction such as in dealing with bereavement" and that VOs should "if possible ... have received some relevant training or instruction".[56]

78. Lieutenant General Mark Mans, the Deputy Adjutant General, wrote to senior Army commanders on 25 November 2005, to remind them of the importance of selecting appropriate and experienced individuals to be VOs:

> "Although the majority do an excellent job, from time to time the wrong person is nominated and invariably significant difficulties follow. This happened again recently ...
> "The training of both Casualty Notification Officers (CNOs) and VOs is also most important and although JSP [751] says 'if possible ... should have received some training', it should be exceptional for them not to have attended some sort of instruction."[57]

79. Lt Gen Mans advised that a centralised training package based on an interactive CD and accompanying material should issue in early 2006 and would form the basis of all future training (divisions and brigades currently ran their own training). Training would become mandatory when this package issued.

80. Lt Gen Mans told the Inquiry that VOs had:

> "... a fairly comprehensive training programme in order to deal with a number of issues ... and, indeed, as individuals, they need to be looked after as well because, > if you are a Visiting Officer, you can have a pretty traumatic time. Throughout a period of a tour of duty, you might be looking after one or two or three families one after the next, and they need to be monitored for stress ... and we have a process in place to do just that."[58]

81. Lt Gen Irwin told the Inquiry that "there is no doubt about it that the training is better now, the preparation is better now".[59]

82. MOD Ministers returned to the issue of the training and support provided to Visiting Officers in 2008.

83. In February 2008, Sir Bill Jeffrey, the MOD's Permanent Under Secretary, provided detailed advice to Mr Bob Ainsworth, Minister of State for the Armed Forces, on how the BOI process could be improved and how the existing process could be accelerated.[60] Sir Bill's advice did not consider the role of the VO.

84. Mr Ainsworth held a meeting on 11 April to discuss that advice.[61] The record of the meeting reported:

> "The Minister raised the issue of interface with families. He recognised that the Visiting Officer role was very difficult ... He also recognised the clear single Service lead in this area ... He, nevertheless, felt that more could be done in terms of the resourcing and training of Visiting Officers. He felt that the cell [the Defence Inquests Unit] should play a role in this area, focusing on ensuring the right training and guidance is provided, sharing best practice between the Services and monitoring performance."

The experience of bereaved families

85. The experiences that family members have shared with the Inquiry suggest that there was considerable variation in the quality of the notification process. Some family members spoke positively about the sensitive and prompt way in which the news was delivered. A smaller number reported negative experiences, including:

- insensitive delivery;
- an impression that details were being withheld (particularly in 'friendly fire' incidents or where there was a possibility of equipment failure);
- release of names to the media before official notification;
- circulation of names amongst the families of others deployed in Iraq before official notification; and

- use of archive footage by the media which featured the deceased as though they were still alive, causing confusion about what was the truth.

86. The experiences shared with the Inquiry suggest that the creation of the JCCC led to an improvement in the quality of the notification process.

87. There was also considerable variation in families' experience of the support provided by Visiting Officers (VOs). In some cases, an enduring and positive relationship resulted. In others:

- The VO was changed without warning, in some instances more than once.
- The VO was badly briefed and lacked knowledge of procedures.
- Insensitive language and behaviour caused distress.
- Contact was sporadic.

88. The Inquiry also heard about a number of distressing incidents which, although they do not form part of a wider pattern, are illustrative of how a lack of care can have a significant impact. They were:

- Following an air crash in which several Service Personnel died, a number of body parts remained unidentified. Families of those who had died were not told about the existence of those unidentified body parts, and many had already held funerals by the time identification was complete, making a second ceremony necessary.
- One family discovered that photographs of their son's body had been used, without permission being sought, in a training seminar.
- One family member accepted military advice not to view their son's body based on the impact of the injuries suffered. But facial reconstruction had taken place and there had already been a viewing for another family member.

89. Anyone serving in the Armed Forces is asked to designate one person as their official next of kin. When a fatality occurs, the CNO contacts the next of kin, and they are the ongoing point of contact for a VO.

90. Parents who lost children in Op TELIC told the Inquiry that one consequence of this arrangement was a disparity between the information and support provided to the partner of the deceased, usually the person named as next of kin, and to parents. As one father told the Inquiry, being a bereaved parent can be a very lonely business.

91. The need for greater support to a wider family than just the next of kin was recognised by the Government in July 2008:

> "We recognise that the loss of a Service person affects the whole of the bereaved family, not just the next of kin or nominated emergency contacts, on whom we traditionally tend to focus our contact and support. We will review our procedures to ensure that in future sufficient account is taken of the needs of the wider family."[62]

Early concerns about military investigations

92. The MOD had a wide range of internal investigations that could be carried out following a fatality or other serious incident occurring on operations.[63] They included:

- Land Accident Investigation Team (LAIT) investigations. The LAIT could respond to incidents at very short notice and would normally report within 30 days. It sought to determine the cause of an accident and make timely recommendations to prevent reoccurrence. It did not apportion blame. A LAIT report could inform a Board of Inquiry/Service Inquiry, or substitute for it where the facts of the case were sufficiently clear.
- Service Police investigations. Each Service has its own Service Police force; for the Army, that is the Royal Military Police (RMP). The Special Investigation Branch (SIB) of each Service Police force investigates the most serious cases. The MOD told the Inquiry: "While the need for a prompt investigation is important, and may be vital, there are no specific deadlines for the completion of Service Police investigations."
- Boards of Inquiry (BOIs). The purpose of a BOI was to establish the facts about an event, to make recommendations to prevent a reoccurrence, and to inform any decision on whether other action, such as administrative or disciplinary action, should be initiated.[64] BOIs would not generally attribute blame.

Impact of a study on military inquiries and investigations, March 2004

93. On 26 June 2003, Mr Hoon received an update on the SIB investigation into the death of a member of the Armed Forces.[65]

94. Mr Hoon's Private Office responded on 30 June, expressing Mr Hoon's concern that the individual's next of kin had not yet been informed of the result of the post-mortem, in particular as the media might release that information.

95. Mr Hoon's Office also asked for an update on all the BOIs and other investigations that had been launched into the deaths of Service Personnel killed in Iraq, including details of the "timescales and inter-dependencies on the investigations reaching their conclusions".

96. On 4 July, Mr Ian Gibson, MOD Deputy Director Service Personnel, sent an update on progress on BOIs and investigations to Mr Hoon's Office.[66] The update detailed 43 fatalities resulting from 21 incidents. Only one BOI, into the loss of a Sea King helicopter with six UK Service Personnel on board on 22 March, had so far reported. A date for the inquest had not yet been set.

97. Later that month, Mr Gibson sent Mr Hoon's Office a paper describing military investigative and BOI processes, which highlighted the different approaches taken by the Services.[67] The Royal Navy and RAF would generally launch a BOI as soon as an incident occurred, at the same time as they deployed a criminal investigative team (if they thought that one was required). In contrast, the Army would only launch a BOI after an investigative team had reported. The MOD was considering the scope for harmonising the Services' approaches to BOIs as part of the Tri-Service Armed Forces Act.

98. Mr Ingram's Private Secretary wrote to ACM Bagnall on 15 September:

> "Minister (AF) [Mr Ingram] is concerned about the increasing perception amongst next of kin (and as a consequence Parliamentarians) that investigations into the deaths of personnel in Iraq lack focus and are taking too long. Families also have the impression that they are not kept informed of progress, however modest. These are admittedly perceptions, but most investigations seem slow."[68]

99. While Mr Ingram understood the complications arising from the roulement of formations and the operational situation:

> "Nonetheless, he feels that we need to strengthen our 'grip' on these sensitive issues, to ensure that corporate memory is preserved, that investigations are prosecuted as vigorously as possible, and that the flow of information to NOK [next of kin] is actively managed. This may best be done through the DCMO [Defence Crisis Management Organisation]."

100. Mr Ingram's Private Secretary asked for advice on how that "central management" of the process might be achieved.

101. ACM Bagnall received advice in September and October on how the MOD's investigative processes might be improved.

102. Major General Richard Shirreff, Chief of Staff LAND, advised ACM Bagnall on 24 September that the key to accelerating RMP/SIB investigations in Iraq was more resources, and asked that mobilised Reservists and military police from other Services should be deployed to assist with Op TELIC investigations.[69]

103. Lt Gen Palmer advised ACM Bagnall on 17 October that the Army's policy of investigating all deaths, while "cautious and prudent", placed a heavy burden on RMP/SIB resources.[70] There was scope for the Services to consider a common policy on when it was necessary for Service Police to investigate an incident, and when a BOI or LAIT investigation would suffice.

104. Lt Gen Palmer also advised that, notwithstanding the Army's policy, the main reason for delays to investigations on Op TELIC was the difficult working environment in Iraq (including the need for force protection for Service Police and a potentially hostile population). The MOD was now deploying "SIB qualified" Reservists to Iraq, but the RMP "remain swamped with the volume of investigative work".

105. In early 2004, ACM Bagnall and Lt Gen Palmer commissioned an internal study to identify improvements that could be made to the MOD's investigative processes, and in particular the scope for harmonising procedures across the three Services.[71]

106. The study reported in late March 2004. It concluded that the core BOI process ran "reasonably well" once triggered. The more significant problems related to how and when BOIs were convened, how they linked to other investigations, and how their findings were processed.

107. The study highlighted the "considerable delay" to Army BOIs that could be caused by a LAIT investigation and by the Army's practice of undertaking a full RMP/SIB investigation into all sudden deaths:

> "LAIT TOR [Terms of Reference] define four weeks for issue of report after return from investigation, and HQLAND BOI Standing Orders define another 14 weeks after issue of final LAIT and SIB Reports before the BOI first sits. In other words, the target for the BOI to start is some five months after the incident, if everything goes to plan ... five months seems too long for a routine target."

108. The study also reported that, while existing guidance emphasised that investigations and inquiries should be opened and concluded as quickly as possible, "the words and figures do not match, and it has to be said that the Army's target timescale of some 10 to 11 months after incident [to the conclusion of the BOI] looks somewhat excessive, particularly when only two months of that is the BOI itself sitting". The majority of that 10-11 month period was allocated to "waiting for any successive comments" from advisers and senior officers to complete the BOI report.

109. The study made 15 recommendations, including:

- Commands should establish a senior focal point with responsibility for pro-actively monitoring all investigations and BOIs.
- There should be a presumption across all three Services that a BOI President should be appointed promptly.
- A BOI President should be required to exercise grip and co-ordination over all Service investigative bodies, and liaise with non-Service bodies. Presidents should be released from other duties.
- There should be a "renewed emphasis ... upon early commencement and conclusion of all phases and maximum concurrent activity". The standard target timescales for all phases of the investigative and inquiry processes should be reviewed and tightened. The time allowed for advisers and senior officers to comment should be limited to six weeks.
- All communication with families should be routed through a "single established and known contact", who could explain the context of any correspondence and "head-off any infelicitous or insensitive drafting".
- A "knowledgeable and consistent" officer should regularly brief families on the detail and progress of the entire investigation and BOI process.

110. The study also reported that there was a significant increase in public expectations that there should be a BOI into every incident, and that its conclusions should be disclosed. That imposed a "heavy workload" on all three Services but especially the Army.

111. Lt Gen Palmer wrote to Mr Ingram on 6 April, advising that all the recommendations in the study had been agreed by the Services; the "main recommendations" would be implemented immediately.[72] The "main advance" from the existing process was that the presumption that a BOI should be convened promptly, with a BOI President appointed within 48 hours of the incident, would now be extended to the Army (it was already standard practice in the Royal Navy and RAF). The President would normally be released from other duties and would "play a wider role in determining and co-ordinating the activities of any other necessary investigations, notwithstanding that he might decide not to convene his own Board immediately".

112. Lt Gen Palmer set out how communication with the next of kin would be improved. All communications would be routed through a single "personal contact point". The next of kin would be "briefed clearly, comprehensively and regularly" on the investigation and BOI process. Information that would not compromise the BOI could be released to the next of kin before the final report issued; a clear disclosure policy consistent with the Data Protection Act (DPA), Freedom of Information Act (FOI Act) and other relevant legislation would be developed.

[72] Minute Palmer to Ingram, 6 April 2004, 'Inquiries into Unnatural Death and Serious Injury on Operations: Improvements in Process and Briefing'.

113. Lt Gen Palmer also advised that a report on the progress of all Inquiries and investigations would be sent to Ministers every two months.

114. Mr Hoon met some of the families bereaved during Op TELIC on 28 April.[73] They expressed concern about the Services' investigative processes in general and in particular the quality and frequency of communication from the MOD, and said that they lacked confidence in the BOI and investigative processes. Their concerns triggered a review of Service Police investigations, which is described later in this Section.

115. Mr Hoon received the first progress report on investigations and BOIs on 14 June.[74]

116. Mr Hoon's Assistant Private Secretary responded to the progress report on 18 June, stating that the MOD now had, for the first time, visibility of the extent and progress of all current investigations.[75] The Assistant Private Secretary reported that Mr Hoon had:

> "... noted that the submission has confirmed a number of weaknesses, in particular the length of time it has taken to complete many of the investigations and the apparent lack of communication with some of the families on the more protracted investigations. The Secretary of State [Mr Hoon] will expect to see improvement in these and the other areas as the Board of Inquiry study recommendations are implemented. He will also wish to see early results in the work commissioned by VCDS into the procedural aspects of SIB investigations. It is important that these workstrands are linked: how many BOIs are delayed because of SIB work? He will also wish to see progress in the next report on bringing the more protracted investigations to a speedy close."

117. Mr Hoon's Assistant Private Secretary concluded that Mr Hoon would "wish to be assured that making progress on the various investigations and the Boards of Inquiry continues to receive appropriate senior management attention".

118. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry:

> "... the Secretary of State [Mr Hoon] himself was personally briefed every two months by me as to exactly which Board of Inquiry was delayed, or rather the findings were delayed, why they were delayed, what the reasons for the delay was. Could we do anything to speed up the process, and how are the families reacting to this?"[76]

119. On 24 June, Lt Gen Palmer reported to ACM Bagnall that the "initial tranche" of improvements identified by the BOI study (comprising 13 of the 15 recommendations) was now in place.[77] Each Service had appointed a "Senior Co-ordinator", to act as a focal point for monitoring investigations and BOIs. Lt Gen Palmer gave ACM Bagnall the "specific reassurance" that he had requested, that:

- Each Service had agreed to appoint a BOI President within 48 hours, unless judged unnecessary by a higher authority.
- Each Service had undertaken to provide regular briefings to next of kin on process and progress. All communication with the next of kin would be routed through a single contact (normally the Visiting Officer) who would "act as a sift" to filter out any insensitive or inconsistent drafting.

120. Lt Gen Palmer also reported that he had carefully considered a suggestion from Mr Hoon that the BOI process should include "an individual who is independent of both MOD and the bereaved family ... who would give a view of whether or not the BOI had completed its job successfully, before the report was published", but had concluded that:

> "... the purpose for which BOIs are established and the perceived presentational need to prove to external parties that they carry out their work successfully cannot sensibly be reconciled."

121. Lt Gen Palmer advised that including an independent element would delay the BOI process, "yet bring no guarantee of adding value, credibility or acceptability of a Board's findings". Families' concerns could largely be met by the "administrative arrangements – including better communications – already put in place".

122. Ministers returned to the question of whether there should be an independent member on a BOI in 2007.

123. On 30 June, Lt Gen Palmer sent Mr Hoon a progress report on work to improve the BOI process.[78] Lt Gen Palmer wrote that it was "clear that we are failing to meet some families' expectations in respect of the quality and quantity of information we are providing to them". The key to improving the flow of information to families would be the new Senior Co-ordinators, who would ensure that BOIs proceeded quickly and that families were briefed on progress.

124. Lt Gen Palmer reflected on the role and impact of the Senior Co-ordinator in his evidence to the Inquiry:

> "... he was responsible for the progress of Boards of Inquiry. If there were delays, why there were delays and what should be done about it, and keeping, importantly, the families informed through the visiting officers as to what was going on.

> "We put that in place relatively quickly.
>
> "Now that did not immediately speed up the Boards of Inquiry, because some of them were quite complicated.
>
> "We have already alluded to a shortage of military police investigators ... but the emphasis – because I think this is what the grievance was – was lack of information. The families felt they were excluded from the process.
> "I personally believe, once we put ... in place ... a regular briefing for families about where their particular Board of Inquiry had got to, they were less exercised ..."[79]

125. Lt Gen Palmer also advised that all the "quick wins" identified in the BOI study were now in place; work continued to establish a robust disclosure policy and devise a mechanism to allow local commanders to initiate an immediate investigation in urgent and exceptional cases.

126. The target timeline for a BOI was tightened in June 2004, to allow 14 weeks from the incident to the formal release of the completed BOI report to the next of kin.[80] That timeline comprised eight weeks for the production of the BOI report and six weeks for advisers and senior officers to comment and complete it.

127. The BOI process was also amended at that time to include the production of additional progress reports for the next of kin.

128. The steps taken by the MOD to improve communication with and support for next of kin and bereaved families, including the review of bereavement procedures and the review of training for personnel involved in bereavement support, are described later in this Section.

Review of Service Police investigations, October 2004

129. During a meeting with Mr Hoon on 28 April 2004, a number of bereaved families expressed a lack of confidence in the Services' investigative processes.[81]

130. In response to those concerns, ACM Bagnall commissioned a review of the timeliness and effectiveness of Service Police investigations.[82]

131. The review, which reported in October, concluded that:

- There were no major issues that were not already being considered.
- There was no evidence that the quality of Service Police investigations was inadequate.

[82] Report Loudon, 12 October 2004, 'Review of Service Police Investigations on Operations'.

- Service Police in Basra were “operating at full stretch and had a considerable backlog”. A key constraint was that relatively few Service Police investigators were qualified to Level 3 (able to carry out the investigations into the most serious offences). More investigative personnel should be trained to the Level 3 standard, and deployed.
- Service Police in Basra needed more equipment and administrative support.[83]

132. On the timeliness of investigations, the review stated:

> “There can be both avoidable and unavoidable delays, but complex investigations and the post-investigative processes do take time and speed must not be at the expense of quality. That said, some trimming may be possible in respect of the timescales for some steps in the process.”

133. The review recommended that the timescales for the individual steps of the post-investigative process should be revalidated.

134. The review also identified the practical difficulties in undertaking investigations in a non-permissive environment such as Iraq, including:

- A number of Service Police personnel had been tasked to train the Iraqi Police Service.
- Service Police needed force protection, which was not always available.
- Access to the crime scene and to witnesses could be difficult, and could cause further tension.

135. Lt Gen Irwin told the Inquiry:

> “... as the operation [in Iraq] developed, it began to be something that came to my attention and, therefore, could be regarded as a possible problem, that the Royal Military Police were not there in sufficient numbers to do everything that was required of them in a completely timely fashion.
>
> “Now, of course, when you are trying to investigate incidents when there is shooting going on, there is always going to be a delay that would not occur in the normal circumstance, but nevertheless I began to get a feeling that maybe there were not enough military police in Iraq and maybe also that, extrapolating from that, there were not enough military policemen ... in the British Army.
> “So I spent – I would not say every day, but quite regularly I used to speak to the Provost Marshal (Army) and ask him the direct question, looking at him in the eye, ‘Have we got an issue here? Are your people bearing up to the strain? Are they going over too often with too short tour intervals? Do you want me to try to find some other way of reinforcing you, like doing something which the bureaucracy sometimes calls 'novel and contentious', which was to get civilian police to sort of come along and help?'

"The answer was always, 'We are a bit stretched, but we are fine'. My people and I just took that at, not exactly face value, but kept our eyes on it and at no stage did we ever have to do anything that was 'novel and contentious'."[84]

The deaths of six RMP Personnel at Majarr al Kabir

On 24 June 2003, six RMP Personnel – Sergeant Simon Hamilton-Jewell, Corporal Russell Aston, Corporal Paul Long, Corporal Simon Miller, Lance Corporal Benjamin Hyde, and Lance Corporal Thomas Keys – were killed at Majarr al Kabir in Iraq.

Mr Hoon informed the House of Commons on 17 November 2004 that a BOI into that incident had now completed its work.[85] Because of the "wider parliamentary and public interest", the MOD had taken the unusual step of providing a summary of the BOI's findings to Parliament and to the media. The families of those who died would be briefed by the President of the BOI, and would subsequently meet Mr Hoon to discuss the BOI's findings and any concerns they might have.

Continued criminal investigation prevented the BOI from considering the events that were the direct cause of the six deaths, but Mr Hoon informed the House:

> "The Board found that the incident at Al Majarr Al Kabir was a surprise attack, which could not reasonably have been predicted. The Board also found that a number of factors may potentially have had a bearing on the deaths of the six soldiers, including issues relating to ammunition, communications and command relationships within the battle group to which the Royal Military Police platoon was attached. The Board was not, however, able to state that any of these factors, either in isolation or in combination directly determined the six soldiers' fate."

Mr Hoon went on to acknowledge:

> "I am aware that some of the families have been critical of the Army's response to the deaths of the six soldiers. I hope they recognise the Board's work for the thorough and detailed review that it is. I hope, too, that they now have a much better understanding of the events leading up to the death of their loved ones and the wider context in which the events occurred, and can take some comfort from this."

The RMP suffered 12 fatalities during the course of Op TELIC, including the six fatalities at Majarr al Kabir.[86]

136. An April 2005 review of the MOD's future requirements for Service Policing recorded that "The recommendations of the [2004] review have largely been implemented".[87]

137. The 2005 review stated that, in relation to investigations on operations, "delay is still an issue". Delays were generally due to "overstretch and practical inhibitors", such as the need for force protection, rather than any specific failings on the part of the Service Police.

138. The review also stated that the "primary RMP output" in Iraq was now providing support for the reform of Iraq's security forces.

139. The review recorded that work on the future structure of the Army had resulted in an uplift of nearly 10 percent in the baseline figure for RMP manpower.

Changes to MOD processes

140. AM Pocock wrote to Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, on 17 August 2006 proposing that the timeline for conducting BOIs should be increased from 14 to 27 weeks.[88] The MOD was operating at "maximum efficiency, within resources" but, for the Army in particular, experience since the current timeline was introduced in June 2004 had shown that it was "not achievable". No Army BOI had met the current 14-week timeline. The Royal Navy and RAF did not have a problem with the current timeline but "saw merit" in extending it.

141. AM Pocock summarised the problems in meeting the current timelines:

- It was not possible to produce a Convening Order and Terms of Reference (TORs) for a BOI within 48 hours (as the current timeline required). TORs were often dependent on Service Police or LAIT reports, which could take "several months" to produce.
- It was not possible to "staff" a BOI report (secure comments from advisers and senior officers) within six weeks.

142. AM Pocock advised that underlying those problems was a resource issue. The Army was currently required to convene up to 20 BOIs a month (compared with one or two for the Royal Navy and RAF). It took time to identify and nominate suitable experienced and available Presidents, to confirm the Terms of Reference, and for officers to consider a BOI report.

143. AM Pocock closed his advice:

> "Delays in completing BOIs have been linked in the media to delays in Coroners' inquests. Some families ... have also been critical of the time it takes to complete BOIs. It is, however, unlikely that extending the BOI timeline will attract significant media coverage."

144. In an annex to his minute, AM Pocock analysed the reasons for delays in completing BOIs. It concluded that progress had been made since 2004 but that, against a background of an increasing number of incidents, "the rate of closure has now remained more or less constant since January 2005".

Creation of the Army Inquest Cell

145. In February 2007, in response to Ministerial concerns over the MOD's support for the inquests into the deaths of Sergeant Steven Roberts and Lance Corporal of Horse Matthew "Matty" Hull, the Army established a small Army Inquest Cell with a remit to, "through more effective handling of documents and stakeholders ... provide a better co-ordinated service to the Department [MOD], the coroner, and to the bereaved families".[89] Mr Ingram was advised that the Army's existing arrangements had been unable to manage the volume of work associated with inquests.

146. An MOD official advised Mr Ingram in March that good progress was being made in clearing the "backlog" of Army BOIs.[90] The Army Inquest Cell had "now assumed the role of managing of the Inquest process", allowing the Army Inquiries and Aftercare Support Cell (AIASC) to revert to its primary role of supporting bereaved families.

147. In June, Mr Ingram informed the House of Commons that the Army was planning to appoint permanent Presidents for BOIs, in order to deliver a more consistent approach and avoid delays.[91]

148. In January 2008, Mr Giles Ahern, MOD Deputy Director Personnel with responsibility for the Army Inquest Cell, advised General Sir Richard Dannatt, Chief of the General Staff, that the team had made "significant progress" in reducing the time taken to hold an inquest.[92]

149. Mr Ahern advised that, despite this progress, Ministers remained "very concerned" about the MOD's performance. The Army Inquest Cell was focusing on:

- The provision of information to families. In the past, families had received little formal information before the inquest about how their relative had died. AIASC now provided a "Record of Events" based on SIB findings, but that might only reach the family just before the inquest. The Cell was developing an "Initial Account" containing "some basic information", which could be passed to families about one month after a death.
- Timely completion of SIB and BOI reports. In a number of cases, completion of SIB and BOI reports was "judged to have taken longer than necessary". The Cell was trying to "expedite" completion and sign-off of reports by the chain of command.

- Ensuring that witnesses were properly prepared for inquests, by briefing them on their purpose and format.
- Handling of classified material. Recent lapses had resulted in the unauthorised release of classified US material; this had undermined Ministers' confidence in the MOD's management of inquests. A review was under way on whether the Services' support for inquests should be centralised, possibly using the model provided by the Cell.

Reducing the number of redactions in BOI reports released to families

150. The MOD released redacted versions of BOI reports to the next of kin and coroners. The version released to the next of kin was redacted to remove personal information relating to third parties, and security and operationally sensitive information. The version released to the coroner was redacted to remove certain security and operationally sensitive information only, with a request that the report was not introduced into court.[93]

151. The inclusion of the names of third parties in the version of the BOI released to the coroner allowed the coroner to identity potential witnesses for the inquest.

152. In November 2006, Ms Selena Lynch, Deputy Assistant Coroner for Oxfordshire, directed the MOD to provide a "full set of papers" to a bereaved family's legal team and indicated that she might consider a legal challenge if the MOD did not comply.[94]

153. Mr Chris Baker, MOD Director General Service Personnel, advised Mr Ingram on 22 January 2007:

> "It is evident that the manner in which some of the BOI reports have been redacted, by blocking out the names and text ... renders them unintelligible. Families and their respective Counsel claim that because they are unable to follow the narrative of the BOI it is difficult to consider whether to request the coroner to invite additional witnesses."

154. Mr Baker stated that the MOD's position was that the redaction of the names of third parties was necessary "to comply with both our responsibilities in accordance with the Data Protection Act 1998, and in common law, as an employer to protect the identity of current and former employees".

155. Mr Baker concluded that to meet the concerns of families and the coroner, the MOD would replace the names of third parties with unique identifiers (such as Person AA and Officer BB), which would enable families to follow the narrative of the BOI report more easily while still protecting individual identities.

[94] Minute Baker to PS/Minister(AF) [MOD], 22 January 2007, 'Board of Inquiry Reports – Disclosure for the Purposes of an Inquest'.

156. The MOD issued revised instructions for the disclosure of BOI reports in May.[95] The instructions advised that following the full implementation of the FOI Act on 1 January 2005, the current policy (of limited release of BOI reports outside the MOD) was no longer sustainable; the underlying principle of the FOI Act was that information should be available to members of the public on request unless it had an absolute exemption or there was an overriding public interest in withholding it.

157. The way in which BOIs were conducted would not change, but the reports should now be prepared in two parts:

- Part 1, which would be generally known as the "BOI Report", should include the convening order, terms of reference, findings, recommendations, and comments from senior officers. It should be carefully structured to ensure that it contained no exempt material or, if that was not possible, suitably redacted.
- Part 2 would include all other supporting documentation including witness statements and police and investigative reports.

158. There would also be a separate master "Schedule of Proceedings", listing everything that constituted the full BOI Report.

159. Part 1 of the full BOI Report would be proactively published by the MOD under their Publication Scheme. Requests for further information would be considered under the FOI Act in the normal way. Applicants could be provided with the Schedule of Proceedings to help them refine their request.

160. Next of kin should, in the first instance, be given only Part 1 of a BOI Report. Requests for information from Part 2 would be treated in the same way as other FOI requests (although it would normally be inappropriate to redact non-sensitive personal information about the family member). The instructions stated:

> "Although this may be seen as restricting what is given to next of kin, it should be borne in mind that Part 1 ... will be a synthesis of all the relevant information presented to the Board. Although the next of kin should always be treated in a sympathetic and helpful manner, the provisions of the FOI Act and DPA98 and other relevant legislation and common law must be observed."

161. Coroners would "continue to be provided with the full unredacted copy of the report (Parts 1 and 2)", on the understanding that the report contained only information owned by the UK and was not quoted from or admitted into evidence without further reference to the MOD.

162. The instructions directed that where names were redacted, they should be replaced by a unique identifier.

163. In early November, Ms Lynch issued her ruling on the death of Fusilier Gordon Gentle.[96] She concluded that it was probable that the roadside bomb that killed him would not have detonated if a disabling device had been fitted to the vehicle in which he was travelling.

164. The press reported that Ms Lynch had described the MOD's policies for the disclosure of evidence to the inquest as "illogical and based on errors of law",[97] and that she had stated that the inquest had been delayed by the MOD's failure to provide documents and their policy of redacting names from the documents that were provided.[98]

165. Sir Bill Jeffrey advised Mr Ainsworth in February 2008, in the context of a paper on how to improve the BOI system, that while the MOD continued to face criticism over the redaction of BOI reports, "we have gone as far as practicable within the law".[99]

166. An MOD/Ministry of Justice (MOJ) information booklet for bereaved families on the BOI and inquest processes, which was issued in 2008, stated that "where names are removed, each will be replaced with a term like Person A, Person B to help you follow the sequence of events in the report".[100]

167. A number of the BOI reports seen by the Inquiry have followed this practice.

Creation of the Defence Inquests Unit

168. In early February 2007, the MOD sought and received an adjournment to the inquest into the death of Lance Corporal of Horse Matthew "Matty" Hull, who had been killed in a friendly-fire incident with US forces in 2003, to allow them more time to secure US agreement to the use in court of a US cockpit recording of the incident.[101]

169. The adjournment came as the UK was negotiating with the US Government on US participation in inquests into the deaths of UK Service Personnel. Those negotiations are described later in this Section.

170. Mr Baker wrote to MOD officials on 19 February advising that, in the light of the inquest into the death of L Cpl Hull, MOD Ministers might wish to have a "further urgent examination" of the BOI process, possibly including "a fundamental review as to whether [BOIs] can be considered fit for purpose given the wider uses to which they are increasingly put".[102] Mr Baker asked recipients to provide "positive points ... in support of the BOI system as it currently stands" and information on planned improvements.

171. Mr Ingram subsequently met Mr Baker and other MOD officials to discuss work already in hand to improve the BOI process.[103] Mr Ingram's Private Secretary recorded that Mr Ingram:

> "... postulated that there might be a need to consider a more radical approach; that rather than working to make the current system work better, we might need to consider adopting a different system."

172. Mr Baker said that he had already discussed the possibility of a more radical approach with the Services, and concluded that "there was no realistic alternative to the BOI process". The MOD needed a thorough process of examination in order to learn lessons, and needed to be able to ensure that it could be undertaken quickly and address all the relevant issues. Mr Baker advised that the arguments for continuing with the BOI process would be set out in a submission.

173. An MOD official working in Mr Baker's Directorate sent Mr Ingram's Private Office advice on the "rationale for continuing with the BOI process" on 2 March.[104]

174. The official identified three alternative mechanisms for establishing the facts surrounding an incident – Learning Accounts, Service Police investigations, and inquests – and concluded that none of them met the MOD's requirements.

175. The official concluded that the current BOI system played a "valuable role" in "establishing the full details of the circumstances surrounding an incident and in learning the lessons to prevent a recurrence". Particular advantages were:

- BOIs enabled the MOD to fulfil its duty of care and health and safety obligations towards its employees.
- Investigations into sensitive matters could be carried out "within the Service environment and by the relevant subject matter experts".
- As BOIs did not seek to apportion blame, and evidence given to a BOI could not be used in a Service court, witnesses might be more candid than in another type of investigation.
- BOIs were "tried and tested and worked well".

The official also described the work under way to improve the BOI process.

176. The BOI report into the loss of Nimrod XV230 in September 2006 (in Afghanistan) was published on 4 December 2007. Mr Browne told the House of Commons on the same day:

> "By its nature, the Board was not in a position to go into the history of those arrangements [for assessing the airworthiness of Nimrod aircraft] or to assess where responsibility lies for failures ... Flying will never be risk-free. But I do believe > that the families of those who died are due more of an explanation of the history than the Board of Inquiry could be expected to provide. I have therefore decided to put in place a review of the arrangements for assuring the airworthiness and safe operation of the Nimrod aircraft over its service life; to assess where responsibility lies for any failures; to assess more broadly the process for compiling safety cases, taking account of best practice in the civilian and military world; and to make recommendations."[105]

177. Mr Browne discussed the BOI into the loss of Nimrod XV230 with MOD Ministerial colleagues the following day.[106] He said that the MOD would shortly announce the name of the Queen's Counsel who would lead the independent review. It would be important for the families to be able to feed their questions into that process.

178. During the meeting, MOD Ministers concluded that the Nimrod BOI was "a further example of the [BOI] process not necessarily being suited to the requirements of the MOD, the individuals and families involved and, crucially, public expectation". Mr Browne suggested that there might be merit in a new process comprising:

> "... a short, focused Learning Account style review ... conducted in a matter of a few months followed, as required, by a further review to look beyond the immediate circumstances and which was empowered to engage with individuals and the families affected by the incident, had an independent element and could draw from the advice of those who were well-practiced in preparing for evidence-based reviews".

179. Mr Browne's Private Secretary asked Mr Bill Jeffrey, the MOD's Permanent Under Secretary,[107] to provide "advice on the scope and options for improving the BOI process" by the end of January.

180. Mr Browne's Private Office wrote to Mr Ainsworth's Private Office later that week, reporting Mr Browne's concern that recent good progress in clearing the backlog of inquests would not be sustained as the military investigation/BOI process was moving too slowly.[108] Particular concerns included:

- The significant number of cases (13) over six months that were still awaiting completion of a BOI or RMP investigation, or even a decision on whether a BOI was required. In one case, a decision on whether to hold a BOI was still awaited nearly one year after the incident.
- The number of cases where the Swindon and Wiltshire Coroner was awaiting SIB reports.

[108] Minute APS/Secretary of State [MOD] to PS/Minister(AF) [MOD], 7 December 2007, 'BOI and Inquest Backlog'.

181. Mr Browne asked Mr Ainsworth to look into the backlog of incomplete BOIs and "investigate what further action should be taken to speed up this process, including whether additional staff resource is needed in theatre".

182. On 28 February, Mr Ainsworth and Ms Bridget Prentice (Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Ministry of Justice), met Mr Andrew Walker (Assistant Deputy Coroner for Oxfordshire) and Mr David Masters (Coroner for Wiltshire & Swindon), at Mr Ainsworth's request, to discuss what could be done to accelerate the inquest process.[109]

183. Ms Prentice's Assistant Private Secretary recorded that Mr Walker had welcomed the new Army Inquest Cell, which had had "a profound effect" on the conduct of inquests into the deaths of Army Personnel. Working with the Cell, he had trialed a number of proposals to improve and streamline the inquest process.

184. Mr Walker described how that new partnership had worked in a recent inquest:

> "Despite the fact that there was extremely sensitive intelligence involved, the inquest was completed within 12 months from the date of the incident. The key difference was that he [Mr Walker] had been in contact with the Board of Inquiry (BOI) team from the beginning of their investigation and was kept informed throughout, enabling him sufficient time to build up the technical knowledge required to adequately conduct the inquest. Crucially, this early involvement avoided the complicated 'cold' handover from the BOI to the inquest."

185. Both coroners felt that the new arrangement enabled them to update families more effectively on progress and to respond to their needs.

186. Both coroners contrasted that positive experience, with their experiences with the Royal Navy and RAF. In one case, they said that they had had to wait four months "for a signature on a piece of paper". In four cases, it was alleged to have taken over a year to reach a decision on whether or not to hold a BOI. The coroners felt that the establishment of a tri-Service Inquest Cell based on the Army model would be a "very positive step".

187. The MOD team confirmed that the idea of a tri-Service Inquest Cell was being considered, and highlighted the greater complexity often associated with Royal Navy and RAF BOIs.

188. Mr Ainsworth told the Inquiry that he had considered the end-to-end process of investigating fatalities and had taken the unusual step of meeting both Mr Walker and Mr Masters to discuss ways in which the MOD could help.[110] He recalled some anxiety that a meeting might be seen as interfering with the coroners' independence, but he believed that it was possible both to respect that independence and to seek to understand "how the system is working for them from their point of view".

189. Sir Bill Jeffrey responded to the requests for advice on how the BOI process could be improved and how the existing process could be accelerated in a minute to Mr Ainsworth at the end of February 2008.[111]

190. Sir Bill advised that, in response to Mr Browne's question, it would be possible to hold a relatively short fact-finding exercise followed by a "fuller inquiry into the whole course of events". While the Nimrod XV230 BOI included a careful investigation of the incident itself, its remit did not extend into the history and safety record of the Nimrod; that question was now being examined by Mr Charles Haddon-Cave. Where there was "a need to capture the broader departmental perspective, and where there is high public interest in the case", the remit of the BOI could be broadened or a "further reaching independent inquiry", running concurrently with the BOI, could be held.

191. Sir Bill also advised that:

- A new direction should be issued to the chain of command, that families should always be briefed as soon as practicable after an incident and kept regularly informed thereafter.
- A new joint Secretariat should be established, building on the Army's Inquest Cell, to co-ordinate all three Services' management of inquests, the relationship with coroners and joint reports to Ministers.

192. The Army had appointed Permanent Presidents to lead high-profile Army BOIs; the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force were taking steps to establish "pools of expertise" from which Presidents could be selected.

193. There were currently 100 open inquests. That was "below last summer's peak of 132, but still well above the backlog of 80 inquests that was judged to be unacceptable in Spring 2006". The use of pre-inquest hearings, while a valuable contribution to the inquest process, could introduce delays into the process. Coroners often waited for access to the MOD's reports, including BOI reports, before undertaking an inquest. Sir Bill commented: "We must show coroners that we treat our investigations as matters of urgency so that we might expect them to do the same."

194. On 9 April, Mr Ainsworth met senior officials and military officers to discuss Sir Bill's advice.[112] Mr Ainsworth stated that he and Mr Browne remained of the view that there needed to be a "step change in the way in which the BOI and inquest process was handled, end-to-end". He had already discussed the advice with Sir Bill, and agreed that it formed "a good basis for further discussion". The key proposal was the establishment of a "single inquest cell".

195. The meeting agreed that a single inquest cell should be established as a matter of urgency. Key responsibilities would be to:

- professionally manage the MOD's relationship with coroners;
- chase progress on BOIs in order to "drive down" the time between incident and inquest; it would need sufficient "authority and clout" to do that;
- identify weaknesses in policy and ensure they were addressed, and ensure that existing policy and best practice was adhered to; the lead for developing policy would often sit outside the cell; and
- ensure the right training and guidance was provided to VOs.

196. The cell would not carry out BOIs (which would continue to be the responsibility for the Services).

197. Mr Ainsworth's Private Secretary recorded that, although the other proposals made by Sir Bill had not been discussed in any detail at the meeting, Mr Ainsworth would like them "taken forward in the context of the establishment of the new cell".

198. The Defence Inquests Unit (DIU) was created in May 2008 to act as the focal point for all coroners' inquests into the deaths of Service and MOD civilian personnel.[113]

199. The Army Inquest Cell was disbanded on the creation of the DIU, and its posts moved into the DIU.[114]

200. Mr Ainsworth told the Inquiry that the role of the DIU was not just to ensure that the MOD was providing the support that coroners required:

> "… my motives were more than just helping the bereaved, they were about the MOD getting better at learning some of the lessons that flowed from inquests … some of our systems were, from time to time, exposed pretty badly by coroners' inquests and, you know, they were a mine of information … if you were prepared to really embrace the findings …"[115]

201. Mr Mike Venables, Head of the DIU from 2009 to 2012, described the DIU's role as supporting bereaved families by making sure that coroners had everything they needed.[116] This included:

- providing all relevant reports and information, and explaining that material where necessary;

- helping to identify and locate military witnesses;
- organising familiarisation events on military equipment for coroners; and
- providing support to witnesses.

202. Mr Venables also indicated that the creation of the DIU served to change the MOD's policy on legal representation at inquests. The MOD had tended to be legally represented at inquests:

> "But we took the view that some families see that as intimidating. It looked as though the big bad Ministry had turned up, so now, even if the families choose to have a barrister, we tend not to, we ... send a case officer."

Introduction of Service Inquiries

203. Section 343 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 (AFA 2006), which came into force on 1 October 2008, provided for the establishment of a single form of statutory inquiry – the Service Inquiry (SI) – for all the Services.[117]

204. The Royal Navy, Army and RAF had previously held inquiries under the Prerogative, Army Act 1955 and Air Force Act 1955 respectively.

205. The MOD told the Inquiry that the AFA 2006 represented the first complete overhaul of the Service justice system in 50 years, harmonising practices and procedures across the Services to provide a single system of Service law.

206. The MOD also told the Inquiry that SIs had the same purpose as BOIs (subject to its terms of reference, to establish the facts of a particular matter and make recommendations to prevent recurrence).

Support for the Oxfordshire Coroner

207. From March 2003 to 1 April 2007, military fatalities on Op TELIC were repatriated to RAF Brize Norton in Oxfordshire.

208. In early 2005, Mr Gardiner applied to the Oxfordshire County Council, then to the Home Office, and finally to the MOD for additional funding to enable him to carry out his duties.[118]

209. In May 2005, the MOD convened a series of meetings with officials from the Home Office and the Department for Constitutional Affairs (DCA)[119] to consider how to resolve the immediate problem and "explore alternative arrangements to ensure that the issue does not reoccur".

210. On 24 May, the Home Office provided £80,000 to allow Mr Gardiner's office to recruit an additional Coroner's Officer to help manage inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel in Iraq.[120]

211. Mr Don Touhig, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Defence, told the House of Commons in early June 2005 that the decision to provide support to Mr Gardiner's office predated recent press reports on delays in holding inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel.[121]

212. A June 2007 DCA briefing assessed that that support had "little effect" on the backlog.[122] The main constraint was the time that Mr Gardiner himself was able to devote to considering case papers in preparation for inquests.

213. On 6 February 2006, Ms Harriet Harman, Minister of State for the DCA, informed the House of Commons that she intended to bring forward legislation to reform the coroner service:

> "Under the current coroner service, families frequently get overlooked during the inquest process ... The system is fragmented, with no national leadership, and it is not accountable ... Standards are not uniformly good; everything rests too much on the personal qualities and abilities of individuals within the system. The legal framework is downright archaic. For most coroners, this is not even their principal occupation; it is a secondary one, added on to their main work as solicitors in private practice ...
> "The coroner service must serve the public interest and meet bereaved families' concerns in a way that, frankly, it currently does not ..."[123]

214. In May 2006, in response to renewed Parliamentary concern over delays in holding inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel, Ms Harman was charged with "dealing with the problem".[124]

215. On 22 May, Ms Harman wrote to Mr Browne suggesting that they meet to discuss how to clear the backlog of inquests in Oxfordshire.[125] It was important that all coroners conducted inquests in good time; she was particularly concerned that the families of Service Personnel should not face a long wait before an inquest was concluded.

216. Ms Harman wrote:

- The DCA had been endeavouring to get a full picture of the extent of the delays, working with MOD officials and Mr Gardiner's Office, and had compiled a grid showing the number of inquests yet to be undertaken. That analysis indicated that there were 39 military deaths and 5 civilian deaths relating to Iraq in the "inquest queue", excluding cases where Mr Gardiner was waiting for evidential material from the MOD.
- The first military deaths in that queue related to the loss of a Sea King helicopter on 22 March 2003.[126] The first deaths on which Mr Gardiner had not yet received material from the MOD related to the loss of a CH46 helicopter on 21 March 2003.
- Mr Gardiner estimated that to clear the backlog, he would need an additional Assistant Deputy Coroner and continued funding for the additional Coroner's Officer, at a cost of £125,000 a year for two years. DCA officials had not yet assessed whether that estimate was realistic. The DCA was "poorly placed" to provide that funding. If those resources could not be found, the current position that most inquests were held in Oxfordshire (rather than in the home area of the deceased) would need to be reconsidered.

217. Ms Harman, Mr Browne and Mr Ingram met on 24 May.[127] Ms Harman advised that further work by DCA officials suggested that £250,000 would be required over six months in order to list or complete all cases by the end of the year.

218. A record of the meeting by Mr Browne's Assistant Private Secretary, which was circulated only within the MOD, reported that Mr Browne had agreed that if there was a "practical plan" to reduce the backlog and there was no possibility of securing funding from the Reserve, then he was "prepared in principle to put in £125,000 for the first year".

219. An informal record of the meeting by a DCA official reported that Mr Browne had agreed to provide £125,000, and to hold a further £125,000 "in reserve" which could be made available depending on progress.[128]

220. In a Written Ministerial Statement to the House of Commons on 5 June, Ms Harman and Mr Browne set out the support that the Government would provide to the Oxfordshire Coroner's office to enable it to deal with "outstanding inquests":

- three Assistant Deputy Coroners (Sir Richard Curtis, Ms Selena Lynch and Mr Andrew Walker);

- two additional Coroner's Officers;
- an additional member of support staff; and
- recording equipment which would enable two extra courts to operate simultaneously.[129]

221. There were currently 59 inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel killed in Iraq and 11 inquests into the deaths of civilians to be concluded. Mr Gardiner expected, with this additional support, to be able to conclude inquests into the deaths of 30 Service Personnel where the MOD had completed their own inquiries and case papers had been prepared, and conclude inquests into the deaths of three civilians where he had been provided with reports and other information, by the end of the year.

222. Ms Harman and Mr Browne undertook to report quarterly to Parliament on progress in clearing the backlog of outstanding inquests.

223. As the Statement was being drafted, Ms Harman expressed her strong view that it should be sent to the families of deceased Service Personnel before it was laid in Parliament.[130]

224. DCA officials advised that they were "not convinced" by that proposal, and that it was in any case impractical as the MOD was "not prepared" to supply family contact details.[131]

225. Ms Harman and Mr Browne agreed on 1 June that the Statement should be sent to families before it was laid in Parliament.[132]

226. Two of the three Assistant Deputy Coroners were appointed in early June, the third in early August.[133]

227. The effectiveness of the additional support provided to the Oxfordshire Coroner's office in clearing the outstanding inquests is considered below.

228. In July, as the capacity of the Oxfordshire Coroner's office was being increased, the MOD extended the target timelines for the completion of BOIs; that decision is described earlier in this Section.

229. By the end of July, it had become clear that the MOD and DCA did not have a shared understanding of how much, and at what point, the MOD would contribute to the cost of the additional support provided to the Oxfordshire Coroner's office.

The discussions between the DCA, the MOD, and the Treasury from July 2006 to February 2007 on that issue are described below.

230. The DCA bore the costs that were being incurred by the Oxfordshire Coroner's office while those discussions continued.[134]

DISCUSSIONS ON FUNDING

231. On 22 May 2006, Mr Alex Allan, Permanent Secretary at the DCA, and Mr Ian Andrews, 2nd Permanent Under Secretary at the MOD, discussed how the additional funding required by the Oxfordshire Coroner might be found.[135] Mr Allan's Assistant Private Secretary reported that Mr Allan had stated that neither the local authority nor the DCA could provide that additional funding. Mr Andrews said that the Treasury met the MOD's "operational costs", and indicated that the funding for the Oxfordshire Coroner should be included within that arrangement.[136] That would be for the MOD to explore with the Treasury.

232. On 20 July, Ms Harman sent Mr Browne an update on progress on clearing the backlog of inquests, and concluded that she "hoped that we can clarify the amount of money you will pay".[137]

233. On the same day, Ms Harman wrote to Lord Falconer of Thoroton, the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs and Lord Chancellor, asking if he would speak to Mr Browne to ensure that Mr Browne's decision to provide £250,000 would be communicated to MOD finance officials.[138]

234. Mr Browne replied to Ms Harman on 14 August stating that, as he had previously indicated, given that the inquests were a result of operational commitments, his preference would be for the additional funding to be sought through a call against the Reserve.[139] He stood ready to support a request to the Treasury. If funding could not be secured from the Reserve, he was "in principle willing to provide a contribution of £125,000 for the first year towards the financial costs of the additional resources, subject to Accounting Officer and Treasury approval".

235. Lord Falconer wrote to Mr Browne later that month, stating that £125,000 was insufficient to cover the costs involved and that, while DCA officials would look at the suggestion of making a bid on the Reserve, "given that the backlog is driven by the MOD's policy to repatriate Iraq fatalities to RAF Brize Norton in Oxfordshire" it would not be appropriate for the DCA to make that bid.[140]

236. Mr Browne replied on 10 September, stating that while there was a strong case for funding the additional costs from the Reserve, the Treasury would expect the bid to come from the Department responsible for coronial policy.[141]

237. Lord Falconer replied on 6 October, advising that while the DCA held policy responsibility for coroners, operational responsibility rested with the relevant local authority.[142] In this case, it would normally be for Oxfordshire County Council to meet the costs of the inquests. He continued:

> "The Cabinet Office Ministerial Code of Conduct (paragraph 6.10) clearly sets out the principle that Departments responsible for initiating policy are required to take into account the effect their proposals have on other departments. It is MOD policy to repatriate bodies to RAF Brize Norton rather than Lyneham, Fairford or elsewhere and it is a direct result of this decision that the backlog of cases has occurred. If fatalities were shared amongst a number of coroners this problem would have been avoided.
> "It is for this reason that I consider that it is your Department's responsibility to shoulder the costs arising from the Iraq inquest backlog ... If you are unable to fund the additional resources from your existing budget then it is for your Department, not mine, to approach the Treasury for a Reserve claim."

238. Officials from the MOD, the DCA and the Department for Communities and Local Government (DCLG) met on 8 November to discuss funding options.[143]

239. A DCA official reported to DCA colleagues only that all three departments had difficulties in providing funding from within their existing budgets. The MOD had argued, for the first time, that it would be inappropriate for the MOD to be seen to be funding the inquest process when it had a clear interest in the cases involved. The meeting had agreed that DCA officials should approach the Treasury informally to see whether funding from the Reserve could be made available and, if not, whether they could suggest an alternative solution.

240. A DCA official advised Ms Harman on 13 December that the Treasury had "not replied positively" to that approach.[144] The DCA had subsequently written to the MOD, asking it to confirm that it would provide the necessary funding.

241. On 7 January 2007, Mr Lee McCauley, MOD Assistant Director of Defence Resources and Plans, wrote to a Treasury official to advise him that the MOD had "reluctantly concluded" that all additional costs related to the Oxfordshire Coroner should be "funded this year through Defence".[145] There were several arguments against doing so, but Ministers wanted the issue to be resolved. Treasury approval would be required, as the MOD did not have authority to meet costs that fell to other parts of Government.

242. Mr McCauley proposed that the MOD treat the costs as part of the Net Additional Cost of Military Operations (NACMO), and claim them from the Treasury in the normal way. If that was not possible, the MOD would need to find the funds within its core settlement.

243. On 13 February 2007, Mr Browne wrote to Ms Harman:

> "My officials have explored at length with the Treasury the possibility of making a claim against the Reserve. The Treasury have refused on the principle that such costs should lie where they fall and this is not a legitimate charge to Defence for the additional costs of operations. In light of this, I cannot accept an argument that the backlog stems solely from MOD policy: there are sound practical reasons for repatriation of bodies to RAF Brize Norton but there are also, as the current initiative[146] shows, ways in which the burden may be shared with other coroners."[147]

244. Mr Browne concluded by confirming that he held to his earlier offer to contribute £125,000 towards the additional costs of the Oxfordshire Coroner during 2006/07. That contribution should not be seen as setting a precedent for MOD funding to address "future inquest backlogs, should they arise".

245. Ms Harman replied on 27 March, expressing her disappointment with that contribution but confirming that she would accept it.[148] She would expect the MOD to contribute if further backlogs emerged.

PROGRESS IN CLEARING THE BACKLOG OF INQUESTS

246. Ministers provided quarterly reports to the House of Commons on progress in clearing the backlog of inquests in Oxfordshire. The table below summarises these reports.

247. The first report, in June 2006, covered only outstanding inquests into deaths relating to Iraq.[149] Subsequent reports included outstanding inquests relating to previous conflicts and military exercises overseas, for which the Oxfordshire Coroner was responsible.

248. Ms Harman informed the House of Commons on 12 October that Mr Gardiner would not be able to meet the target set in her June 2006 update for the completion of pre-June 2006 inquests (the end of 2006).[150]

249. The June 2007 report stated that of the 72 inquests which had been completed by the Oxfordshire Coroner's Office since June 2006, Mr Gardiner had conducted five, Sir Richard Curtis six, Ms Selena Lynch 28, Mr Andrew Walker 32, and Ms Jennifer Leeming, the Greater Manchester West Coroner, one.[157]

250. The additional resources provided by the Government in June 2006 enabled the Oxfordshire Coroner's office to clear the backlog of outstanding inquests (into deaths occurring before June 2006) by October 2007.

251. The two outstanding inquests reported in the October 2007 report related to the deaths of Fusilier Gordon Gentle on 28 June 2004 and Lieutenant Richard Palmer on 15 April 2006. The inquest into Fusilier Gentle's death was due to open on 29 October 2007. The coroner had decided to await the completion of the BOI into Lt Palmer's death before opening an inquest; that inquest would therefore not be held until 2008.

Efforts to transfer more inquests to local coroners

252. In early September 2006, after discussions with DCA officials, Mr Gardiner alerted coroners that the additional resources he had received from the Government were not intended to be "long term" and were only to reduce the current backlog of cases.[158] He was, therefore, likely to "increasingly be making transfer requests under Section 14(i) of the Coroners Act 1988".

253. A DCA official advised Ms Harman on 6 October that Mr Gardiner's office was now receiving a significant number of fatalities from Afghanistan, as well as from Iraq.[159] The additional resources announced on 5 June only covered inquests that were outstanding at that date. The DCA had "serious doubts" that Mr Gardiner's office could handle the new (post-June 2006) cases, once the pre-June backlog was cleared and staffing levels returned to normal.

254. The official commented that it was not helpful that the MOD continued to repatriate bodies to RAF Brize Norton: DCA and MOD officials were meeting shortly to discuss that issue.

255. MOD and DCA officials met on 18 October to reconsider the policy of repatriating the bodies of deceased Service Personnel via RAF Brize Norton.[160] Points made in the discussion included:

- Mr Gardiner was "considering transferring cases to other jurisdictions, but in limited circumstances". That was in line with established policy. Mr Gardiner would not be transferring cases where there were multiple deaths in a single incident, and all transfers required the agreement of the receiving coroner.
- Arrangements for inquests relating to incidents in 2003 and 2004 were "well in hand", but there were still "serious delays" to later inquests and the number of bodies repatriated to RAF Brize Norton was increasing.
- One unavoidable factor behind those delays was the need to wait for a BOI to conclude before beginning an inquest.
- It was crucial to keep families informed of progress.
- MOD officials felt that Mr Gardiner and his officers provided effective support to families through the inquest process.
- DCA officials considered that Mr Gardiner's office would be unable to cope with the workload once the additional resources provided by the Government were removed.

256. The meeting considered a number of options, and agreed that:

- The MOD should continue to use RAF Brize Norton.
- MOD policy should be amended, so that when a death occurred (and before the body was repatriated), the appropriate local coroner would be alerted that the body of the deceased would be coming into their district.
- The body would be taken to the local coroner immediately after the repatriation ceremony. Such a policy "would avoid the need to involve the Oxfordshire Coroner at all".

257. Ms Harman wrote to Mr Gardiner on 17 November, following up on discussions between Mr Gardiner and DCA officials, to seek his views on that approach.[161]

258. Mr Gardiner replied on 21 November, recalling that the Coroner's Act required him to hold an inquest if he was informed that a body was within his jurisdiction and the death appeared violent or unnatural, and advised:

> "In practice it is inevitable that I will be informed, either directly or through my Officers, of any bodies in my jurisdiction. Indeed ... I would be failing in my duties if I had not over the years established appropriate lines of communication."[162]

259. Mr Gardiner also advised that he had had informal discussions with a number of coroners, and most of them had indicated that they would accept transfers from him under Section 14 of the Coroners Act. Since he had alerted coroners to the likelihood that he would be transferring more cases (in early September), he had transferred three cases.

260. On 4 December, Ms Harman met relatives of Service Personnel killed in Iraq to discuss their experience of the investigation and inquest process and the coroners' service.[163] The meeting, which was facilitated by an external organisation called Opinion Leader, was attended by 17 relatives from 12 families.

261. A record of the meeting by a DCA official highlighted relatives' concern over the distance they had to travel to inquests (there was a "particular difficulty" with Scottish fatalities as there was no discretion to hold a Fatal Accident Inquiry in Scotland where the death occurred overseas), and the perceived failure of the MOD to provide them with all documentation before the inquest.[164] The official commented that the Oxfordshire Coroner had been encouraged to transfer cases to other coroners. The DCA was also exploring ways to transfer a body directly to a local coroner.

262. Discussions on whether a Fatal Accident Inquiry could be held for all Scottish fatalities are addressed later in this Section.

263. On 13 December, a DCA official advised Ms Harman that the Oxfordshire Coroner's office continued to receive a significant number of fatalities from Iraq and Afghanistan (15 and 33 respectively, since June).[165] The DCA continued to have serious doubts about whether it could cope with that workload. The Coroner's office had "raised the possibility" of extending the additional staff until all inquests (pre- and post-June 2006) had been cleared, but the DCA had advised them that that would be a matter for Oxfordshire County Council.

264. Ms Harman told the House of Commons on 18 December that, following the 4 December meeting, the DCA was "working on providing families with better information about the inquest system, how we can help families to have access to all material relevant to the inquest, and holding inquests closer to where the relatives live".[166]

265. Ms Harman wrote to Mr Browne on the same day, highlighting five areas identified at the 4 December meeting where changes might improve a family's experience:

- Holding the inquest closer to the family's home, rather than in Oxford. The DCA was encouraging Mr Gardiner to transfer cases to other coroners as a way of reducing his backlog. Another possibility would be to repatriate the bodies of deceased Service Personnel directly to the family's local coroner without any involvement by the Oxfordshire Coroner.[167]
- Creating an information pack for families of deceased Service Personnel which described what to expect from an inquest and where to go for further support. Ms Harman suggested that DCA and MOD officials should discuss the contents of the pack.[168]
- Establishing a "victims' advocate service" for families, similar to the Coroner's Court Support Service but tailored to address the particular problems of families of those killed abroad and in conflict. The service could build on the support already provided by Visiting Officers.
- Ensuring earlier and more complete advance disclosure of documents and key facts to families.
- Ending the practice of charging families for access to documents, including inquest transcripts.

266. The Opinion Leader record of the 4 December meeting, which issued in January 2007, reported that the Coroner's service had not sufficiently met the needs of most families.[169] It identified six main issues:

- the time between incident and inquest (more than three years in some cases);
- insufficient notification of an inquest, leaving little opportunity to prepare;
- not having access to key information;
- specific problems with the running of the inquest (including key witnesses not being present, factual errors, and not having the opportunity to ask questions);
- a lack of sensitivity in the treatment of families; and
- cost and logistical issues (including being asked to pay for documents and the difficulty faced by some families in paying for legal representation).

267. The report advised that families had also raised concerns relating to their treatment by the media and the Army's investigative processes.

268. On 22 January 2007, Mr David Cameron, the MP for Witney, in whose constituency RAF Brize Norton was located, wrote to Lord Falconer stating that it was "patently unfair" that Oxfordshire County Council should have to provide funding to clear post-June 2006 inquests.[170] The Council estimated that the Coroner's office would require an additional £100,000.

269. On 13 February, Mr Browne replied to Ms Harman's letter of 18 December:

> "... I understand that your officials have confirmed with the Oxfordshire Coroner that provided the body is not formally reported to him he would be content for the repatriated body to be transferred directly from Brize Norton after the ceremonial to the area of the 'home' coroner."[171]

270. Mr Browne commented that this was a welcome development, provided that flexibility was retained; there would be occasions when the Oxfordshire Coroner, with the pathology services available to him, would be able to release a body to the family more quickly than a local coroner.

271. On 27 March, a DCA official advised Ms Harman that the DCA's line that Oxfordshire County Council should provide funding was "becoming harder to maintain".[172] It was important that Mr Walker was retained to deal with the post-June 2006 backlog. The DCA would look to the MOD to provide funding, but it was certain to resist.

272. Ms Harman informed the House of Commons on 29 March that the Government had made further resources available to the Oxfordshire Coroner office's to enable Mr Walker to remain as Assistant Deputy Coroner and to enable one Coroner's Officer to be retained, to handle the new (post-June 2006) backlog of inquests.[173]

273. Ms Harman advised Mr Browne at the end of March that, since the Oxfordshire Coroner was now routinely transferring inquests to the appropriate local coroner, there had been no need to repatriate bodies directly to a local coroner without any involvement by the Oxfordshire Coroner.[174] Ms Harman understood that the practice of transferring single death inquests would be followed by the Swindon and Wiltshire Coroner (when fatalities began to be repatriated through RAF Lyneham from 1 April).

Support for the Swindon and Wiltshire Coroner

274. From 1 April 2007, due to essential repair work at RAF Brize Norton, ceremonial repatriations took place through RAF Lyneham in Wiltshire.

275. In May, the DCA took on certain responsibilities from the Home Office and was renamed the Ministry of Justice (MOJ). Ms Harman retained Ministerial responsibility for coronial policy.

276. Mr David Masters, the Coroner for Wiltshire & Swindon, wrote to the Ministry of Justice on 21 May, requesting additional resources for his office to enable it to deal with the bodies of Service Personnel killed in Iraq and Afghanistan.[175]

277. An MOJ official advised Ms Harman that she should resist providing additional funding, but offer Mr Masters a meeting with MOJ and MOD officials to discuss his workload and possible options. There was a risk that without additional funding a backlog could develop (as it had in Oxfordshire), but there was also a case for challenging the argument that Mr Masters could not cope without it.

278. Ms Harman replied to Mr Masters on those lines.[176]

279. Subsequently, against a background of Parliamentary concern over the possibility that the backlog of inquests was increasing, she agreed with Mr Jack Straw, Secretary of State for Justice and Lord Chancellor, that he should meet Mr Masters.

280. Mr Straw and Ms Prentice met Mr Masters on 23 July.[177] Mr Masters said that he had transferred 17 cases relating to single deaths to other coroners, but retained jurisdiction in 16 cases relating to multiple deaths or where the deceased was from Scotland. He needed additional staffing and resources to deal with the additional workload. Mr Straw and Ms Prentice both said that they were "sympathetic" to that request.

281. Mr Straw and Mr Browne agreed later that month that the MOJ and the MOD should share the cost of supporting Mr Masters' office,[178] and in October that their Departments should share the cost equally.[179] The cost for 2007/08 was likely to be £230,000, and £350,000 a year thereafter.

282. In October, an MOJ official advised Ms Prentice that there was no backlog of military inquests in Wiltshire and Swindon.[180]

283. The Coroners and Justice Bill, which was introduced into Parliament in January 2009, included a number of measures to ensure that any future backlogs of inquests could be addressed more easily. The Bill is described later in this Section.

Efforts to improve the inquest process, 2006 to 2009

US participation in inquests

284. Ms Harman wrote to Mr David Johnson, the Deputy Chief of Mission at the US Embassy in London, on 20 July 2006 about "the need for US co-operation which was contributing to delays in inquests" into the deaths of British Service Personnel in Iraq.[181]

285. The inquest into the death of Mr Terry Lloyd, an Independent Television News (ITN) journalist who died in a friendly fire incident with US forces on 22 March 2003, was conducted by Mr Andrew Walker, the Assistant Deputy Coroner for Oxfordshire, in October 2006. Mr Walker found that Mr Lloyd had been unlawfully killed.

286. In early August, as part of the preparations for that inquest, MOD and FCO officials met US Embassy staff on behalf of Mr Walker, to try to secure US authority to use a US Marine Corps report into one part of the incident and additional material covering the precise circumstances of Mr Lloyd's death.[182]

287. The Pentagon advised MOD officials in late September that a redacted version of the Marine Corps report could be used and that no additional material was available.

288. Mr Walker then asked for US Service Personnel to attend the inquest. When that request was refused, he ruled that the information provided by the US was "inadmissible", as he would not have the opportunity to question those who had provided witness statements.

289. Ms Harman wrote to Mr Johnson again on 6 November, to advise him that difficulties in securing US co-operation remained.[183] It appeared that US Service Personnel did not regard themselves as being required to attend inquests, despite being requested to do so. Mr Walker had told her that the inquest into the death of Mr Lloyd would have benefited considerably from the presence of US witnesses who could be questioned by him and the next of kin. Reading out the witnesses' statements (with the names of the witnesses redacted) "was no substitute".

290. Ms Harman reassured Mr Johnson that an inquest was not a criminal trial, and there was no reason for US Service Personnel not to attend. She suggested that they should meet to discuss the issue.

291. Ms Harman met Mr Johnson on 20 November.[184]

292. In advance of the meeting, Ms Harman asked for advice on a number of issues including how the UK would respond to a request for UK Service Personnel to attend a US inquest (or equivalent).[185]

293. The MOD advised that there was:

> "... no formal process ... to facilitate such attendance. Attendance would have to be assessed on a case-by-case basis and the MOD would have to carefully consider the rights of the individual under different legal/constitutional systems".[186]

294. At the meeting, Mr Johnson said that the US had provided redacted copies of US reports into incidents for a number of inquests; he was disappointed that Mr Walker had "rejected" that material.[187] Ms Harman suggested that the key issue was the ability of the coroner and families to question the material. Mr Johnson asked whether individuals who had been closely involved with the investigation of an incident could attend the inquest, instead of individuals who had been involved in it. Ms Harman agreed that that option should be explored, but said that it was for the coroner to decide who should give evidence.

295. Mr Johnson asked if UK Service Personnel were obliged to attend US or other inquests and inquiries; Ms Harman said that she had discussed that point with Mr Hoon, who thought that "they should". Mr Johnson also raised concerns about creating a precedent for similar processes in other countries.

296. An FCO official who attended the meeting reported that the US appeared to have two concerns:

- the material that they might be required to provide; and
- the risk that attendance at inquests by US Service Personnel might expose those individuals to civil action in the UK.[188]

297. In the following weeks, DCA and FCO officials provided advice to the US Embassy on the inquest process[189] and the extent of extra-territorial jurisdiction under English law.[190]

298. The FCO's advice on extra-territorial jurisdiction was that:

- English criminal law was essentially territorial. There was no jurisdiction in English law to prosecute a foreign national for homicide committed overseas.
- If there was no extra-territorial jurisdiction, there was no question of any charges being issued against US Service Personnel.
- There were a group of "international" offences for which the UK had taken universal jurisdiction, including most relevantly "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions committed anywhere by persons of any nationality. It was, however, "hard to imagine circumstances in which a 'friendly fire' incident would amount to a grave breach" of the Convention.

299. Ms Harman met Mr Johnson again on 6 December.[191] Ms Harman suggested that the meeting should focus on the inquest into the death of L Cpl Hull.

300. Ms Harman said that she had spoken to Mr Walker, the coroner responsible for that inquest. He would like US witnesses to the incident to attend the inquest; however, he could accept "as a minimum":

- an unredacted copy of the US report on the incident: the US and UK reports differed, and the US report had "large sections, even whole pages" redacted; and
- a US representative to speak to and explain the contents of the report.

301. An MOD official added that "in a reverse situation the UK would consider what we could offer in terms of best evidence".

302. Mr Johnson advised that the US Government had concluded that it would not be possible for US witnesses to an incident to participate in the inquest. It was now considering whether it could provide someone who could speak authoritatively to a US report.

303. On 1 February 2007, Mr Walker stated that he wished to play in open court a video-recording taken by one of the A-10 aircraft showing the attack on L Cpl Hull's convoy.[192] That recording had been provided to the MOD by the US for use in the BOI into the incident, and had subsequently been shown to the coroner by the MOD on the mistaken premise that it was UK-owned material.

304. The following day, the MOD sought and received an adjournment to the inquest to allow time to consult the US on disclosure of the recording.

305. These events attracted a great deal of media attention, focusing on:

- claims that the family of L Cpl Hull had previously been informed by the MOD that no video-recording of the incident existed;
- the MOD's decision to seek an adjournment, thus delaying the inquest; and
- the US Government's position that US witnesses to an incident should not participate in any subsequent UK inquest.

306. On 4 February, The Observer newspaper quoted Ms Harman's view:

> "My letters haven't proved successful, phone calls haven't proved successful, requests from the coroners haven't. It's just not fair on the relatives to sit in on an inquest and to know that they can't ask questions. They're entitled to know the truth from our allies."[193]

307. The recording was leaked to the press on 6 February.[194]

308. Later that day, the US told the Government that the recording could be viewed by the coroner, an MOD representative and L Cpl Hull's family only.[195]

309. On 19 February, prompted by concerns arising from the MOD's support for the inquest into L Cpl Hull's death, Mr Ingram sought advice on whether the MOD should adopt a fundamentally different BOI process. This is described earlier in this Section.

310. Ms Harman met Mr Johnson for a third time on 21 February.[196] A DCA official recalled Mr Walker's requests for an unredacted copy of the US report on the attack on L Cpl Hull's convoy and for a US representative to speak to the report. Ms Harman said:

> "... although it is difficult for the US to do what the coroner is asking, it is worse for the US not to ... providing no document and no representative at the inquest would be unacceptable."

311. Mr Johnson advised that the US Government was still considering these requests; discussions between the US and UK military would take place later that week.

312. Mr Bill Jeffrey and Mr Gordon England, the US Deputy Defense Secretary, discussed the issue two days later.[197] Mr England advised that, while the US aimed to be as co-operative as possible:

- They could not provide an unredacted version of the US report to Mr Walker, could not agree that he should contact the A-10 pilots directly, and could not provide an official to answer questions on the training of A-10 pilots.
- They could not agree to the in principle release of classified US information to coroners in future cases.
- They could not agree to provide "third-party US officials" to attend inquests.

313. Mr Jeffrey asked Mr England to reconsider the provision of third-party US officials; Mr England agreed that he would.

314. On 16 March, Mr Walker ruled that L Cpl Hull was unlawfully killed.[198] The press reported that Mr Walker was critical of the failure of the US authorities to co-operate with the inquest.

Legal representation at inquests

315. The Government's position at the beginning of Op TELIC was that legal aid was not normally necessary at inquests as the inquest procedure was designed to be inquisitorial and non-adversarial.[199] Legal aid could be provided in exceptional circumstances by the Lord Chancellor, provided that the Legal Services Commission (LSC) recommended it. Such exceptional circumstances might relate to a wider public interest in the applicant being legally represented, or to a need for the applicant to be legally represented to enable the coroner to carry out an effective investigation.

316. Legal Help might be available (subject to a means test) to provide legal advice and assistance before an inquest.

317. The Deepcut Review into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of four soldiers at the Princess Royal Barracks, Deepcut between 1995 and 2002, led by Mr Nicholas Blake, reported in March 2006.[200] He concluded that the participation of the family of the deceased in an inquest was desirable, and that their participation was assisted by "having experienced legal professionals to advise them whether there are reasons for concern, and how they can be properly addressed". He also concluded that, in some circumstances, it was "invidious for the Army to be legally represented at such an inquest at public expense whilst the family is not".

318. Mr Blake recommended:

> "As part of the military covenant with the soldier, the MOD should ensure that the family of a deceased soldier have access to legal advice and, where appropriate, legal representation prior to, and during, the inquest or FAI [Fatal Accidents Inquiry]."

319. The Government's formal response to the Deepcut Review was issued in June, and stated:

> "An inquest is an inquisitorial, non-adversarial fact finding process of limited scope which does not make findings of civil or criminal liability. It is the general presumption that legal representation is not necessary, and it is quite appropriate for those deemed interested persons by the Coroner to ask questions of witnesses at an inquest without legal assistance. Government provision of legal aid ... is not therefore normally available ... However, under the Access to Justice Act 1999 allocation may be made to the Legal Services Commission for exceptional funding."[201]

320. Ms Harman met relatives of Service Personnel killed in Iraq on 4 December, to discuss their experience of the investigation and inquest process.[202] The formal record of the meeting reported that families "would like to be informed of their right to have legal representation [at an inquest], and that the Government should provide funding for legal representation where families could not afford it".

321. Ms Harman wrote to Mr Browne later that month summarising the conclusions of the meeting; her letter did not address the issue of legal representation.[203]

322. On 13 December, during Prime Minister's Questions, Mr Roger Gale asked Mr Blair:

> "When inquests are held into the deaths of Service Personnel whose bodies are returned to the UK, the Government are represented by the Treasury Solicitor, who has access to effectively unlimited taxpayers' funds for QCs, witnesses and support investigations. In contrast, families of the bereaved attending the same inquest have to pay out of their own pockets. Is it right that the dice should be loaded against the bereaved?"[204]

323. Mr Blair replied that Ms Harman was looking at the arrangements for inquests, adding that "it is of course important to make sure that bereaved families are given every possible facility".[205]

324. Mr Gale continued to press the Government to provide funding routinely for legal representation for bereaved families at inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel.

325. On 17 January 2007, a DCA official advised Ms Vera Baird, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the DCA, that Ms Harman had received representations on the issue during a consultation meeting on the draft Coroners Bill and at her 4 December meeting with the families of Service Personnel who had died in Iraq.[206] Ms Harman was concerned that there was a "real or perceived inequality" when a public authority was legally represented at an inquest but the family of the deceased was not. She had therefore asked officials to explore options for providing (non-legal aid) funding for families at inquests where public authorities had legal representatives. That work was still at a very early stage.

326. A DCA official detailed Ms Harman's position and that work on 22 February:

> "Harriet [Ms Harman] was clear that it is of fundamental importance that there should be equality of arms between the families and MOD and something needs to be done to achieve this urgently ... Her view is that if it is not possible for families to be given legal support over and above the legal aid provisions then she would propose that equality of arms is met by there being no MOD lawyers present at the inquests in which they have an interest."[207]

327. Work was under way to:

- develop a consultation paper to seek views on how representation for families could be paid for outside of the legal aid system, in cases when a public authority was represented; the favoured option was a surcharge on those authorities; and

- conduct a study to establish fair and effective ways of ensuring that families routinely had official material disclosed to them before an inquest; that should improve the opportunity for families to participate in inquests on equal terms.

328. On 27 February, the All Party Parliamentary Group on Army Deaths held a seminar focusing on the issue of legal representation for families, which Ms Harman attended.[208]

329. On 9 March, a DCA official advised Ms Harman that:

- the MOD had had legal representation at eight of the 45 inquests (into 63 deaths in Iraq and Afghanistan) that had been completed;
- at five of those eight inquests, the family had also had legal representation; and
- at three other inquests the family had had legal representation and the MOD had not.[209]

330. The official advised that the DCA had been able to confirm only two cases where families had received legal aid for an inquest relating to Iraq (at a total cost of some £38,000).

331. The official recalled the Government's response to the Deepcut Review and commented:

> "If the MOD maintain the line that inquests are not adversarial ... so that families do not need to be represented, this begs the question as to why MOD needs to be represented."

332. Ms Harman wrote to Mr Browne on 14 March:

> "I am becoming increasingly concerned about the lack of legal representation for families at inquests where the military are represented.[210]

334. Ms Harman and Mr Ingram met on 18 April to discuss legal representation at military inquests.[211] Ms Harman said that there were two distinct areas to consider:

- "logistical and moral" support and advice for families; and
- legal advice and representation.

335. Mr Ingram and Ms Harman both stated that their departments did not have the resources to fund legal representation. They agreed that:

> "... the increased support for families from the MOD and the increased support for coroners as well as the work on greater disclosure of information would go a long way to providing families with the support they want at inquests."

336. They also agreed to set out that increased support in a Written Ministerial Statement.

337. Mr Ingram undertook to ensure that families had an MOD representative with them at the inquest "to provide explanations and support".

338. Mr Ingram made a Written Ministerial Statement on 7 June on improved support to bereaved families.[212] The Statement did not cover legal representation for bereaved families at inquests.

339. The Royal British Legion's "Honour the Covenant" campaign, which was launched in September 2007, highlighted the distress caused to families by delays to and the lack of legal representation during inquests, and called for legal advice, representation and advocacy to be provided to all families at public expense.[213]

340. Ms Joan Humble, chair of the All Party Parliamentary Group on Army Deaths, wrote to Ms Prentice on 14 December seeking advice on how the Group could best engage with Government discussions on the reform of the inquest system and in particular the issue of legal representation for the families of deceased Service Personnel.[214] Ms Humble stated:

> "To grieving families it seems a travesty of justice that MOD and Service Personnel should appear in court represented at public expense while they may have been advised they don't require representation or [are] forced to put their life savings on the line."

341. Ms Prentice replied on 19 February 2008, recalling the position that legal aid was not usually available for representation at an inquest because it was a "fact-finding process" and not a trial.[215] Legal representation could be provided in exceptional circumstances, and the MOJ had not refused any exceptional funding applications (from the Legal Services Commission) concerning deaths in Iraq or Afghanistan.

342. Ms Prentice continued:

> "I would also say that when I met representatives of the War Widows Association recently, they did not feel that legal representation at inquests was necessary, if the families were taken through the inquest process slowly and gently by the coroner."

343. On 13 March 2008, in response to a further question from Mr Gale, Ms Harman (Leader of the House of Commons) said:

> "I agree with the hon. Gentleman that if bereaved relatives with no legal representation turn up on the steps of a coroner's court and find that the Ministry of Defence and the Army have a great battery of solicitors and QCs, they cannot help but feel that the position is unfair. The MOD is very concerned about the issue, which will be considered during debate on the Coroners Bill. We need to give bereaved relatives at inquests a real sense of fairness and support."[216]

The Coroners and Justice Act, 2009

344. A January 2009 briefing on the Coroners and Justice Bill advised that it would contain a number of measures to ensure that any future backlogs of inquests could be addressed more easily:

- It would create a new national head of the coronial system, the Chief Coroner, who would be able to reallocate work between coroners and request the Lord Chief Justice to appoint judges to act as coroners in complex cases. The wishes of the bereaved family would be taken into account in determining the location of the inquest.
- Coroners would have new powers to obtain information to help their investigations. "Rigid restrictions" on where inquests and post-mortems could be held would be relaxed and the power to transfer cases to prevent delays would be enhanced.[217]

345. The Bill would also give the Lord Chancellor powers to issue statutory guidance on how the coroners' system should operate, in particular with respect to bereaved families.

346. The Coroners and Justice Bill was introduced to Parliament on 14 January 2009.[218] It did not contain any reference to public funding for legal representation at inquests.

347. On 21 October 2009, during a debate on the Bill in the House of Lords, Lord Thomas of Gresford moved an amendment which would have the effect of bringing inquests into deaths in State custody or while on active military service within the scope of legal aid.[219]

348. Lord Bach, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the MOJ, agreed to consider that amendment, adding:

> "Obviously I cannot give any guarantees that I will be able to bring forward a suitable amendment ... but I shall certainly do my best."[220]

349. An MOJ official provided advice to Lord Bach on 23 October on the form and cost of such an amendment.[221] The official identified a number of risks, including:

- The MOD was trying to reduce how often it chose to be legally represented at inquests "to tackle the perception that they have the advantage over families". If bringing military inquests into the scope of the legal aid scheme meant that most families had legal representation, then the MOD would also want representation. The MOD had chosen to be represented at "only" 45 percent of inquests in 2008.
- Bringing military inquests into the scope of the legal aid scheme meant that decisions on whether to provide legal aid would be made by the Legal Services Commission (LSC) without reference to Ministers. That might lead to military inquests being refused legal aid, particularly where the LSC did not waive the financial eligibility limits. The official recalled that all 17 of the applications for exceptional funding in relation to military inquests which had so far been made by the LSC had been granted by the MOJ.

350. When the Bill reached its Third Reading in the House of Lords on 5 November, the Government tabled an amendment which made specific provision for legal representation at an inquest into the death of British Service Personnel on active service to be publicly funded.[222] A means test applied.

351. The Bill became the Coroners and Justice Act in November 2009, with the amendment included as Section 51. That Section was not brought into force immediately.

352. Section 51 was repealed by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012.[223] The MOJ's consultation paper for that Act, which was published in November 2010, proposed that as inquests were non-adversarial in nature, legal aid could not be justified.

353. Following the 2010 UK general election, the incoming Government first announced that the Office of the Chief Coroner would be abolished, because of the costs involved, and then proposed to leave the Office on the statute book but to transfer some (but not all) of the functions to other posts and institutions.[224]

354. In November 2011, following criticism in Parliament and from concerned organisations, the Government announced that it would establish the Office of the Chief Coroner.

Fatal Accident Inquiries in Scotland

356. The Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 provided for the Lord Advocate to instruct a procurator fiscal to investigate a death if it appeared to the Lord Advocate that an investigation would be in the public interest. This contrasted with the position in England and Wales, where coroners had a statutory duty, under the 1988 Coroners Act, to investigate deaths which were reported to them when the body was lying in their district and there was reason to believe that the death was violent or unnatural, or was a sudden death of unknown cause, or in some other circumstances.[226] That duty applied "whether the cause of death arose in his district or not".

357. On 2 April 2003, two weeks after the start of military operations against Iraq, a Home Office official wrote to Mr Nicholas Gardiner, the Oxfordshire Coroner, proposing guidelines for transferring cases to other coroners:

> "An aspect of this we had not yet addressed is the handling of fatalities where they are to be transferred to Scotland or Northern Ireland. I have had a brief word with my Northern Ireland and Scottish counterparts. In neither territory would there normally be inquests or other inquiries into deaths abroad. It would therefore seem inevitable for you to accept jurisdiction for inquests in such cases ..."[227]

358. Mr Gardiner agreed with that assessment.[228]

359. There are no indications that the issue was considered again until 2006.

360. The Deepcut Review into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of four soldiers at the Princess Royal Barracks, Deepcut reported in March 2006.[229] The Review recommended: "There should always be an inquest, or, in Scotland, a Fatal Accidents Inquiry, into a sudden death of a solider, wherever the death has occurred."

361. The Government's formal response to the Review, which issued in June, stated that discussions were continuing between the MOD and the DCA, with a view to responding to the recommendation in the context of the Coroners Bill.[230] Responsibility for legislation on inquiries into deaths in Scotland was delegated to the Scottish administration; any proposals would therefore need to be discussed with the Scottish Executive.

362. On 4 December, Ms Harman met relatives of Service Personnel killed in Iraq, to discuss their experience of the investigation and inquest process.[231] The record of the meeting reported that there was consensus that inquests should be held "more locally, including in Scotland".

363. Ms Harman wrote to Mr Browne later that month summarising the conclusions of the meeting, including:

> "There is a particular issue about Scottish fatalities which are repatriated to England and Wales ... unless there is an inquest in England there will be no inquiry at all in Scotland. It was suggested [at the meeting] that until such time as the Scottish Executive's position changes, a coroner in the north of England might be able to take on inquests for Scottish families, and my officials are looking into this possibility. I am also going to discuss with the Scottish Executive the issue of extending the scope of the Fatal Accident Inquiry to cover Service deaths abroad."[232]

364. In April 2007, Ms Harman met Mr Ingram to discuss legal representation for families at inquests.[233] Mr Ingram asked whether there was scope to transfer the inquest into the loss of Nimrod XV230 to Scotland. Ms Harman said that she had discussed the issue with the Scottish Lord Advocate and relevant Scottish Executive Minister, who had both confirmed that there was no scope in Scotland for an inquest or Fatal Accident Inquiry (FAI) into the incident.

365. Nimrod XV230 had crashed in Afghanistan on 2 September 2006, with the loss of 14 crew.[234] The aircraft was based at RAF Kinloss in Scotland.

366. During Defence Questions in the House of Commons on 14 May 2007, Mr Angus Robertson asked:

> "Will the Ministry of Defence work with the incoming Scottish Executive to ensure that inquiries [into the deaths of Service Personnel] can take place under Scots law? After all, that would help to reduce the backlog and to ease the inconvenience to the families."[235]

367. Mr Ingram replied:

> "The answer to that is yes ... My understanding is that there would need to be a change to primary legislation. We need to look into that, but if there is a will to change in Scotland, let us hear the propositions."[236]

368. Mr Ingram subsequently discussed with MOD officials how he could respond to Mr Robertson's call.[237]

369. On 2 June, Mr Ingram wrote to Mr Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice at the Scottish Executive, to open a discussion on the issue:

> "Ensuring that they [inquests] are conducted in a family-friendly manner remains a priority for us and, where practical, we are allocating them to 'home' coroners in England and Wales. We share your concern that it has not been possible to hold them in Scotland.
>
> "The fact that we have, so far, repatriated the bodies of Scottish Service Personnel to England ensures that there can be an inquest, albeit under the Coroner's Court arrangements for England and Wales.
> "We would favour moving towards a position where, if appropriate, Inquiries into the deaths of Service Personnel can take place in Scotland. We would be happy to work with you to achieve this. However, we believe it will require a change of law in Scotland ..."[238]

370. Ms Prentice wrote to Mr MacAskill on 25 October, asking if there had been any developments since Mr Ingram's letter.[239] In the absence of an appropriate process in Scotland, the bodies of Scottish Service Personnel were repatriated to England "to ensure that there can be an inquest". This meant that families had to travel considerable distances from their homes in Scotland to attend inquests.

371. Officials from the MOD, MOJ and Scottish Executive met on 14 December to consider the possibility of transferring responsibility for inquiries into the deaths of "Scottish-based" Service Personnel who were killed overseas from the coroners' service to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS),[240] "with a view to FAIs being held rather than coroners' inquests".[241] The meeting concluded that:

- The way forward might be an order under Section 30 of the Scotland Act 1998.[242] That possibility would be explored by the Scottish Government Legal Directorate and the Office of the Solicitor to the Advocate General (OSAG).
- There did not appear to be any "fundamental obstacles" to the proposed transfer.
- The discretionary nature of the FAI system would need to be addressed.

372. On 27 March 2008, in response to a letter from Mr MacAskill, Mr Browne wrote:

> "Addressing these issues is ... a matter for Scottish Ministers. The answer is for you to make a commitment to amend Scots law in a way that can guarantee that Scottish-based Service families can be assured of mandatory inquiries into overseas operational deaths. If that were to happen then it would be entirely appropriate to repatriate deceased Service Personnel to Scottish bases once the law has been changed. You will understand, however, that I cannot contemplate changes without your commitment to mandatory investigations."[243]

373. Mr Browne's letter was copied to all Members of the Scottish Parliament, in order to inform the debate on the planned review of FAIs which would be held in the Scottish Parliament later that day.

374. The issue of enabling inquiries to be held in Scotland into the deaths of Service Personnel normally domiciled in Scotland featured heavily in the debate.[244]

375. Closing the debate, Mr MacAskill stated that an amendment to the Scotland Act 1998 would be necessary before Scotland could act:

> "If Des Browne agrees to the making of a section 30 order, we can begin to make progress; without a section 30 order, it would be ultra vires for us to proceed – the Parliament simply could not take such action."

376. The following day, an MOJ official advised Ms Prentice that the 14 December 2007 meeting of officials, and subsequent exchanges, had identified "no simple solution".[245] There were plans for officials to meet again.

377. On 4 November, Mr Bob Ainsworth, successor to Mr Ingram as Minister of State for the Armed Forces, informed the House of Commons that: "No reply [to Mr Browne's letter of 27 March] has yet been received from the Scottish Executive."[246]

378. That exchange prompted Mr Ainsworth to ask MOD officials how momentum could be regained on the FAI issue.[247]

379. An official advised Mr Ainsworth on 11 November that the Scottish Executive had given "considerable thought" to how inquiries could be held in Scotland without changing the devolution settlement, but Scottish Ministers did not appear to have come to a conclusion. The official was not sure that work was now being actively pursued. It was not satisfactory to let the issue drift.

380. Mr Ainsworth wrote to Ms Prentice the following day, proposing that Ministers and officials should meet to consider the way forward.[248] A copy of the letter was sent to Ms Ann McKechin, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State at the Scotland Office.

381. Mr MacAskill replied to Mr Browne's letter of 27 March on 19 November.[249]

382. After a further exchange in January 2009, Mr Ainsworth wrote to Mr MacAskill on 29 January stating that "we do indeed have the basis for a way ahead".[250] That was to use the Coroners and Justice Bill to amend the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976, so that the Chief Coroner (a new post that would be created by the Coroners and Justice Bill) could request the Lord Advocate to hold an FAI into a particular death.[251]

383. Section 12 of the Coroners and Justice Act provided for the Secretary of State or the Chief Coroner to notify the Lord Advocate that a death should be investigated under the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976.[252]

Honouring the dead

Repatriation ceremonies

385. The MOD's policy on the repatriation of the dead was set out in a paper produced by Lt Gen Palmer on 14 March 2003:

> "Repatriation to UK of the dead is to take place wherever possible and as soon as practicable."[254]

386. Before Op TELIC, repatriations were conducted with very little or no formal ceremony.[255]

387. The MOD put in place a unique arrangement for the repatriation of Service Personnel who died during Op TELIC, known as Operation KEIR. The repatriation ceremony under Op KEIR was designed to "demonstrate the highest level of respect", and included attendance by members of the Royal Family (or their representatives) and Ministers, military pall-bearers and a military band.

388. In his autobiography, General Sir Mike Jackson described attending a repatriation ceremony in his capacity as Chief of the General Staff:

> "We gathered before the aircraft landed, and were seated on the edge of the apron outside the terminal building to watch the C-17 aircraft land and taxi into position, coming to a rest with the nose of the aircraft facing diagonally away from the mourners. Then the ramp was lowered. A bearer party of six soldiers in parade dress advanced and marched up the ramp to take the first coffin. As they came into view down the ramp carrying the coffin, a band began playing and everyone stood. We all saluted as the bearers marched past in slow time, carrying the coffin to the waiting hearse. This simple, but profoundly moving, ceremony was repeated for each coffin on board the aircraft."[256]

389. Lt Gen Mans told the Inquiry that a repatriation ceremony could "help the bereaved family to start closure on the whole process of losing a loved one".[257]

390. In February 2004, Mr Ingram agreed that, following the end of major combat operations in Iraq, the MOD should "rationalise" the repatriation process.[258] The MOD would adopt three levels of repatriation:

- for non-battle deaths, where repatriation would mirror the pre-Op TELIC model;
- for Service Personnel killed in action or who had died of their wounds, where repatriation would include a "degree of ceremony" including military pall-bearers; and
- for exceptional circumstances where it was appropriate to demonstrate the highest level of respect, where Op KEIR would be used. It would be for Mr Hoon to determine whether to invoke Op KEIR, taking into account factors including the circumstances surrounding the incident.

391. Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that the issue of who should attend a repatriation ceremony quickly became "a big issue":

> "Everybody wanted to be there, to show support.
>
> "I think what we realised early on was that this was going to be ongoing. Unfortunately, casualties were going to keep coming. We could not have everybody rushing to [RAF] Brize Norton, as it was then, [RAF] Lyneham, as it is now, every time there was a casualty. So we developed, I think, an extremely good policy, which I think has worked very well, about how repatriations are done."[259]

392. Lt Gen Palmer added that, in planning and conducting repatriation ceremonies:

> "... with Ministers and everybody in the MOD the absolute key thing was to try to be as responsive and sensitive to the families as we possibly could at this enormously difficult moment for them."

393. In September 2007, a fourth level of repatriation was added, covering repatriations in the event of a mass fatality incident (defined as between 15 and 35 fatalities).[260]

394. In April 2009, the MOD amended its policy so that all deaths on operations (including non-battle deaths) received a formal repatriation ceremony, in the light of the difficulty in drawing a distinction between an individual killed by direct enemy fire and one killed in an accident in direct support of operations, and given public and familial expectations that individuals who died on operations should be honoured.[261]

ROYAL WOOTTON BASSETT

395. From April 2007, due to essential repair work at RAF Brize Norton, ceremonial repatriations took place through RAF Lyneham in Wiltshire.

396. Corteges departing RAF Lyneham passed through Wootton Bassett. The Royal British Legion reported in June 2011 how the town had responded:

> "The first [repatriation] was acknowledged by a few members of the public which included members of the Royal British Legion ...
>
> "Over the past four years the number of people has increased and where we were once paying tribute on a more personal basis we have now come to represent the country.
> "The repatriation tributes were never and are still not organised – things just happen, such as the Church Bell which started when a bell-ringing practise was taking place just before the repatriation was due, and as a mark of respect the one bell was tolled on that occasion.
>
> "When the cortege is about to leave Lyneham, the police alert us here in Wootton Bassett. The Standard Bearers form an orderly line, spacing themselves at equal distances down the opposite side of the road to the War memorial ... When the cortege reaches the edge of town the bell-ringer is notified and the Church Bell starts to toll and the town falls silent. Shopkeepers close their premises and join the crowds and there is not a sound to be heard."[262]

397. A military parade was held in Wootton Bassett in October 2008 to thank the town.[263]

398. In March 2011, Prime Minister David Cameron announced that The Queen had agreed "to confer the title 'Royal' upon the town, as an enduring symbol of the nation's admiration and gratitude".[264]

Letters of condolence

399. In July 2002, following a meeting with the parents of a deceased Serviceman, Mr Hoon asked the MOD to consider whether he or the Prime Minister should routinely write to the next of kin of Service Personnel killed on operations.[265]

400. Ms Elizabeth McLoughlin, the Director General of Service Personnel Policy, responded in September, having consulted the Chiefs of Staff.[266] Existing practice was that, apart from letters written by those serving with the individual who had been killed, a senior officer would write one letter of condolence "on behalf of both the Sovereign and the Service". While the Services appreciated the wish to provide additional comfort to the families of personnel killed on operations, they were concerned that:

- It would be very difficult for any letter, unless written locally by the unit commander, to be other than "bland and impersonal". Experience had shown that it was not helpful for families to receive a large number of official condolence letters based on generic information.
- The Services (and the Chief of Defence Staff in particular) did not want to distinguish, for this purpose, between individuals killed on operations and those who died "as a result of the normal rigours of Service life". They did not believe that the circumstances of a death made the next of kin any more or less deserving of sympathy.
- There was also a question of whether the next of kin of Reservists and MOD civilians should be included.
- In the event of mass casualties, writing to the next of kin might be difficult.

401. Ms McLoughlin concluded that the existing practice should continue, although the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State might in addition send a personal note in "exceptional cases where it is felt that families would benefit". That would need to be assessed on a case-by-case basis.

402. In late March 2003, No.10 asked the MOD for advice on how Mr Blair should honour UK Service Personnel killed on Op TELIC, and especially whether he should write letters of condolence to the families of Service Personnel killed on operations and whether there should be a ceremony or function to commemorate deceased Service Personnel.[267]

403. Mr Hoon's Private Office responded to Mr Blair's Assistant Private Secretary on 27 March, advising that:

- the current policy (whereby a senior officer wrote a single letter of condolence) remained sound; and
- it would be appropriate for a ceremony to be held after the conflict had concluded.[268]

404. On 7 April, Mr Blair wrote to a bereaved spouse who had lost her husband on Op TELIC, to respond to her concerns about the way she was being treated by the MOD.[269]

405. On 9 May, in response to a further request for advice from No.10 on whether Mr Blair should write letters of condolence to the families of Service Personnel killed on operations, Mr Hoon's Private Office repeated the advice that the current policy (whereby a senior officer wrote a single letter of condolence) remained sound.[270] Mr Hoon's Private Office added that the MOD was reviewing its policy on writing letters of condolence "in the light of the specific circumstances of the operation in Iraq", but was unlikely to change it.

406. Mr Hoon's Private Office advised No.10 on 16 May that the review had concluded that the MOD's policy should not change:

> "... you [No.10] asked if our experience during operations in Iraq had caused us to alter our position ... It has not ... The Prime Minister wrote in exceptional circumstances and in response to correspondence."[271]

407. The MOD looked again at the policy at the end of June, following a meeting between Mr Blair and General Sir Michael Walker, Chief of the Defence Staff, during which Mr Blair expressed a personal desire to write.[272]

408. Lt Gen Palmer advised Mr Hoon on 30 June that, while the Chiefs of Staff considered that the policy remained sound, given Mr Blair's desire to write and the fact that he was already corresponding with some families, their preferred option was that Mr Blair should write only to the next of kin of "those who die on Op TELIC".

409. Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to No.10 later that day, to confirm that it "could be appropriate" for Mr Blair to write to the next of kin of those killed on Op TELIC (including civilians and those killed in circumstances other than in direct action with the enemy).[273]

410. On 1 August, Mr Matthew Rycroft, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, advised Mr Blair that the MOD had, again, reviewed its policy and that Mr Hoon would now write to the next of kin of individuals who had died "while in an operational area".[274] Mr Rycroft recommended that Mr Blair should now write only to the next of kin of individuals who had been killed in action.

Commemoration in Parliament

412. It has become established practice for the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition to pay tribute to fallen Service Personnel at the start of Prime Minister's Questions (PMQs). The Inquiry has considered the origins and evolution of this public commemoration.

413. The first time a Prime Minister offered condolences for the deaths of Service Personnel in Iraq at PMQs was 2 April 2003. On that day, Mr Blair said he was "sure that the whole House will want to pass on its sympathies to the families of British Servicemen who have tragically been killed in the service of their country in the past week. Again, we pay tribute to their courage and dignity and we pass on our condolences and sympathy to their families and their friends."[276]

414. The practice was repeated a week later, when Mr Blair offered condolences to the families of all those who had lost their lives in the intervening seven days.[277]

415. On 25 June, he paid tribute to (but did not name) the Royal Military Police (RMP) officers who had lost their lives and been injured at Majarr al Kabir the previous day.[278]

416. On 10 September, as Parliament returned from the summer recess, Mr Blair paid tribute to the British Servicemen who had lost their lives during the recess.[279]

417. On 5 November, Mr Blair paid tribute to Corporal Ian Plank of the Royal Marines who had lost his life the previous week.[280] That was the first time a Service person had been mentioned by name. It is not clear why the decision was taken to name Corporal Plank.

418. Over the next two years, Mr Blair regularly paid tribute at the beginning of PMQs to British Servicemen who had lost their lives, but only from April 2006 did the practice of naming individuals and their regiments become usual.

419. In June 2007, during his last PMQs, Mr Blair described those tributes as "the saddest of duties".[281]

420. The practice was continued by Mr Gordon Brown from July 2007.

Memorial services

421. In late March 2003, No.10 asked the MOD for advice on how Mr Blair should honour UK Service Personnel killed on Op TELIC, including whether there should be a ceremony or function to commemorate deceased Service Personnel.[282]

422. The MOD responded to No.10 on 27 March, advising that it would be appropriate for a ceremony to be held after the conflict concluded.[283] The MOD intended that the ceremony "would give the Prime Minister and the Government the opportunity to honour the efforts of the Services, and their dead".[284]

423. Mr Hoon informed Parliament on 17 July that there would be a "national service of remembrance and thanksgiving for the campaign in Iraq".[285]

424. The service took place on 10 October 2003 at St Paul's Cathedral.[286] The service was attended by the families of the 51 British Service Personnel who had, at that time, lost their lives in the campaign. They were joined by members of the Royal Family including Her Majesty The Queen and His Royal Highness The Duke of Edinburgh, Government Ministers including Mr Blair, and senior military officers.

425. Baroness Symons, joint FCO/Department of Trade and Industry Minister of State for International Trade and Investment, wrote to Mr Hoon shortly after the service.[287] She had spent her time speaking to bereaved families, and reported from those conversations that:

- There was a generally positive reaction to how they had been informed of their loss (although two families had heard through the media), and to the subsequent support from the VO.
- A number of families felt that they had been "ignored" in the design and conduct of the service.
- All families appreciated the presence of The Queen and the Royal Family at the service.

426. Mr Hoon's Private Office wrote to Mr Rycroft on 14 November advising that feedback from families had been "overwhelmingly positive".[288] There had been a great deal of praise for the "obvious effort made by the Royal Family and senior members of the Government and Armed Forces to speak with as many families as possible".

Armed Forces Memorial

427. Mr Hoon advised the House of Commons in November 2000:

> "I have given careful consideration to a number of ways in which the recognition of members of the Armed Forces who give their lives in the service of their country might be enhanced. In the light of discussion, I have concluded that the most appropriate would be the erection in central London of a memorial bearing the names of all those killed on duty and by terrorist attack since the end of the Second World War. In accordance with the long established custom for the erection of memorials, I would expect funds to be raised by public subscription. Further consultation will now take place with ex-Service organisations and other interested bodies."[289]

428. Mr Hoon advised the House of Commons in March 2002 that, following that consultation and research into suitable sites, the Armed Forces Memorial (AFM) would be sited at the National Memorial Arboretum in Staffordshire.[290]

429. On 30 June 2006, following an assessment by officials that there was a significant risk that fundraising for the Memorial would not reach the total required, Mr Des Browne, the Defence Secretary, directed Mr Jeffrey that the MOD should underwrite the Memorial project "in the sum of £3.3m which represents the balance the AFM Trustees require to fully fund the project".[291]

430. In October 2007, the Armed Forces Memorial was formally dedicated in the presence of Her Majesty The Queen at the National Memorial Arboretum in Staffordshire.[292]

431. Ministers were advised in early 2008 that the total cost of the Memorial was expected to be £7.3m.[293] The AFM Trustees had raised £6.7m, including £1.5m from the sale of Trafalgar Coins (announced by Mr Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in February 2006), £2.417m from the Millennium Commission (agreed in November 2006), with the balance from public subscriptions. There was no realistic prospect of significant further public contributions. Trustees had therefore asked the MOD to provide £500,000 to complete the project.

432. AM Pocock told the Inquiry that the process of securing funding for the Memorial illustrated the difficulty of translating intent into action:

> "Although the political intent was perfectly clear, we were also told there was going to be no public money for it. We were hoping to get some money from the Lottery. We did eventually, after some strong support from newspapers caused the Lottery to change the rules.
>
> "We had the designs, it was in The Queen's diary to come and open it. We actually had to let the contract but we didn't have the money, and it wasn't from lack of effort ... I remember going round embassies with a begging bowl and all sorts of things, but the money just wasn't forthcoming.
>
> "The difficulty we had in getting the guarantee from the department [the MOD] was immense. We eventually did. We were able to build it."[294]

433. Both AM Pocock and VAdm Wilkinson felt that the Memorial provided a strong focus for remembrance. VAdm Wilkinson told the Inquiry:

> "The focus for recognition and remembrance that it [the Memorial] has provided and the source of comfort to a number of bereaved families, it really is quite remarkable, perhaps, that, as a nation, we didn't have one before 2007."[295]

434. The Memorial also provides a home for the Basra Memorial Wall. The wall was originally built in 2006 outside the headquarters of Multi-National Division (South East) in Basra by members of 37 Armoured Engineer Squadron to commemorate those who died in or as a result of action in Iraq.[296]

435. PJHQ advised Mr Browne's Office in June 2007 that its "current intent" was to move the Basra Memorial Wall (which comprised a collection of memorial plaques from the various bases that UK forces had occupied) to the National Memorial Arboretum when UK forces left Basra.[297]

436. The Memorial Wall was brought to the UK in April 2009, and was re-dedicated in March 2010.[298]

The Elizabeth Cross

437. On 10 June 2008, Mr Browne announced the inauguration of a new award.[299]

438. The award itself had been proposed by the Chiefs of Staff, who concluded that the time was right to recognise the "families of those personnel who die on operations, or as a result of terrorist action whilst on duty". Mr Browne confirmed that the recommendation had been welcomed by Ministers and approved by Her Majesty The Queen. Paying tribute to the bravery and courage shown by the families of all serving personnel, he hoped that the new award would "provide a more visible form of recognition from the nation for those who pay the ultimate sacrifice in the name of their country".

439. VAdm Wilkinson told the Inquiry that there was "unanimity" among the Chiefs of Staff "that it was appropriate to recognise the sacrifice that bereaved families had made".[300] The proposal reflected consultation with serving personnel and with bereaved families, as well as consideration of what other nations do to recognise the sacrifice that Service families make.

440. Mr Ainsworth, Mr Browne's successor as Defence Secretary, set out further detail about the award and the circumstances in which it would be given in July 2009.[301] He confirmed that The Queen had agreed that the award should be known as the Elizabeth Cross, the first new honour to take the name of a serving monarch since the creation of the George Cross in 1940.

441. It would commemorate the lives of those who had died on operations or as a result of terrorism from 1948 onwards (or from 1945 in the case of service in Palestine), in order to fit with the end of the period in which deaths are officially attributed to service in World War II. He reminded Parliament that "this is not a posthumous medal for the fallen but national recognition for the family for their loss". The award would consist of the Elizabeth Cross itself – awarded to the named next of kin – and a Memorial Scroll, copies of which could be presented to certain additional members of the deceased's close family. Both the Cross and the Scroll would be awarded on application, as contact details for the several thousand eligible families were unlikely to be up to date.

442. The first presentation of the Elizabeth Cross, made by The Queen, took place in Catterick Garrison, North Yorkshire, on 12 September 2009.[302] Those receiving the awards included five families of soldiers killed in Iraq.

443. The Inquiry's conclusions and lessons on the preparations made for repatriating the bodies of those who lost their lives serving on Operation TELIC, how their deaths were investigated, and the support provided for bereaved families are set out in Section 16.4.

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses analysis and findings in relation to the evidence set out in Sections 16.1 to 16.3, including:

- the pressures on Service Personnel, and the welfare support provided to them and their families;
- the arrangements for providing medical care to Service Personnel; and
- the arrangements for investigating the deaths of Service Personnel who lost their lives on Operation TELIC and the support provided for bereaved families.

2. The provision of military equipment is addressed in Sections 6.3 and 14.

Key findings

- In 2002, the UK military was already operating at, and in some cases beyond, the limits of the guidelines agreed in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review. As a result, the Harmony Guidelines were being breached for some units and specialist trades.
- The Government's decision to contribute a military force to a US-led invasion of Iraq inevitably increased the risk that more Service Personnel would be put in breach of the Harmony Guidelines. The issue of the potential pressure on Service Personnel was not a consideration in the decision.
- The MOD planned and prepared effectively to provide medical care in support of Operation TELIC.
- There were major improvements in the provision of medical care, mental healthcare and rehabilitative care available to Service Personnel over the course of Op TELIC.
- Most of the contacts between the MOD and bereaved families were conducted with sensitivity. In a few cases, they were not. The MOD progressively improved how it engaged with and supported bereaved families, in part driven by consistent public and Ministerial pressure.
- The Government's decision in 2006 to deploy a second medium scale force to Helmand province in Afghanistan further increased the pressure on Service Personnel, on elements of the MOD's welfare, medical and investigative systems, and on the coronial system.
- Much of the MOD's and the Government's effort from 2006 was focused on addressing those pressures.
- The MOD should have planned and prepared to address those pressures, rather than react to them.
- The Government should have acted sooner to address the backlog of inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel. The support it did provide, in June 2006, cleared the backlog.
- The MOD made a number of improvements to the Board of Inquiry process, but some proposals for more substantive reform (including the introduction of an independent member) were not fully explored. The MOD significantly improved the way it communicated with and supported bereaved families in relation to military investigations and inquests.

- The MOD was less effective at providing support to Service Personnel who were mobilised individually (a category which included almost all Reservists) and their families, than to formed units.

The pressure on Service Personnel

3. In 2002, the UK military was already operating at, and in some cases beyond, the limits of the guidelines agreed in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review. As a result, the Services' Harmony Guidelines (which defined how much time a member of a particular Service should spend away from home and the period between tours) were being breached for some units and specialist trades.

4. The Government's decision to contribute a military force to a US-led invasion of Iraq inevitably increased the risk that the Harmony Guidelines would be breached.

5. There are no indications that the potential pressure on Service Personnel was a consideration in the Government's decision to contribute a military force, and in particular a large scale land force (a division), to a US-led invasion of Iraq.

6. The Inquiry concludes in Section 9.8 that, throughout 2004 and 2005, it appears that senior members of the Armed Forces reached the view that there was little more that would be achieved in southern Iraq and that it would make more sense to concentrate UK military effort on Afghanistan where it might have greater effect.

7. In July 2005, Ministers agreed in principle proposals presented by Dr John Reid, the Defence Secretary, both for the transfer to Iraqi control of the four provinces in southern Iraq for which the UK had security responsibility, and for the redeployment of the UK effort in Afghanistan from the north to Helmand province in the south (see Section 9.4). The proposals were based on high-risk assumptions about the capability of the Iraqi Security Forces to take the lead for security.

8. In January 2006, Cabinet approved the deployment of a UK military force to Helmand.

9. The MOD's formal advice to Dr Reid was that this deployment was "achievable without serious damage to Harmony", although certain units and specialists would be "placed under increased, but manageable, stress".[1]

10. There were different views within the MOD over the effect of the deployment on personnel. Lieutenant General Anthony Palmer, Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Personnel) from 2002 to August 2005, told the Inquiry that, as he left post, he expressed his concern that deploying two brigades simultaneously (to Iraq and

[1] Minute Hutton to APS/SofS [MOD], 17 January 2006, 'Afghanistan Deployments'.

Afghanistan) would breach the Harmony Guidelines and the Defence Planning Assumptions, and was "too big a risk".[2]

11. Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary from 2001 to 2005, told the Inquiry:

> "I was apprehensive [about the deployment of UK forces to Helmand] and I made my concerns known to my planning staff and to the Chiefs of Staff. I think their view was that they could do it and it was manageable ... since it was [the Chiefs of Staff] who would actually have to ensure they could do this, I did not press my objections fully."[3]

12. The impact of the decision on the availability of key equipment capabilities for Iraq is addressed in Section 14.1.

13. The force began to deploy to Helmand in May 2006.

14. At the end of August, General Sir Richard Dannatt, Chief of the General Staff, advised Mr Des Browne, the newly appointed Defence Secretary, that "as an Army, we are running hot".[4] With operational deployments well above the levels set out in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review and the MOD's own Harmony Guidelines, the Army's demands on soldiers were greater than its ability to look after them.

15. Gen Dannatt told the Inquiry that the military covenant had "fallen out of balance ... as a consequence of decisions taken to stay in Iraq until we had successfully completed our operations there, but also take on Afghanistan as well".[5]

16. The MOD's assessment that the Helmand deployment was achievable without causing a substantial number of personnel to breach the Harmony Guidelines reflected overly optimistic assumptions about the intensity and duration of operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

17. The twin deployments challenged the planning assumption agreed in the 1998 Strategic Defence Review that the UK should be able to undertake two medium scale deployments simultaneously but would not expect both to involve war-fighting or to be maintained simultaneously for longer than six months.

18. It would only have been possible to manage the established Iraq commitment and the new Helmand commitment, without significantly increasing the pressure on Service Personnel, if the former was wound down on schedule and the latter was contained. In the event, it proved difficult to withdraw from Iraq as quickly as hoped while Helmand developed into a more substantial combat operation than originally envisaged, pushing up force levels.

19. In addition to increasing the pressure on Service Personnel, the decision to deploy a second medium scale force increased the pressure on the MOD's medical, welfare and investigative systems, and in particular on:

- the air bridge between Iraq and the UK;
- Selly Oak hospital;
- Headley Court and other rehabilitation facilities; and
- the Army's capacity to investigate fatalities and support bereaved families.

20. It also increased the pressure on the coronial system.

21. From 2006, the efforts of the MOD and the Government would increasingly be focused on addressing those pressures.

22. The MOD should have been aware of the potential impacts on its medical, welfare and investigative systems, and made the necessary contingency plans to increase their capacity.

Medical care

23. Op TELIC was the first major military operation after the closure of the military hospitals in the 1990s and therefore the first test of the new medical arrangements. Under the new arrangements, many medical Service Personnel (including a large number of Reservists) were deployed from NHS Trusts for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and military casualties were treated in NHS Trusts.

Planning and preparation

24. In early September 2002, the MOD estimated that between 31 and 48 Service Personnel would be killed in action during the initial combat phase of operations of an attack on Iraq, and that between 157 and 241 Service Personnel would be admitted to Role 3 hospitals[6] (figures exclude possible casualties from chemical and biological warfare). The MOD regularly updated its casualty estimates as the military plan developed. The estimates did not consider casualties beyond the initial combat phase of operations.

25. The Chiefs of Staff concluded on 5 February 2003 that a Casualty Estimate paper including estimated casualty figures, which had been produced by the MOD, would need to be shown to Ministers before any decision to commit UK troops was made.

26. In response to a question from Mr Blair on the possible number of casualties arising from an attack on Iraq, the MOD advised No.10 on 24 February that there would be between 30 and 60 British and between 500 and 1,200 Iraqi "land battle" fatalities.[7]

[6] Role 3 (Echelon 3) medical support is generally provided at field hospitals and on hospital ships.
[7] Letter Watkins to Rycroft, 24 February 2003, 'Iraq: Political and Military Questions'.

27. Lord Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff from 2001 to April 2003, told the Inquiry that Ministers would have been informed of the MOD's casualty estimates, as part of the routine briefing process.

28. Although the Inquiry has seen no evidence that the Casualty Estimate paper was shown to Ministers, it accepts that Ministers were informed of the MOD's casualty estimates.

29. The MOD established an effective medical capability in theatre to support Op TELIC by 14 March 2003.

30. By 1 May, when President Bush declared that major combat operations in Iraq had ended, 33 British Service Personnel had died serving on Op TELIC and 81 had been admitted to Role 3 hospitals.

31. Casualties would have been much higher if chemical and biological weapons had been used.

32. The MOD planned and prepared effectively to provide medical care in support of Op TELIC. Although some of the medical equipment and supplies procured by the MOD arrived in theatre shortly after military operations began, there are no indications that the quality of clinical care was compromised.

Improvements in the provision of care

33. There were a number of significant improvements to the care provided to Service Personnel over the course of Op TELIC.

34. From June 2006, the MOD, working closely with a number of charities, progressively enhanced the rehabilitation facilities at Headley Court.

35. In August 2006, following visits by MOD Ministers and senior military officers to injured Service Personnel recovering on civilian wards, the MOD began planning to establish a Military Managed Ward (MMW) at Selly Oak hospital. The MOD assessed that, while the quality of clinical care at Selly Oak was excellent, injured Service Personnel would recover better in what Lieutenant General Louis Lillywhite, the Surgeon General from 2006 to 2009, described as a "military bubble".[8]

36. The MMW was established in December 2006 and was fully staffed by July 2007.

37. In his evidence to the Inquiry, Lt Gen Lillywhite highlighted the advances during Op TELIC in the military's understanding of how to save life at the point of injury, how to sustain the quality of life of seriously injured individuals into the long term, and pain management.

---

[8] Public hearing, 20 July 2010, pages 33-34.

38. The advances in the provision of medical care during Op TELIC meant that more individuals with very serious and complex injuries survived.

39. A number of injured veterans shared with the Inquiry their concern that they might not continue to receive the same quality of care over the long term, and in particular when they left the military.

40. Lt Gen Lillywhite told the Inquiry that, in recognition of their service and on clinical grounds, individuals with very serious injuries should be treated by the Government as a group with specific clinical needs, to enable specialist care to be arranged and provided more consistently.

41. The Government will need to consider how to address the issue of providing whole-life care to individuals with very serious injuries.

42. There were also significant advances in the provision of mental healthcare.

43. In April 2003, the MOD commissioned a large-scale, long-term programme of research on the physical and psychological health of personnel deployed on Op TELIC. The findings of that programme identified a number of important mental health issues and informed the MOD's response to them.

44. The Inquiry recommends that the MOD commissions similar studies for future major operational deployments. In addition to the direct benefits for Service Personnel and the MOD, mental health is an area of significant public concern. It is important that the MOD is able to demonstrate that the effects of deployments are properly monitored and managed.

45. The major developments in the provision of mental healthcare over the period covered by the Inquiry were:

- There was increased use of a period of decompression at the end of an operational tour, as part of post-operational stress management.
- In November 2006, in response to the findings of the King's Centre study that a number of Reservists were experiencing increased mental health effects as a result of deployment, the MOD launched the Reserves Mental Health Programme (RMHP). The RMHP provided enhanced mental healthcare to current and former Reservists who had been demobilised since 1 January 2003 following deployment on an overseas operation.
- In November 2007, the MOD launched six community NHS mental health pilot programmes to provide mental health assessment and treatment for veterans. The programmes were led by a mental health therapist with an understanding of the issues faced by veterans.
- In 2008, the MOD rolled out Trauma Risk Management (TRiM) in all three Services. TRiM is a form of debriefing after a traumatic event, undertaken in peer groups rather than with an external counsellor.

Investigations into the deaths of Service Personnel

46. Investigations by the MOD and coroners into the deaths of Service Personnel serving on Op TELIC could be very slow, and in one case lasted for more than four years.

47. The Inquiry considered how the three major elements of the investigative process – Service Police investigations, Boards of Inquiry (BOIs), and inquests – changed after 2003.

Service Police investigations

48. The earliest concerns about the military's investigative process emerged in September 2003. Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces, expressed his concern that the next of kin of deceased Service Personnel increasingly perceived that the MOD's investigations lacked focus and were too slow, and that the MOD did not keep them informed of progress.

49. The following month, Lt Gen Palmer advised that the Army's Royal Military Police (RMP) was "swamped" with the volume of work in Iraq.[9] The major challenge was the difficult working environment, including the need for force protection for Service Police and a potentially hostile population. The Army's policy of holding investigations into all fatalities added to the pressure on the RMP.

50. Reviews of Service Police investigations in October 2004 and April 2005 found that there were still delays in Service Police investigations, but did not recommend any substantial changes to the investigative process. The October 2004 review concluded that investigations could be complex and "speed must not be at the expense of quality".[10]

Boards of Inquiry

51. The purpose of a military BOI was to establish the facts about an event and to make recommendations to prevent a recurrence.

52. In response to Mr Ingram's concern over the MOD's investigative process, the MOD had, by June 2004:

- shortened the time allowed for completing BOIs to 14 weeks;
- strengthened the role of the BOI President;
- introduced measures to improve the management of BOIs by each Service; and
- introduced a series of measures to improve communications with bereaved families on progress with the entire Service Police investigation and BOI process.

---

[9] Minute Palmer to VCDS, 17 October 2003, 'TELIC Incidents: Investigations'.
[10] Report Loudon, 12 October 2004, 'Review of Service Police Investigations on Operations'.

53. MOD Ministers remained closely engaged. From June 2004, Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, received regular briefings on progress on BOIs and the reasons for any delays.

54. The possibility of adding an independent member to a BOI was raised by Mr Hoon in June 2004 and by Mr Browne in December 2007. On neither occasion was the idea considered seriously by the MOD.

55. The Inquiry recommends that the MOD consider whether an independent member should sit on BOIs, in particular in order to assure families that the process is as rigorous and transparent as possible.

56. The MOD, and in particular the Army (through the work of the Army Inquiries and Aftercare Support Cell and Army Inquest Cell), continued to improve the management of the Service Police investigation and BOI processes, the support provided for bereaved families, and the support provided for coroners. The Army Inquest Cell provided the model for the tri-Service Defence Inquests Unit, which was established in May 2008.

57. By early 2008, the Army had appointed permanent Presidents to lead high-profile Army BOIs, and the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force had taken steps to establish pools of expertise from which Presidents could be selected.

58. The Inquiry recommends that the MOD consider providing BOI Presidents with access to expert advisers on process and standards, who would play a role analogous to Court Clerks, in order to help establish consistency and best practice.

THE CONCERNS OF BEREAVED FAMILIES

59. A number of families shared with the Inquiry their concerns over the MOD's process for investigating fatalities. The concerns were:

- Military investigations were not sufficiently rigorous, in particular in relation to incidents where there were suspicions of friendly fire or equipment failure.
- No action appeared to be taken against individuals as a result of military investigations (this concern also applied to inquests).
- Material had been redacted from the version of the BOI report that families received, which made the content harder to understand. Some family members thought that text had been redacted to protect individuals criticised in reports or to hide failings by the MOD.

60. The Inquiry reviewed 25 percent of BOI investigations into Op TELIC fatalities, including those that attracted the most controversy. The Inquiry also reviewed the 15 BOI reports into Op TELIC fatalities that are in the public domain.

61. The BOI reports reviewed by the Inquiry were not consistent in approach or quality. Areas of particular variance were:

- the extent to which the reports considered what happened to the individual(s) who died (as well as the wider incident in which it happened); and
- the extent to which the reports recorded and addressed the concerns of the deceased's family and next of kin.

62. The Inquiry does not believe that any of the BOI reports it reviewed were deliberately produced in such a way as to protect the MOD. In at least two cases, the BOI revealed that an incident might have been caused by friendly fire when the earlier Service Police investigation had concluded otherwise.

63. However, some practices apparent in the BOI reports reviewed by the Inquiry could create a mistaken impression of a "cover-up". They were:

- interview transcripts which switch between on and off the record;
- the difficulty in taking evidence, for example from Iraqi witnesses;
- restrictions on using US material;
- the use of defensive or euphemistic language, which can give the impression that serious failings are being dismissed; and
- heavy redaction.

64. A recurring theme raised by families with the Inquiry was frustration at being denied visibility of action taken against those who were shown to have done something wrong (for example, where an individual had not provided truthful evidence to a BOI) or who a family believed to have been in some way negligent.

65. A BOI is not intended to apportion blame. The MOD defended that position, on the basis that it was the best way to ensure maximum disclosure and, therefore, the best chance to prevent a recurrence of the incident.

66. That position is not unique to BOIs. The right not to incriminate oneself is common to other investigative processes (such as inquests) where the main objective is to establish the facts of a case.

67. Very few of the BOI reports considered by the Inquiry led to disciplinary measures.

68. In order to respond to the concerns regarding the redaction of material from BOI reports, the Inquiry reviewed a sample of BOI reports relating to Op TELIC, comparing the full and redacted versions. The Inquiry considered whether the substance justified redaction, and how the redaction was made.

69. The Inquiry concludes that:

- There were no indications that information was redacted by the MOD in order to cover up wrong-doing, either by individuals or the MOD.

- The use of redaction was not consistent between BOIs.
- Not all redactions were justified. In some cases, whole passages were redacted when only a few details were sensitive. In others, material had been redacted when it was already in the public domain (for example, the name of a Commanding Officer or pathologist).
- In many cases, no attempt was made to explain the nature of the redacted material to the reader.
- There were some improvements in practice during the course of Op TELIC. In general, the most recent BOI reports contained fewer redactions and were easier to follow.

70. The Inquiry recognises that some redactions will be required in almost all such reports but recommends that the MOD take steps to ensure consistency of practice, in line with the Information Commissioner's guidance.[11] Good practice seen by the Inquiry includes:

- including a clear statement of redaction policy at the start of a document;
- providing a short overarching description of events described in text which has been redacted;
- adding a description which tells the reader the nature of the text has been redacted (for example, 'Personal medical information');
- assigning each individual a unique number or other cipher and attaching a description of their role to it; and
- leaving in ranks where names are redacted, so that command relationships are clear.

71. Many of the concerns shared by families in relation to the rigour of the BOI process and its transparency could be addressed by adding an independent member to a BOI.

Inquests

72. From January 2003, the MOD and the Home Office (the department then responsible for coronial policy) worked with Mr Nicholas Gardiner, the Coroner for Oxfordshire, to refine the arrangements for receiving UK military fatalities from Iraq. The majority of fatalities were expected to be repatriated to RAF Brize Norton, which fell within his area of responsibility.

73. During those initial exchanges, Home Office officials highlighted a number of issues that would later become problematic: the need for Mr Gardiner's office to secure additional resources (from Oxfordshire County Council) to cover the cases it was taking on; the desirability of transferring cases to coroners who were local to the families of the deceased; and how to handle cases where the deceased was based in Scotland.

74. The day before the beginning of military operations against Iraq, Mr Gardiner wrote to Home Office officials:

> "There are a few matters outstanding but, generally, I think we are reasonably well prepared, although there are bound to be things we have not thought of."[12]

75. There are no indications that the Government put in place any contingency plans to support Mr Gardiner's office, or that the Government maintained contact with Mr Gardiner's office after those initial exchanges.

76. The Inquiry recommends that for any future major operational deployment, the Chief Coroner, the department responsible for coronial policy (currently the Ministry of Justice) and the MOD should develop contingency plans to increase the capacity of the coronial system to handle fatalities. Those plans should include the identification of funding in the event that it becomes necessary to increase the capacity of the coronial system.

77. In May 2006, in response to growing concern over delays in holding inquests into the deaths of Service Personnel, Ms Harriet Harman, Minister of State for the Department for Constitutional Affairs (DCA), was charged with resolving the problem.

78. By early June, Ms Harman had brokered an agreement with the MOD to provide a substantial package of support to Mr Gardiner's office, including the recruitment of three Assistant Deputy Coroners.

79. Although the package was announced in Parliament in June 2006, discussions continued between the DCA, the MOD and the Treasury until February 2007 on how much the MOD would contribute. The discussions concluded with the DCA reluctantly accepting the MOD's initial offer of £125,000.

80. While the discussions did not delay the provision of support to Mr Gardiner's office (as the DCA bore the costs as they were incurred), a disproportionate amount of senior officials' and Ministers' time was consumed in inter-departmental wrangling over a relatively small amount of money.

81. The additional resources provided in June 2006 allowed Mr Gardiner's office to clear the existing backlog of inquests by October 2007, much sooner than it would otherwise have done.

82. From July 2006, the Government pursued a number of initiatives to make the inquest process more responsive to the needs of the families of deceased Service Personnel. The Inquiry commends Ms Harman's efforts in pursuing those initiatives.

---

[12] Letter Gardiner to Home Office [junior official], 18 March 2003, [untitled].

83. Between July 2006 and February 2007, Ms Harman pressed the US Government, through the US Embassy London, to provide classified US material and US representatives to support inquests into the deaths of UK Service Personnel. The US declined to provide that support.

84. Following a meeting with the families of Service Personnel killed on Op TELIC in December 2006 and representations in Parliament, including from Mr Roger Gale, Ms Harman explored the possibility of providing legal representation at inquests for the families of Service Personnel, in particular at inquests where the MOD chose to have legal representation.

85. The Government did not provide that support. In 2009, the Government agreed an amendment to the Coroners and Justice Bill to provide legal representation at inquests into the death of British Service Personnel on active service. However, that provision was not brought into force and was subsequently repealed.

86. From June 2007, MOD Ministers pressed the Scottish Executive to make provision for Fatal Accident Inquiries to be held into the deaths overseas of Service Personnel normally domiciled in Scotland.

87. The Government made provision for such Inquiries in the 2009 Coroners and Justice Act.

Delays in military investigations and civilian inquests

It could take several years for the MOD and the coronial system to conclude investigations into the deaths of Service Personnel.

The Inquiry considered why the investigative process should take so long. The four main factors were:

- the difficulty of conducting Service Police investigations in a hostile environment, which was exacerbated by a lack of qualified military investigators; the MOD set no deadlines for the conclusion of Service Police investigations;
- the Army's policy, at the beginning of Op TELIC, to hold an investigation into all deaths, and only to launch a BOI after the investigation had concluded; this policy changed in 2004;
- the time taken to complete BOIs, and in particular to receive comments from senior officers and advisers on draft BOI reports; and
- the backlog of inquests which built up in the Oxfordshire Coroner's office.

Support for bereaved families

88. Most of the contacts between the MOD and bereaved families were conducted with sensitivity. In a few cases, they were not.

89. In April 2003, prompted by concern over the insensitive treatment of a bereaved spouse, and at the direction of Mr Hoon, the MOD initiated a comprehensive review of bereavement procedures. By the middle of May, it had introduced new guidelines for communicating with bereaved families, begun work to make the guidance on the support available to bereaved families more accessible, and amended its policy to allow bereaved spouses to remain in Service accommodation for as long as they required it.

90. Mr Ingram attributed the MOD's failings at the beginning of Op TELIC to a continuing view within the military that bereavement was "just something that happened".[13] Mr Ingram added that, in the context of "a big sea change" in public attitudes and the experience of Op TELIC, the MOD moved quickly to improve the bereavement and welfare support it provided to families.

91. The creation, in 2005, of the Joint Casualty Co-ordination Cell (JCCC) and the production of a joint policy covering the support for bereaved families reduced the inconsistency between the Services and individual units in the support they offered to bereaved families.

92. The experiences shared with the Inquiry by bereaved families suggest that the creation of the JCCC led to an improvement in the quality of the notification process.

93. Being a Casualty Notifying Officer (CNOs) and a Visiting Officer (VOs) was (and remains) an extremely difficult role: a small number fell below the standard required. The training and support provided to CNOs and VOs remained an issue of concern for the MOD throughout the period covered by the Inquiry.

Support for Service Personnel and their families

94. The MOD progressively improved the allowances and support provided to Service Personnel and their families over the course of Op TELIC.

95. The most substantial development was the introduction of the Operational Allowance in October 2006. The Allowance, initially set at £2,400 for all Service Personnel who completed a six-month tour in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans or on certain other operations, was designed "to reflect the current, high operational tempo".[14]

[14] Letter PS/Secretary of State [MOD] to Phillipson, 9 October 2006, 'A Package for Service Personnel on Operations'.

The Operational Welfare Package

96. The Inquiry heard mixed reports about the Operational Welfare Package (OWP) from families and veterans of Op TELIC. Limited access to telephones early in the campaign and the fragility of the air bridge between Iraq and the UK – which reduced the time available for rest and recuperation – were particular sources of frustration.

97. While these were undoubtedly real frustrations, the Inquiry considers that the MOD delivered most elements of the OWP as quickly as could reasonably have been expected. A key challenge, recognised by the MOD, was managing and meeting rising expectations.

Support for Reservists

98. Over 5,000 Reservists were mobilised for Op TELIC 1 (comprising some 12 percent of total UK forces). Lt Gen Palmer told the Inquiry that Reservists "performed magnificently during the operation, and we simply could not have done without them".[15]

99. The MOD's policy was that deployed Reservists, and their families, should receive the same welfare support as Regular Service Personnel.

100. The MOD found it difficult to provide support to the families of deployed Reservists. It was the responsibility of the unit to which a Reservist was attached to provide that support, but the families of Reservists were often spread across the country, some distance from that unit. A Reservist's family might have had little or no previous contact with the unit to which the Reservist was attached, and find it difficult to access the support that was available.

101. The MOD introduced a number of measures to improve the support provided to Reservists in theatre and in the UK. It also sought to ensure that Reservists benefited from new initiatives, such as decompression, alongside their Regular colleagues.

Conclusions 217

Introduction and key findings

1. This section addresses:

- the statements issued by the Government before the conflict on the human rights abuses committed by Saddam Hussein's regime and the human cost of not intervening in Iraq;
- the assessments made by the Government before and during initial combat operations of the number of Iraqi civilian casualties;
- reports of the number of Iraqi civilian casualties during initial combat operations; and
- how the Government responded to demands that it should count the number of Iraqi casualties attributable to the conflict, and to estimates of the number of casualties.

2. As this Section shows, there have been a number of studies to determine the civilian death toll in Iraq after the Coalition invasion. The numbers vary considerably. What is not in doubt is that, in both the military operation to overthrow the Iraqi regime and the subsequent violence, many tens of thousands of Iraqi citizens, most of them civilians, lost their lives. Many more were displaced or injured, or lost members of their families.

3. It is beyond the scope and abilities of this Inquiry to establish independently the number of fatalities caused by conflict in Iraq, or the broader human cost of the conflict to the Iraqi people. The Inquiry is, however, very conscious of the extent of the suffering in Iraq resulting from the conflict and this has informed its approach to its analysis of the course of the conflict and to drawing lessons for the future.

Key findings

- The Inquiry considers that a Government has a responsibility to make every reasonable effort to understand the likely and actual effects of its military actions on civilians.
- In the months before the invasion, Mr Blair emphasised the need to minimise the number of civilian casualties arising from an invasion of Iraq. The MOD's responses offered reassurance based on the tight targeting procedures governing the air campaign.
- The MOD made only a broad estimate of direct civilian casualties arising from an attack on Iraq, based on previous operations.
- With hindsight, greater efforts should have been made in the post-conflict period to determine the number of civilian casualties and the broader effects of military operations on civilians. More time was devoted to the question of which department should have responsibility for the issue of civilian casualties than it was to efforts to determine the actual number.
- The Government's consideration of the issue of Iraqi civilian casualties was driven by its concern to rebut accusations that coalition forces were responsible for the deaths of large numbers of civilians, and to sustain domestic support for operations in Iraq.

4. The Inquiry received a number of substantive submissions relating to the human cost of the conflict in Iraq, including from:

- Mr Hamit Dardagan and Professor John Sloboda for the Iraq Body Count (IBC) project.[1] The IBC project aims to record the violent civilian deaths that have resulted from the 2003 military intervention in Iraq. In its submission to the Inquiry, IBC argued that the Inquiry should take full and proper account of Iraqi casualties resulting from the conflict and the subsequent breakdown in security. It continued: "One of the most important questions in situations of armed conflict and in the laws of war is whether the use of force has been a proportionate response to the threat that prompted it … It is impossible to establish the wisdom of actions taken … if the full consequences in human welfare are not taken into account. Casualty data are perhaps the most glaring indication of the full costs of war."
- Action on Armed Violence (AOAV).[2] AOAV is a non-governmental organisation (NGO) which aims to reduce the incidence and impact of global armed violence. In its submission to the Inquiry, AOAV argued that the UK Government actively sought to maintain a position of ignorance regarding measurements of death, injury and deprivation resulting from violence in Iraq. It proposed that the UK Government should establish a structured process to undertake transparent measurement and monitoring of the impact of armed violence where its Armed Forces are active.

5. The Inquiry is grateful for these, and other, submissions, and has taken account of them in preparing its Report.

Statements on the human cost of not intervening in Iraq

6. The UK Government dossier Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. The Assessment of the British Government was published on 24 September 2002.[3] The dossier is considered in detail in Section 4.2.

7. Eight of the dossier's 50 pages considered life in Iraq under Saddam Hussein, describing his security apparatus, internal repression, external wars and abuse of human rights.

8. The dossier's Executive Summary indicated the purpose of that material:

> "But the threat from Iraq does not depend solely on the [Weapons of Mass Destruction – WMD] capabilities we have described. It arises also because of the violent and aggressive nature of Saddam Hussein's regime. His record of internal repression and external aggression gives rise to unique concerns about the threat he poses."

9. The dossier stated:

- Saddam Hussein used patronage and violence to motivate his supporters and to control or eliminate opposition. He had pursued a long-term programme of persecuting the Iraqi Kurds, including through the use of chemical weapons. Amnesty International had estimated that more than 100,000 Kurds had been killed or had disappeared during the 1987 to 1988 "Anfal" campaign of attacks on Kurdish villages. Thousands of Iraqi Shia had also been killed.
- Saddam Hussein had led Iraq into two wars of aggression, against Iran and Kuwait. The Iran-Iraq War was estimated to have caused one million casualties.
- Human rights abuses continued within Iraq: "People continue to be arrested and detained on suspicion of political or religious activities or often because they are related to members of the opposition. Executions are carried out without due process of law. Relatives are often prevented from burying the victims in accordance with Islamic practice. Thousands of prisoners have been executed."

10. Mr Blair addressed those issues in his opening statement in the 24 September 2002 Parliamentary debate:

> "People say, 'But why Saddam?' … two things about Saddam stand out. He has used these weapons in Iraq itself – thousands dying in those chemical weapons attacks – and in the Iran-Iraq war, started by him, in which one million people died; and his is a regime with no moderate elements to appeal to.
>
> "Read the chapter on Saddam and human rights in this dossier. Read not just about the 1 million dead in the war with Iran, not just about the 100,000 Kurds brutally murdered in northern Iraq, not just about the 200,000 Shia Muslims driven from the marshlands in southern Iraq, and not just about the attempt to subjugate and brutalise the Kuwaitis in 1990 that led to the Gulf war. I say, 'Read also about the routine butchering of political opponents, the prison 'cleansing' regimes in which thousands die, the torture chambers and the hideous penalties supervised by him and his family and detailed by Amnesty International.' Read it all and, again, I defy anyone to say that this cruel and sadistic dictator should be allowed any possibility of getting his hands on chemical, biological and nuclear weapons of mass destruction."[4]

[4] House of Commons, Official Record, 24 September 2002, column 5.

11. Amnesty International issued a press release two days later, urging the UN Security Council to consider:

> "… not only the security and political consequences of its action, but also the inevitable human rights and humanitarian toll of war … concern for the life, safety and security of the Iraqi people is sorely missing from the debate, as is any discussion on what would be their fate in the aftermath of conflict …"[5]

12. On 2 December, the FCO published a report on Saddam Hussein's crimes and human rights abuses.[6] The report is addressed in more detail in Section 6.4.

13. The FCO report was "based on the testimony of Iraqi exiles, evidence gathered by UN rapporteurs and human rights organisations, and intelligence material". It examined "Iraq's record on torture, the treatment of women, prison conditions, arbitrary and summary killings, the persecution of the Kurds and the Shia, the harassment of opposition figures outside Iraq and the occupation of Kuwait".

14. Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, told the BBC that the report was being published "because it is important that people understand the comprehensive evil that is Saddam Hussein".[7]

15. The report was criticised by some as an attempt to influence public opinion in favour of war.[8]

16. Amnesty International responded to that report, stating that the human rights situation in Iraq should not be used selectively; the US and other Western Governments had ignored previous Amnesty International reports of widespread human rights violations in Iraq.[9] Amnesty International continued:

> "As the debate on whether to use military force against Iraq escalates, the human rights of the Iraqi people, as a direct consequence of any potential military action, is sorely missing from the equation."

17. In his speech to the Labour Party Spring Conference in Glasgow on 15 February 2003, Mr Blair said:

> "Yes, there are consequences of war. If we remove Saddam by force, people will die and some will be innocent. We must live with the consequences of our actions, even the unintended ones.
> "But there are also consequences of 'stop the war' …"[10]

18. Mr Blair said that those consequences would include Saddam Hussein remaining in power in Iraq:

> "A country that in 1978, the year before he seized power, was richer than Malaysia or Portugal. A country where today, 135 out of every 1,000 Iraqi children die before the age of five – 70 percent of these deaths are from diarrhoea and respiratory infections that are easily preventable. Where almost a third of children born in the centre and south of Iraq have chronic malnutrition.

> "Where half the population of rural areas have no safe water.
>
> "Where every year and now, as we speak, tens of thousands of political prisoners languish in appalling conditions in Saddam's jails and are routinely executed.
>
> "Where in the past 15 years over 150,000 Shia Moslems in Southern Iraq and Moslem Kurds in Northern Iraq have been butchered, with up to four million Iraqis in exile round the world, including 350,000 now in Britain …
>
> "If there are 500,000 on that [Stop the War] march, that is still less than the number of people whose deaths Saddam has been responsible for.
>
> "If there are one million, that is still less than the number of people who died in the wars he started."

Child mortality in Iraq under Saddam Hussein's regime

The figure for child mortality in Iraq under Saddam Hussein's regime used by Mr Blair in his speech to the Labour Party Spring Conference in February 2003, and in subsequent public statements, has been questioned. The Inquiry therefore considered the origin of that figure.

On 14 February, the day before Mr Blair's speech, Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, wrote to Mr Blair setting out key humanitarian issues in Iraq (see Section 6.5).[11] Ms Short advised that the humanitarian situation in the centre and the south of Iraq, which was under Saddam Hussein's control, was worse than the situation in the north. To demonstrate that point, she attached statistics, attributed to the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF), on child and maternal mortality in Iraq. Child mortality in central and southern Iraq was 135 per 1,000 ("worse than the Democratic Republic of Congo or Mozambique") compared with 72 per 1,000 in northern Iraq.

On the same day, No.10 asked the FCO for material on a number of issues in preparation for Mr Blair's speech to the Conference, including how many Iraqi children under the age of five died each month.[12]

The FCO's reply, which had been agreed with DFID, stated that there were no truly reliable figures for child mortality in Iraq.[13] The only figures available were from a 1999 UNICEF report which claimed that child mortality had risen from 56 per 1,000 in 1989 to 131 per 1,000 in 1999 in "Baghdad-controlled Iraq" and fallen from 80 per 1,000 to 72 per 1,000 over the same period in "UN-controlled" northern Iraq. However, those figures had been questioned. The household surveys on which the figures were based had been "conducted with the Iraqi regime's 'help' and relied on some Iraqi figures".

A No.10 official passed the figures for Baghdad-controlled Iraq (but not northern Iraq) to Mr Blair.[14] The official did not make any reference to the reliability of those figures.

The Inquiry concludes that the figures provided to Mr Blair in February 2003 by Ms Short and FCO officials were drawn from UNICEF's Iraq Child and Maternal Mortality Survey (ICMMS), published in August 1999.[15] That survey received extensive coverage in the media, in particular on whether there was a connection between the apparent rise in child mortality and the sanctions regime that was then in force.[16]

The level of child mortality in Iraq estimated by the ICMMS was significantly higher than that estimated by later surveys. The Child Mortality Estimates website, which presents the work of the UN Inter-Agency Group on Child Mortality Estimation, charts the estimates of major surveys of under-five mortality in Iraq.[17]

The UN Inter-Agency Group on Child Mortality Estimation estimates that the under-five mortality rate in Iraq was 55 per 1,000 in 1989, 46 per 1,000 in 1999, 42 per 1,000 in 2003, and 37 per 1,000 in 2010 (when Mr Blair gave his evidence to the Inquiry).[18]

In September 2010, Professor Michael Spagat reported that the child mortality estimates reported by the ICMMS were between two and three times higher than those reported by three other major UN-sponsored surveys (the Iraq Living Conditions Survey 2005, the Multiple Indictor Cluster Survey in Iraq 2007 and the Iraq Family Health Survey 2008).[19] He suggested that the high and rising child mortality rates reported by the ICMMS could be explained by:

- the manipulation of the sanctions regime by Saddam Hussein, in order to exacerbate the suffering caused by that regime for political purposes; and
- the manipulation of data by Saddam Hussein's regime, to exaggerate the suffering caused by sanctions.

19. On 19 March, in response to a question from Mr Martin Caton in the House of Commons, Mr Blair said:

> "Of course, I understand that, if there is conflict, there will be civilian casualties … However … civilian casualties in Iraq are occurring every day as a result of the rule of Saddam Hussein. He will be responsible for many, many more deaths even in one year than we will be in any conflict."[20]

20. The Coalition began military action against Iraq later that day.

Assessments of Iraqi civilian casualties during initial combat operations

21. In the second half of 2002, the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) produced four Assessments which identified the possibility of significant civilian casualties in the event of a Coalition attack on Iraq.

22. In August 2002, the JIC assessed Saddam Hussein's diplomatic and military options to deter, avert or limit the scope and effectiveness of a US attack.[21] The JIC's Key Judgements included:

> "Saddam would order the use of CBW [chemical and biological weapons] against Coalition forces at some point, probably after a Coalition attack had begun. Once Saddam was convinced that his fate was sealed, he would order the unrestrained use of CBW against Coalition forces, supporting regional states and Israel."

23. The Assessment also identified a number of "unorthodox options" that Saddam Hussein might pursue, including:

> "… a 'scorched earth' policy … with the aim of creating a humanitarian or environmental catastrophe …"

24. In September, the JIC assessed how Iraq might use chemical and biological weapons.[22] Its Key Judgements included:

> "If not previously employed, Saddam will order the indiscriminate use of whatever CBW weapons remain available late in a ground campaign or as a final act of vengeance."

25. In October, the JIC assessed the likely reaction of the Kurdish and Shia population of Iraq to any US-led attack.[23] It stated that:

> "… spontaneous uprisings, without any clear central leadership, are likely in both southern and northern Iraq … should the regime's control collapse quickly … In both areas there could be violent score settling."

26. In December, the JIC assessed Iraq's military options during Coalition air strikes and a ground attack.[24] Its Key Judgements included:

> "Saddam [Hussein] would use chemical and biological weapons (CBW) if he faced defeat. He might also use them earlier in a conflict, including against coalition forces, neighbouring states and his own people. Israel could be his first target.
>
> "Other Iraqi responses might include seizing hostages as 'human shields'; using non-lethal BW agents in a deniable manner; suicide attacks; or a 'scorched earth' policy with the aim of creating a humanitarian or environmental catastrophe. At some point, motivated by revenge, Saddam would seek to inflict the maximum damage on his enemies, whether Iraqis or outsiders."

27. Sections 6.1 and 6.2 consider UK military planning for the invasion of Iraq, including the development of the UK's Targeting Directive.

28. On 15 January 2003, Mr Blair met Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary, the Chiefs of Staff and others to discuss military planning for Iraq.[25] Mr Blair asked how many civilian casualties there might be, and for a list of the targets which UK air forces might be asked to attack, along with a commentary on their military importance and the risk of casualties.[26]

29. On 3 February, the MOD produced a Casualty Estimate paper for the Chiefs of Staff.[27] The estimates of UK military casualties are described in Section 16.3.

30. The MOD advised that, although detailed assessments of civilian casualties resulting from the air campaign could be produced on a "target-by-target" basis, the target set was not yet sufficiently well defined to allow an estimate to be produced for the air campaign as a whole. Analysis based on estimated civilian casualties during operations over Iraq between 1998 and 1999 suggested that the civilian casualties for an air campaign would be around 150 killed and 500 injured.

31. No assessment had been produced of civilian casualties arising from "urban operations in Basra". Experience from World War II suggested that between 200 and 2,000 civilians could be killed in urban operations in Basra, depending on "circumstances, duration and the degree to which civilian casualties are minimised".

32. Mr Blair was briefed on the targeting aspects of an air campaign by Mr Hoon, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce (Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS)) and Air Commodore Mike Heath (MOD Head of the Directorate of Targeting and Information Operations) on 6 February.[28]

33. At the meeting, Mr Blair underlined the importance of "minimising the number of civilian casualties and ensuring that all targets were appropriate and proportionate" and that consideration should be given to "how best to explain publicly the scale and nature of the campaign".

34. On 19 February, at the request of the Overseas and Defence Secretariat in the Cabinet Office, the JIC provided an Assessment of the situation in southern Iraq and what might happen before, during and after any Coalition military action.[29] The JIC assessed that the "relative weakness of Iraq's conventional forces in the south, and the fact that those forces will face the brunt of a Coalition ground attack" meant that southern Iraq was "the most likely area for the first use of CBW against both Coalition forces and the local population".

35. The JIC identified a number of factors that could undermine popular support for any post-Saddam Hussein administration, including major civilian casualties.

36. In mid-February Mr Blair read the Adelphi Paper Iraq at the Crossroads: State and Society in the Shadow of Regime Change, published by the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS).[30]

37. Several contributors to the Adelphi Paper warned of the potential for violent disorder in post-conflict Iraq.[31] The Paper is addressed in detail in Section 6.5.

38. The Adelphi Paper prompted Mr Blair to ask a number of detailed questions about the military campaign and post-conflict issues, including:

> "What is our military's assessment of the likely consequences of an attack on Iraq; i.e. how many casualties; how quickly the collapse?"[32]

39. General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief US Central Command (CENTCOM), met Mr Blair on 25 February.[33] The record of the meeting written by a No.10 official reported that Mr Blair asked if Gen Franks had "any idea" of the scale of likely civilian casualties.

40. Adm Boyce stated that civilian casualties were likely to be in the "low hundreds". Gen Franks stated that ways to minimise civilian casualties were being explored.

41. Mr Blair concluded that "we must set out our strategy: to destroy the regime but minimise civilian casualties".

42. Mr Peter Watkins, Mr Hoon's Principal Private Secretary, sent the MOD's response to Mr Blair's questions to No.10 on 24 February.[34] Mr Watkins advised that the MOD estimated that the UK "land battle" casualties would be in the order of 30–60 killed, and that Iraqi land battle casualties would be in the order of 500–1,200 killed. Detailed assessments of likely casualties from the air campaign, including civilian casualties, could only be done on a "target-by-target" basis and this work was "in hand". Mr Watkins stated:

> "Iraqi civilian casualties from anything other than the air campaign are likely to be relatively few, unless Coalition forces become engaged in fighting in urban areas."

43. Mr Watkins' letter did not refer to the broad estimates of civilian casualties that had been submitted to the Chiefs of Staff on 3 February.

Civilian casualties during initial combat operations

Provision of medical care to Iraqi citizens

44. Section 16.2 addresses the provision of medical care to UK Service Personnel.

45. The MOD recognised before the invasion that, under the Geneva Convention, it was obliged to provide Iraqi citizens (both military personnel and civilians) with the medical care that they required within the UK's means and capabilities.[35]

46. That obligation was reflected in military planning for Operation TELIC. The MOD's policy was that initial treatment would take place in theatre, with transfer to other countries in the region if transfer was required and if those countries agreed to accept Iraqi citizens for treatment. If those countries did not agree to accept them, the UK would evacuate the very seriously injured to the UK for specialist care.

47. The Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) advised Mr Hoon on 14 May 2003, two weeks after the end of major combat operations, that only seven Iraqi citizens had so far been evacuated to the UK, predominantly for severe burns (PJHQ had planned for the evacuation of 20 Iraqi citizens).

48. The MOD reported in July 2003 that around 200 Iraqi Prisoners of War and 200 Iraqi civilians had been treated in British medical facilities during the deployment and combat phases of Op TELIC.[36]

Reports on civilian casualties

49. On 31 March, Mr Hoon and Adm Boyce briefed Mr Blair on progress on military operations.[37] Mr Blair asked for an estimate of civilian casualties. Mr Hoon replied: "Hundreds."

50. As major combat operations continued, the Government came under sustained pressure in the House of Commons to provide estimates of Iraqi and civilian casualties and to minimise civilian casualties and damage to infrastructure.

51. On 2 April, in response to a question from Mr John MacDougall, Mr Adam Ingram, Minister of State for the Armed Forces, stated:

> "We have no means of ascertaining the numbers of military or civilian lives lost during the conflict in Iraq to date, although we make every effort to keep any impact upon the Iraqi civilian population to an absolute minimum. All our military planning is conducted in full accordance with our obligations under international law to employ the minimum necessary use of force to achieve military effect, and to avoid injury to non-combatants or civilian infrastructure. Practically, this is achieved through a combination of an extremely careful targeting process and highly accurate precision guided weapons."[38]

52. The following day, in response to a question from Ms Caroline Spelman regarding the number of Iraqi civilians who had been injured and killed as a result of the conflict, Mr Ingram stated:

> "… it is impossible to know for sure how many civilians have been injured, or killed and subsequently buried."[39]

53. IBC reported in July 2005 that 7,299 non-combatant civilians had been killed between 20 March 2003 and 30 April 2003.[40] Of those deaths, 6,882 had been caused by US-led forces, 206 by "anti-Occupation forces, unknown agents and crime", and 211 by both US-led and anti-Occupation forces.

Battle Damage Assessment

Section 6.2 describes the main principles of International Humanitarian Law (IHL), also known as the Law of Armed Conflict (LOAC) or the Law of War, how they were disseminated to those engaged in military action, and how they were reflected in the UK's Targeting Directive and Rules of Engagement (ROEs).

The key elements of IHL which apply to targeting of military objectives during a conflict are set out in the 1977 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 (Protocol I). The main principles can be summarised as:

- Distinction. The parties to the conflict must at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants, and between civilian objects and military objectives, and shall direct their operations only against military objectives (Article 48).
- Proportionality. Military objectives must not be attacked if the attack is likely to cause civilian casualties or damage which would be excessive in relation to the concrete and direct military advantage anticipated (Article 57:2:b).
- Military Necessity. Offensive operations must be limited to those which are necessary (Article 57:3).
- Feasible Precautions. In the conduct of military operations, constant care shall be taken to spare the civilian population, civilians and civilian objects.

Those who plan or decide upon an attack must take a number of specified precautions, focusing on the principles outlined above (Article 57).

The Battle Damage Assessment (BDA) process in place at the beginning of Op TELIC was set out in the UK's 2001 'Joint Targeting and Battle Damage Assessment for UK Forces'.[41]

The paper stated that the purpose of BDA was:

> "… to evaluate the overall effectiveness of an attack. It is also required to determine collateral and additional damage in order to provide an authoritative statement about the proportionality and legality of the attack, and on the absence or presence of collateral or additional damage when required for rebuttal purposes."[42]

The paper defined "collateral damage" as unintentional or incidental damage affecting facilities, equipment or personnel that were not justifiable military objectives. It defined "additional damage" as unintentional or incidental damage affecting facilities, equipment or personnel that were justifiable military objectives.

The paper did not describe how, after an attack, the number of civilian casualties should be determined.

The MOD told the Inquiry that, during Op TELIC 1, civilian casualty incidents were classed as "serious incidents" for which investigation was mandated by the Commanding Officer and a "higher authority".[43] The process was formalised in June 2003, so that any incident judged to have potentially fallen outside the UK's ROEs was fully investigated by the Service Police.

Case study of a bombing in a Basra suburb, 5 April 2003

54. The deaths of 10 members of the Hamoudi family in a Coalition air strike on houses in a residential area of Basra in early April 2003 attracted significant media attention.

55. The Inquiry has considered, as a case study, the Government's role in and response to the air strike.

56. The UK military undertook a Rapid Collateral Damage Assessment on 4 April 2003 for a possible attack on a small group of residential houses in Basra that were expected to be visited by General Ali Hasan Al-Majid (also known as Chemical Ali).[44] Gen Al-Majid was described as responsible for co-ordinating resistance to the Coalition within southern Iraq and therefore as a combatant.[45]

57. The Assessment concluded that seven houses (not including those targeted) might suffer collateral damage, and that there would be additional casualties in the open, resulting in 39 civilian casualties in a day attack and 51 in a night attack (again, not including casualties in the targeted houses).[46] No separate estimate had been made of damage to or casualties in the targeted buildings.

58. Given the number of expected civilian casualties (more than 30), approval for the attack was referred from HQ 1st (UK) Armoured Division to Air Marshal (AM) Brian Burridge, the UK's National Contingent Commander, and hence to Mr Hoon.[47]

59. AM Burridge advised Mr Hoon that:

> "… the expected civilian casualties … would not be excessive in relation to the direct and concrete military advantage anticipated should Al-Majid be successfully targeted. The attack is therefore capable of being assessed as proportional by the Commander."[48]

60. On 4 April, Mr Hoon agreed that the attack should proceed.[49] However, Gen Al-Majid was reported to have left the location before the attack could be carried out.

61. In the expectation of Gen Al-Majid's return, AM Burridge also sought approval for the attack from CENTCOM.[50]

62. CENTCOM agreed the attack early on 5 April, subject to a reduction in the ordnance to be used from 500lb and 1,000lb bombs to 500lb bombs only, in order to minimise collateral damage.[51]

63. At 0530 local time on 5 April, following reports that Gen Al-Majid had returned to the location, US forces dropped seven bombs on the target.[52] The US reported immediately after the attack that:

- four bombs had hit the target and detonated;
- two bombs had missed the target; and
- one bomb had hit the target but failed to detonate.

64. Mr Abed Hassan Hamoudi wrote to the "Head of Coalition Forces" in Basra on 12 April, informing him that 10 members of his family had been killed when a number of rockets from Coalition aircraft had hit his house.[53] He had received no expression of condolence or explanation for the attack. Mr Hamoudi indicated that he would seek compensation for the attack and said that he had authorised his son, Mr Sudad Hamoudi, to pursue the case.

65. The Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre (JARIC) produced a Phase 1 Battle Damage Assessment (BDA) for the attack on Gen Al-Majid on 14 April.[54] It stated that no collateral damage had been observed.

66. By 15 April, HQ 1st (UK) Armoured Division had associated the attack on Gen Al-Majid with the deaths reported by Mr Hamoudi.[55]

67. HQ 7 Armoured Brigade (then responsible for the Basra battlespace) issued a consolidated BDA for the Basra urban area on 19 April.[56] The BDA covered 15 targets which had been engaged by precision guided munitions, including the 5 April attack on Gen Al-Majid. The BDA for that attack reported that the target residence had been completely destroyed, but Gen Al-Majid was believed to have escaped. The attack had damaged other properties and caused civilian casualties; one neighbour had claimed that 10 members of his family including four children had been killed, and another neighbour had claimed that an additional seven children had been killed.

68. The consolidated BDA made no mention of civilian casualties in its reports on any of the other attacks.

69. The consolidated BDA considered the contribution that pre-planned strikes had made to the campaign, and concluded that:

> "… PGMs [precision guided munitions] shortened the battle … and as a result, reduced loss of life on both sides."

70. An MOD official advised Mr Ingram on 23 April that an investigation into Coalition activity on 5 April, the BDA of the attack on Gen Al-Majid, and other evidence indicated that Mr Hamoudi's claim was true.[57] Two of the bombs had missed their target "and we suspect therefore that these bombs caused the collateral damage to Mr Hamoudi's house".

71. The official also advised that although the MOD had not yet developed a policy on compensation, it was unlikely that Mr Hamoudi would have a claim. There was no legal obligation on the Coalition to compensate civilians affected by hostilities. In line with previous operations, the MOD would not expect to offer compensation for damages resulting from legitimate targeting during hostilities.

72. Mr Ingram wrote to Mr Sudad Hamoodi on 4 June. Mr Ingram advised that the UK had "looked into" the circumstances surrounding the event and could confirm that the deaths were:

> "… likely to have been the result of Coalition bombing aimed at General … Al Majid. There as no deliberate targeting of your father's home and the losses suffered by your family were quite unintended. I appreciate that this may be of very little comfort to you now.
> "… the Coalition does take every care to ensure that our military action avoids injury to civilian populations. That said it is not possible to eliminate the risk to civilians entirely, but I hope you will understand that when civilians are injured or killed in this way, this is a tragic accident rather than a deliberate event."[58]

73. Mr Sudad Hamoudi replied to Mr Ingram on 8 June, posing a number of questions including:

- Was the intelligence that had placed Gen Al-Majid at the location (in a residential district) reliable?
- Why had the family not been warned about the possibility of an attack, so that they could have taken action to ensure their own safety?
- Whether it was correct to describe the deaths as an accident, when they had resulted from a deliberate action.[59]

[59] Letter Hamoodi to Ingram, 8 June 2003, [untitled].

74. Mr Sudad Hamoudi concluded that there had to be "some kind of accountability" for the loss of civilian lives.

75. An MOD official provided Mr Ingram with a draft reply to Mr Sudad Hamoudi's letter on 20 June.[60] The official advised that further analysis of the attack suggested that the damage to Mr Abed Hamoudi's house had not been caused by one of the two bombs that had missed their target, as had been suggested in the 23 April minute to Mr Ingram, but had instead been "an unavoidable consequence of an accurate strike on the target house". The official continued:

> "The targeting planning process identified that collateral damage was likely in neighbouring properties to the target area. If the Hamoudi house was one of these, it therefore seems possible it was damaged as an expected and unavoidable consequence of the strike on the building believed to contain General 'Chemical' Ali Hassan Al-Majid, although at the moment we cannot say this with certainty.
> "Although we can say with complete certainty that the Hamoudi house was not deliberately targeted by the Coalition … it becomes difficult in this particular instance to sustain with any confidence the line that this was an accident."

76. The MOD official stated that there was nevertheless no doubt as to the legitimacy of the attack.

77. The official also stated: "In line with previous operations we would not expect to offer compensation for damages resulting from legitimate targeting during hostilities."

78. Mr Ingram replied to Mr Sudad Hamoudi on 23 June.[61] He reiterated his sorrow at the deaths caused by the attack and set out the UK Government's position on its legality:

> "As the Commander of the Southern Region [of Iraq] … Al-Majid was a key Iraqi military figure whose removal from command was expected to deliver considerable military advantage … thus ultimately minimising casualties on both sides. The attack on the place where he was believed to be located was therefore entirely lawful."

79. Mr Ingram was advised on 10 July – over three months after the attack – that the UK's "research" into the incident remained "incomplete, and the information available ambiguous".[62] PJHQ was trying to confirm the address of Mr Hamoudi's house, and that the strike on Gen Al-Majid was "actually accurate and directed against the correct co-ordinates".

80. Members of the Iraq Inquiry Committee met members of the Hamoudi family in 2010.

Responding to demands to count civilian casualties

81. From early June 2003, and throughout the summer, there were signs that security in both Baghdad and the South was deteriorating.

82. The Government continued to face pressure in Parliament to provide estimates of the numbers of Iraqi citizens who had died during the conflict. The Government's line remained that the UK had no means of ascertaining the number of Iraqi Service Personnel or civilians who had been killed during the conflict.

83. On 14 October 2003, in response to a question from Mr Adam Price regarding the number of Iraqi civilians who had been killed by UK or US forces in Iraq since the end of the conflict, Mr Hoon said:

> "We make every effort to minimise the impact of military operations on the Iraqi civilian population.
>
> "We have no reliable means of ascertaining the numbers of civilians killed by United Kingdom Forces since the conflict ended."[63]

84. FCO and MOD officials discussed that response.

85. On 12 November, an FCO official reported to Mr John Buck, FCO Director Iraq, that according to MOD officials:

> "… notwithstanding this answer, records are kept of all significant incidents involving UK forces. A significant incident would include … a soldier wounding or killing a civilian. At present, this information is not collated, although PJHQ accept that it could be."[64]

86. That collated information would not necessarily be "fully reliable", as UK forces could not always be sure if someone had been killed or wounded in an incident, and whether that person was a civilian.

87. On the same day, PJHQ sent Mr Hoon a report on the death of two Iraqi adults and the injury of an Iraqi child in an incident involving UK forces.[65]

88. The report prompted Mr Hoon to ask PJHQ for "further advice on the total numbers of civilians killed by UK forces since the end of major combat operations".[66]

89. On 13 November, in response to a question from Mr Price in the House of Commons, Mr Ingram confirmed that the Special Investigation Branch (SIB) of the Royal Military Police (RMP) had begun investigations into 17 civilian fatalities allegedly caused by UK forces.[67]

90. Mr Straw wrote to Mr Hoon on 18 November to ask that the MOD examine whether it would be viable to collate information on post-conflict civilian casualties inflicted lawfully and in accordance with the UK's Rules of Engagement by UK forces (and other troop contributors) in the UK's Area of Responsibility.[68] Mr Straw recalled recent media and NGO reporting on the "allegedly high levels of civilian casualties inflicted by Coalition forces" and the level of Parliamentary and public interest, and continued:

> "I recognise fully the difficulties involved in compiling accurate statistics about civilian casualties, particularly during combat operations. But I am concerned that the current UK/US position – that 'there is no reliable means of ascertaining the number of civilian casualties, even in post-conflict Iraq' – leaves the field entirely open to our critics and lets them set the agenda …
> "We need to find ways of countering the damaging perception that civilians are being killed needlessly, and in large numbers, by Coalition forces."

91. Mr Straw referred to the work of IBC, which he described as having "some credibility (within the sourcing limitations)".

92. Mr Hoon's Private Office passed Mr Straw's letter to PJHQ, asking for a draft reply.[69] Mr Hoon's Private Office commented that they had already asked PJHQ to identify the total number of civilians killed by UK forces since the end of major combat operations.

93. PJHQ replied to Mr Hoon's Private Office on 25 November.[70] It confirmed that assessment reports (ASSESSREPs) recorded the detail of contacts and incidents in the UK's Area of Operations, including details of civilian "casualties or deaths". It would take two weeks to review all ASSESSREPs produced since 1 May 2003, to determine the number of Iraqi civilian casualties. The number produced would not be "definitive or entirely comprehensive"; ASSESSREPs would only cover incidents which were witnessed by or involved UK forces.

94. PJHQ also advised:

> "The current line, that there is no reliable way of knowing how many casualties there have been … was perfectly reasonable during the decisive combat phase of Op TELIC … as long-range attacks meant that there was no source on the ground to verify … casualty numbers.

> "Since … the end of decisive combat operations, this line has become more difficult to defend as confirmed cases of civilian casualties where UK forces are involved are recorded locally."

95. Mr Hoon replied to Mr Straw the following day, advising that neither Iraqi ministries nor Coalition Forces currently had the capacity to collate definitive statistics on the causes of death or injury to civilians.[71] He nevertheless shared Mr Straw's desire to be able to produce accurate casualty statistics "to be able to refute some of the more wild speculation". The SIB was investigating 17 civilian fatalities allegedly caused by UK forces. The MOD was "seeking to analyse" incident reports produced since 1 May 2003 in order to determine the likely number of "additional Iraqi civilian deaths". That process would take some time; Mr Hoon undertook to write to Mr Straw with the results.

96. Mr Price secured an Adjournment Debate on "military operations and civilian deaths in post-war Iraq", which was held in Westminster Hall on 7 January 2004.[72] Mr Price had previously tabled 17 Parliamentary Questions on civilian casualties in post-war Iraq and had sent his paper Can Kill, Won't Count to Mr Hoon and the Attorney General.

97. Mr Ingram's briefing for the debate advised that the review of ASSESSREPs which had been initiated the previous month had been completed. In addition to the 17 civilian deaths which were subject to investigation by SIB/RMP, the review had identified a further 17 civilians who had been killed by UK forces; one in an (unspecified) accident and 16 in circumstances where force was deemed to have been used in accordance with the UK's Rules of Engagement.

98. Opening the debate, Mr Price asked Mr Ingram how many civilian casualties had been reported by UK forces.[73] In his response, Mr Ingram referred to the 17 deaths that were being investigated by SIB/RMP, but not to the 17 further deaths that the MOD review had identified.

99. Mr Ingram rejected the charge that the UK was refusing to keep records of civilian casualties:

> "That is not true … Although we record all such incidents, it would be wrong to claim that we have an exhaustive record, because we cannot always be certain of the number of fatalities that result. In some incidents … those who have been attacking UK forces and who have been injured or killed are removed from the scene …
> "There have also been incidents in which UK forces have been forced to withdraw from an engagement with no reliable means of ascertaining the number of fatalities … Finally, gun battles have taken place in which our forces were not involved, but there have been claims that they were responsible for casualties none the less."

100. Mr Ingram also clarified the MOD's definition of a civilian:

> "For our purposes, the term 'civilian' applies to all Iraqis. Besides peaceful law-abiding men, women and children, it includes those former regime loyalists who have since April continued to bomb, kill and maim their fellow Iraqi countrymen and women and Coalition troops."

101. On 6 February, in response to a written Parliamentary Question from Mr Price, Mr Ingram stated:

> "As at 2 February, since the end of major combat operations 37 alleged fatalities had been reported by British units of which 18 have been the subject of investigations. All those not subject to investigation involved assailants attacking British forces and in defending themselves the soldiers involved were acting clearly within their Rules of Engagement."[74]

102. That was the first public statement, of which the Inquiry is aware, of the number of civilians killed by UK forces in Iraq.

103. IBC reported on 7 February 2004 that the number of "non-combatant civilian" deaths in Iraq during 2003 "as a result of the US/UK-led invasion and Occupation of Iraq" might have passed 10,000.[75]

104. IBC commented:

> "Pushing the total past the 10,000 mark were recent reports of Iraqi policemen killed since Saddam's fall in April. It is unsurprising that, as the CPA [Coalition Provisional Authority] and Occupying forces bunker themselves behind concrete fortresses, their most exposed and least well-protected front-line defence, members of the 'new' Iraqi civil defence and police forces, have suffered disproportionately."

105. On 23 April, at his request, Mr Blair received 19 "unvarnished accounts" of progress on security, the political process and reconstruction in Iraq (see Section 9.2).

106. In his response to those accounts, Mr Blair asked for answers to four specific questions, including:

> "How many civilians have been killed in Iraq, and how? The figure of 15,000 is out there as a fact – is it accurate?"[76]

107. The Cabinet Office responded to that question on 30 April, as part of a detailed update on the capabilities of the Iraqi Security Forces.[77] It advised that there were no accurate estimates of the number of Iraqi casualties since the start of combat operations; figures ranged from 5,000 to 20,000. The MOD's public line had been that it was not possible to determine the number of civilian casualties, and that UK forces took every effort to minimise the impact of military operations on the civilian population.

108. An "initial assessment" undertaken by the MOD in February 2004 had indicated that 36 civilians had died as a result of UK actions since 1 May 2003.[78] The MOD was now undertaking a "comprehensive assessment" of unit records to produce a more accurate estimate; the outcome of that assessment would be shared with Ministers in May.

109. On 21 May, No.10 asked the FCO to "look again" at the question of civilian casualty figures, and for a weekly "digest" of casualty figures.[79]

110. The FCO replied on 26 May. It stated that CPA advisers to the Iraqi Ministry of Health (MOH) had told the FCO that the MOH did not have reliable figures for civilian deaths or their causes. The MOH was gradually re-establishing standard practices and procedures, but those were still "very basic".

111. The FCO concluded that the UK did not have reliable figures for overall civilian casualties. As the MOH improved its systems, it might be possible for the Iraqi Interim Government (IIG) to determine numbers and causes of civilian deaths and injuries: "But, for now, we are primarily reliant on NGO websites whose reliability we cannot easily assess."

112. The Inquiry has seen no indications that the FCO provided a weekly digest on civilian casualties to No.10.

113. In response to a written question from Lord Lester of Herne Hill on whether the CPA had access to hospital records detailing Iraqi civilian deaths and injuries and their causes, Baroness Symons, FCO Minister of State, stated on 7 June:

> "Coalition Provisional Authority advisers to the Iraqi Ministry of Health (MOH) do have access to some figures on civilian deaths. However these statistics are not reliable, as Iraqis often bury their deceased relatives without official notification/ registration. This has been particularly true during periods of heightened conflict. The MOH does not therefore have accurate figures for civilian deaths or their causes for the past year. The MOH is gradually re-establishing standard practices and procedures, although these are basic. In the longer term the Iraqi Interim Government may be able to evaluate the causes of civilian deaths and injuries."[80]

[80] House of Lords, Official Report, 7 June 2004, column WA1.

114. Lord Lester followed up that reply by asking the UK Government to publish the MOH statistics on Iraqi civilian deaths and injuries. Baroness Symons replied on 24 June:

> "There are no reliable figures for Iraqi civilian deaths since March 2003. The Iraqi Ministry of Health has informed us that the number of civilians killed in security incidents is 1,203 and 3,992 wounded dating from when statistics began on 5 April 2004. However they reflect only hospital admissions and may not be comprehensive. It is not possible to break these down into how they were killed or who may have been responsible. It includes casualties caused by terrorist action."[81]

115. The Occupation of Iraq formally came to an end on 28 June. Power was transferred from the CPA and Iraqi Governing Council to the IIG.[82]

116. On 6 October, the US media reported that the Iraqi MOH had recorded 3,487 insurgency-related deaths between 5 April, when the MOH began compiling data, and 19 September.[83] According to (unnamed) Iraqi officials, between 10 June (when the MOH began compiling data on cause of death) and 10 September, 1,295 Iraqis had been killed by "multinational forces and police" and 516 by "terrorist operations". The MOH defined terrorist operations as explosive devices in residential areas, car bombs and assassinations.

117. The US media reported that the MOH was "convinced" that nearly all of those reported dead were civilians or police and Iraqi national guardsmen, rather than insurgents; family members would often not report the death of a relative who had died fighting for an insurgent group.

118. No.10 wrote to the FCO on 11 October:

> "The Prime Minister [Mr Blair] has asked for an updated assessment of civilian casualties in Iraq. This should include our best estimate of civilian casualties since military action was launched last year, what the US are saying, and a comparison with figures being produced by other bodies (e.g. NGOs, Brookings) and/or quoted in the media.
>
> "The Prime Minister is concerned that we are not getting the message across effectively enough about the extent of insurgent/foreign terrorist responsibility for civilian deaths."[84]

119. Mr Robin Cook (Labour) asked Mr Straw in the House of Commons on 12 October whether he had seen the MOH figures highlighted in the US media reports, which showed that "two thirds of the civilians killed in the last six months died as a result of coalition bombing".[85]

120. Mr Straw said that he had not seen those figures.[86]

121. An MOD official provided a contribution to the FCO's response to No.10 on 13 October.[87] The MOD official confirmed that the MOD did not estimate civilian casualties because it believed that there was no reliable method for doing so, adding:

> "This is not merely our public line but our genuine judgement."

122. The official dismissed the suggestion, made by the FCO, that the civilian casualty figures that were reported to the weekly Chiefs of Staff meeting could serve as a reliable estimate of total civilian casualties. Those figures were compiled by the US based on incomplete "reporting of incidents" to US Corps HQ. The figures were reported to Chiefs of Staff as trends in them indicated whether the security situation was improving or deteriorating.

123. The official concluded by re-stating:

> "… the MOD does not produce an estimate of civilian casualties, either within our own area of operation or across Iraq. We have no methodology which would enable us to do this; nor do we believe it possible to define a methodology that would produce figures meaningful enough to alleviate No.10's concern about public presentation."

124. The FCO replied to No.10 on 14 October, having consulted UK advisers in the Iraqi MOH.[88] The FCO recommended that the UK should not take any ownership of figures of civilian casualties; none of the estimates available were reliable, and the UK Government would have difficulty in defending the methodology behind them to the media and Parliament.

125. The UK would also have difficulty in compiling its own statistics:

> "We rarely have our own people on the ground following terrorist attacks, often relying on press statistics. But their figures result in widely varying estimates …"

126. The FCO advised that it regarded hospital and mortuary admissions collated by the Iraqi MOH as the "most reliable" figures available, although there were a number of deficiencies:

- Monthly and six-monthly MOH reports were not consistent.

- Civilians who were taken to hospital injured and subsequently died were counted as injured.
- Hospital staff had come under (unspecified) pressure to inflate casualty figures.

127. The FCO also advised that the Iraqi MOH had publicly estimated that 3,617 Iraqi civilians had been killed and 14,554 injured in the period from 5 April 2004 to 25 September 2004. An unpublished MOH estimate indicated that of those casualties, 516 had been killed and 2,016 injured in "terrorist attacks".

128. The FCO reported that the UK's Joint Terrorism Analysis Centre (JTAC) gave "a very different estimate" of 1,125 fatalities caused by "foreign fighters" since the beginning of 2004. Of those casualties, nearly 1,000 were civilians.

129. The FCO concluded that the UK should be "wary" about being drawn into a debate on which of those figures was accurate. Another unpublished MOH estimate indicated that 1,295 Iraqi citizens had been killed and 5,479 injured in the period from 16 June 2004 to 10 September 2004 "in military action":

> "This is more than double the number they [the Iraqi MOH] estimate were killed by terrorists. Although the figures include insurgents as well as civilians, the Iraqi figures as they stand now will not help us make the case that more civilians have been killed by terrorists than by military action."

130. The FCO continued:

> "In sum, if we produce a figure that differs from the Iraqi Government figures, we will have to defend it – and the way it was arrived at – before Parliament and the media … We recommend that for the moment we continue to put our public emphasis on specific atrocities against civilians …"

131. Mr David Quarrey, a Private Secretary to Mr Blair, passed the FCO's advice to Mr Blair the following day.[89] Mr Quarrey commented:

> "You asked for an assessment of civilian casualties in Iraq, noting that we cannot let figures of 10–15,000 go unchallenged as if we are responsible for all of them …
>
> "The FCO recommend that we stick to publicising terrorist responsibility for civilian casualties in individual incidents. Underlying this is concern that any overall assessment of civilian casualties will show that MNF [Multi-National Force – Iraq] are responsible for significantly more than insurgents/terrorists.
>
> "But we should be able to handle this better …"

132. Mr Quarrey advised Mr Blair that he intended to ask the Cabinet Office to convene a meeting of departments to initiate a trial period of monitoring daily statistics on fatalities, drawing on whatever information was available. The Government could then assess how "credible (and helpful) the information would be publicly". Mr Quarrey concluded:

---

[89] Minute Quarrey to Prime Minister, 15 October 2004, 'Iraq: Civilian Casualties'.

> "If the trial is successful, we could look at outsourcing to a credible external organisation (e.g. a think-tank or academics)."

133. Mr Blair agreed that approach.[90]

134. Mr Quarrey wrote to the MOD on 18 October, to confirm that he had asked the Cabinet Office to convene a meeting to discuss how to take forward a trial monitoring period "in order to demonstrate more effectively the harm being inflicted by terrorism in Iraq".[91] Copies of Mr Quarrey's letter were sent to the FCO and other departments.

135. A Cabinet Office official chaired a meeting on 22 October to plan how to take forward the trial monitoring period.[92] During the meeting, officials stated that there was a risk that the UK might come under pressure to disclose publicly any conclusions that were reached. Mr Quarrey told the meeting that No.10 believed that the UK needed to make a "serious attempt to quantify what is happening".

136. Officials agreed that:

- The "headline task" was to quantify, as precisely as possible, the number of civilian deaths caused by a) insurgents and b) coalition military action (both MNF – I and the Iraqi Security Forces).
- The best way to do that was to break the task down. The FCO would report from open sources, the MOD would report from Multi-National Division (South-East) (MND(SE))[93] using existing military reporting systems, and JTAC/PJHQ would analyse US statistics on casualties.
- The trial period would run for the month of November.

137. An MOD official wrote to the Cabinet Office on 28 October, setting out the MOD's concerns about the trial process.[94] The MOD's position remained that it did not believe it was possible to establish an accurate methodology for estimating the total number of civilian casualties. Although incident reports could be analysed, there was a danger that:

> "… once we have adopted a methodology, Parliament and the public would in future expect us to apply this no matter what the intensity of the operation."

[94] Letter MOD [junior official] to Cabinet Office [junior official], 28 October 2004, [untitled].

138. The official recalled the limitations of the incident-reporting process, and concluded:

> "… if HMG [Her Majesty's Government] really does wish to get into the business of challenging media and NGO statistics, we would need to open up discussions with the US and other coalition partners on how to change the incident reporting process in order that – in future – it attributed blame for civilian killings."

139. An FCO official wrote to the Cabinet Office on the same day, setting out how the FCO intended to contribute to the trial.[95] It would report figures compiled by NGOs and the media but not amend them in any way. To do so would suggest that those NGO and media figures had some reliability, when the UK's public line was that they did not. Any amendments would also make the figures releasable under the Freedom of Information Act (which would come into effect the following year). The FCO concluded:

> "The focus of our work will instead be on the figures produced by the Iraqi Ministry of Health (MOH) … these too have their limitations. However, we will work with the MOH during the next few weeks to see if these statistics can be improved."

140. On 29 October, as the Government's trial monitoring period got under way, The Lancet published a study by the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health entitled Mortality before and after the 2003 invasion of Iraq: cluster sample survey (the Lancet study).[96]

141. The study was based on a survey of 988 households in 33 clusters. It found that there had been 98,000 more deaths from all causes in Iraq than expected in the 18 months since the invasion (95 percent confidence interval 8,000–94,000) outside of Fallujah. There would be "far more" deaths if data from the Fallujah cluster were included.

142. The study stated that violence accounted for most of the excess deaths, that violent deaths were "mainly attributed" to coalition forces, and that most individuals reportedly killed by coalition forces were women and children. On the causes of death, the study stated:

> "The major causes of death before the invasion were myocardial infarction, cerebrovascular accidents, and other chronic disorders whereas after the invasion violence was the primary cause of death."

143. There had been an increase in the infant mortality rate, from 29 deaths per 1,000 live births to 57 deaths per 1,000 live births.

144. The study stated that there had been 53 deaths in the Fallujah cluster when only 1.4 had been expected. That indicated that there had been about 200,000 excess deaths in Fallujah. However, the uncertainty in that estimate was "substantial".

145. On the same day, following a discussion with the MOD's Director of News, Professor Sir Roy Anderson, the MOD's Chief Scientific Adviser (CSA), "quickly reviewed" the study.[97] His Private Secretary sent his conclusions to Mr Hoon's Private Office and senior MOD officials:

> "CSA has concluded that the design of the study is robust … He therefore believes that the paper is a sensible one … and that the results are probably as robust as one could have achieved in the very difficult circumstances. He therefore recommends that we should proceed with caution in publicly criticising the paper.
> "He would, however, add three caveats. First, extrapolation from a very small sample size to the whole of Iraq is a weakness … Second, there are weaknesses in the way that deaths have been recorded … in many cases the only evidence of a death having occurred, and of the cause of death, was the verbal information provided from (not necessarily disinterested) family members. And finally … there were excess of deaths amongst males, possibly indicating that some of those who died were combatants rather than civilians."

146. The Iraq Policy Unit (IPU) sent a copy of the minute to Mr Straw's Private Office on 4 November.[98]

147. The Iraqi Minister of Health issued a statement on 29 October, offering his Ministry's own figures of civilian casualties:

> "Every hospital reports daily the number of civilians (which may include insurgents) who have been killed or injured in terrorist incidents or as a result of military action. All casualties are likely to be taken to hospital in these circumstances except for some insurgents (who may fear arrest) and those with minor injuries. The figures show that between 5 April 2004 and 5 October 2004, 3,853 civilians were killed and 15,517 were injured. I am satisfied that this information is the most reliable available."[99]

148. The Lancet study, and the interest shown in it by the media and MPs, prompted a discussion between Mr Hoon and Mr Straw over whether the MOD or the FCO should have responsibility for the issue of civilian casualties.[100] That discussion would continue, between senior officials, until December.

149. On 3 November, Mr Blair told the House of Commons that "we do not accept the figures released by The Lancet … at all".[101] Mr Blair went on to cite the figures released by the Iraqi Minister of Health.

150. The following day, Mr Straw said on Today that "our people are still looking into it [the Lancet study], the epidemiologists and statisticians".[102] Mr Straw also said that he would make the Government's assessment available to Parliament.

151. An IPU official provided advice to Mr Straw's Private Secretary on 4 November on how Mr Straw might respond to Mr Hoon's letter of 2 November, which had proposed that the FCO should have responsibility for the issue of civilian casualties.[103]

152. In that context, the official reported on the options for producing the assessment of the Lancet study that Mr Straw had promised to provide to Parliament:

> "One option … is that we rely on assessments from the Iraqi Ministry of Health; another is that we draw on the help of MOD experts. We already have the views of the MOD Chief Scientific Adviser … It is not a promising start. We are awaiting a report from the Iraqi Ministry of Health setting out their assessment of civilian casualties; we believe this will be a better line of response."

153. Mr Quarrey passed a transcript of a Newsnight discussion on the Lancet study to Mr Blair on 5 November.[104]

154. Mr Blair commented: "We must get robust lines on numbers killed since the war and on number of airstrikes."[105]

155. Mr Quarrey wrote to Mr Straw's Private Secretary on 8 November to confirm that the FCO should lead on the issue of civilian casualties.[106] Mr Quarrey reported that Mr Blair remained concerned that the UK was not getting across its message about "the extent of insurgent/foreign terrorist responsibility for civilian deaths", and that Mr Blair wanted the FCO to develop a "quicker and more forceful response to claims about civilian deaths that we regard as unfounded (e.g. the Lancet claims)".

156. Mr Dominic Asquith, FCO Director Iraq, advised Mr Straw later that day that he should challenge that allocation of responsibility.[107]

157. Mr Asquith said that MNF-I produced a daily update on operations which included details of civilian casualties (killed and wounded). The MOD itself produced the figures for MND(SE). PJHQ collated the daily MNF-I reports for the weekly Chiefs of Staff meeting.

158. The Cabinet Office was currently overseeing a trial to determine civilian casualties in MND(SE). The MOD was, however, arguing that it could not provide either the MNF-I or its own MND(SE) casualty figures to the exercise, as the US military did not allow publication of country-wide information on civilian casualties on security grounds. The MNF-I figures would in any case be unlikely to be comprehensive and did not show who was responsible for civilian casualties.

159. The UK's current line was to rely on Iraqi MOH figures, though that might not be sustainable in the face of increasing Parliamentary, NGO and media demands that the UK release its own statistics. The current military operation in Fallujah was increasing pressure on MNF-I to prove that it was making every effort to minimise civilian casualties, and:

> "There will be seen to be a certain plausibility in the argument that we can only do so if we can provide credible (i.e. our own) figures for casualties."

160. Mr Asquith concluded that any estimate of casualties, other than from MOH and NGO sources, would have to come from MNF-I, which was deployed throughout Iraq. But the MOD had ruled out the use of the MNF-I figures. If the MOD felt there were good reasons for holding back its own figures for MND(SE), it (rather than the FCO) should explain those reasons to Parliament and to the public.

161. Mr Asquith continued that if the FCO did accept the lead on handling civilian casualty issues, it should be on three conditions:

> "(a) MOD to explore with DoD [the US Department of Defense] reverting to the practice at the time of the first Gulf War when civilian casualties were released into the public domain.
>
> (b) If DoD refuses, MOD to explain publicly (to Parliament) why it is not possible to produce estimates from MNF-I sources.
> (c) FCO to lead on the handling of civilian casualties … But Ministers should be clear that, in the absence of releasable data from military sources, we will be heavily dependent on figures from the Iraqi MOH which will not be comprehensive …"

162. Mr Asquith advised Mr Straw in a separate minute on the same day:

> "Legal Advisers say there are no obligations to report civilian casualties in the Fourth Geneva Convention … or under any other provision of international humanitarian law.
> "While it is essential in advance of any particular attack to assess the likely civilian casualties, there is no obligation after the event to make any assessment of either > the civilian casualties resulting from the attacks or of the overall civilian casualties of a conflict."[108]

163. Also on 8 November, Mr Straw chaired a meeting with FCO officials including Mr Creon Butler, the FCO's Chief Economist, to discuss the scope of a Written Ministerial Statement that he would make on 17 November, responding to the Lancet study.[109]

164. After the meeting, Mr Butler sent Mr Straw's Private Secretary his "initial thoughts" on the Lancet study.[110] Mr Butler stated that "the statistical methodology appears sound" and concluded:

> "In commenting on the study we should certainly continue to emphasise the considerable uncertainty around the central estimate [of 98,000 excess deaths] (reflecting the small sample size), as well as the lack of corroborating evidence – particularly evidence of injured in the numbers one might expect. We could also highlight some of the factors which might bias the study towards an over-estimate of deaths. However, there are as many reasons why the study might be biased in the other direction (so probably safer not to go down this road)."

165. Mr Butler stated that the "lack of corroborating evidence" related in particular to the apparent mismatch between the central estimate of 98,000 excess deaths and the much lower estimates based on press reporting and the lack of anecdotal evidence for large numbers of injured Iraqi citizens attending Iraqi hospitals. The latter mismatch was "much harder to explain".

166. Mr Butler considered how the estimates presented in the Lancet study might be validated and refined using data from other sources. He concluded:

> "In the absence of a detailed census (impossible in the current security environment), the best way of narrowing down the uncertainty … is likely to be to conduct a similar survey with a significantly larger sample."

167. On 9 November, the MOD sent the Cabinet Office a summary of incident reports for MND(SE) for the seven days up to 7 November, as part of the trial monitoring period.[111] There had been no incidents involving civilian fatalities; two civilians had been injured in an (unspecified) accident.

168. On 11 November, Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon discussed which department should be responsible for work on casualty figures.[112] After the meeting, Mr Straw's Private Secretary asked Sir Michael Jay, the FCO Permanent Under Secretary, to liaise with Sir Kevin Tebbit, MOD Permanent Under Secretary, to secure the MOD's agreement to take on that responsibility.

169. At Cabinet on 11 November, Mr Straw told colleagues that he would be making a Written Ministerial Statement on the estimate of civilian casualties published by The Lancet, and that he proposed to make more use of the Iraqi MOH figures, which were "more reliable".[113]

170. On 12 November, the Iraq Senior Officials Group agreed that there was "potential advantage" in making more use of the Iraqi MOH's figures, but the UK needed to recognise the presentational difficulties of using those figures while "using US figures for internal planning purposes without publicly acknowledging their existence".[114] It would be useful to compare the MOH figures with those produced for the Chiefs of Staff by PJHQ.

171. Mr Straw issued a Written Ministerial Statement on 17 November, responding to the Lancet study.[115] Mr Straw stated that during the period of major combat operations, the Coalition had made every effort to minimise civilian casualties. He continued:

> "Casualties – civilian and military – which have occurred since major combat operations ended on 1 May 2003 have done so directly as a result of those determined to undermine the political process."

172. Mr Straw rejected the suggestion in the Lancet study that there was a legal obligation (deriving from Article 27 of the fourth Geneva Convention) for the MNF-I to assess civilian casualties.

173. Mr Straw stated that the UK Government shared the Iraqi Minister of Health's view, expressed in his 29 October statement, that the MOH's information was the most reliable available. The "running estimate" provided by IBC "suggested" that between 14,284 and 16,419 Iraqi civilians had died since March 2003. While that was "an estimate relying on media reports, and which we do not regard as reliable", IBC's figures did show that the Iraqi MOH's figures were not the only ones to differ widely from those presented in the Lancet study.

174. Mr Straw stated that the methodology used in the Lancet study had passed The Lancet's peer review process and was similar to that used in other cases, but questioned the data that the survey had produced and hence the findings of the study.

175. Dr John Reid, the Health Secretary, sent an assessment of the Lancet study to Mr Straw on 29 November.[116] The assessment, which Dr Reid said he had personally commissioned, had been produced by Dr Bill Kirkup, one of the Department of Health's Regional Directors of Public Health and its lead on health in Iraq.

176. Dr Kirkup's assessment was more detailed and more critical of the Lancet study than the assessments undertaken earlier by Professor Anderson and Mr Butler. He stated:

> "Less than a thousand [households] … is a small number on which to base death rates … The confidence intervals are correspondingly very wide … A confidence interval this large makes the meaning of the estimate very difficult to interpret …
> "Cluster sampling may not be appropriate when there is a large element of discontinuity in the population experience. Clearly, some parts of Iraq have seen much more violence than others …"

177. Dr Kirkup stated that, according to his calculations, the study's conclusion that "violence accounted for most of the excess deaths" was only true if the "bizarre" Fallujah cluster was included (the study stated that that cluster was not included in its central estimate of 98,000 excess deaths). Dr Kirkup calculated that if the Fallujah cluster was not included, just over 23,000 of the 98,000 estimated excess deaths were due to violence.

178. Dr Kirkup stated that it was not possible, from the data provided in the study, to confirm the study's conclusion that "air strikes from coalition forces accounted for most violent deaths".

179. Dr Kirkup explained his characterisation of the Fallujah projection as "bizarre". The study estimated that there had been 200,000 excess deaths in Fallujah (using the same techniques as for other areas). That would represent a loss of nearly 28 percent of the population of Fallujah in just 14 months. Dr Kirkup commented: "Something has plainly gone so badly wrong with the estimates in Fallujah that it must cast doubt on the validity of the rest of the findings."

180. Dr Kirkup concluded:

> "… the paper suffers from wide confidence intervals, dubious methodology, the likelihood of significant respondent bias and results that are disastrously skewed by the Fallujah outlier. The authors have been tempted into extrapolations based on shaky data that lack face validity, and in two cases are not even borne out by their own results."

Indirect effects of conflict on public health

The health charity Medact considered the direct and indirect effects of the conflict in Iraq in its November 2003 report Continuing collateral damage: the health and environmental costs of war on Iraq 2003.[117] That report outlined the indirect effects on health arising from:

- damage to the environment, including through the use of depleted uranium ammunition;
- damage to Iraq's water and sanitation and power infrastructure;
- the continuing risk of malnutrition and food insecurity;
- damage to housing; and
- damage to health services.

The report stated that 7 percent of hospitals had been damaged during the major combat phase of operations, and 12 percent had been looted. UNICEF had reported that the conflict had led to the breakdown of the cold chain system for storing vaccines, which meant that some 210,000 newborns had had no immunisations and were at risk from preventable diseases such as measles.

The report also outlined the physiological and social impacts of the war, and suggested that Iraq would experience a rise in behavioural and emotional disorders.

Although the report did not attempt to quantify those indirect effects, many of which would only become apparent over the long term, it concluded that they could prove to be more significant than the direct effects.

The report made a number of recommendations, including:

- Establish health information systems to monitor disease incidence and examine disease patterns in order to plan effective public health interventions.
- Carry out an assessment of the country's chemical risks and levels of contamination in addition to surveillance of health effects of environmental risk factors including depleted uranium.
- Fund and rapidly implement the clear-up of all unexploded ordnance.
- Study long-term effects of the war on mental health and trends in domestic and criminal violence, and develop effective health care and social policy interventions.
- Fund independent academic institutions or UN agencies to continue monitoring the health effects of war."

181. Discussions continued between senior officials in the FCO and MOD over who should have responsibility for answering questions on civilian casualties.

182. The "Count the Casualties" campaign was launched by Medact and IBC on 8 December, through an open letter to Mr Blair.[118] The letter stated that without counting the dead and injured, it was not possible to know whether the UK was meeting its obligations under international humanitarian law to protect the civilian population in Iraq. It urged the Government to commission a comprehensive, independent inquiry to determine how many Iraqi citizens had died or been injured since March 2003, and the cause of those casualties.

183. The campaign also argued that information on casualties was needed to plan healthcare in Iraq.[119]

184. At Prime Minister's Questions on the same day, Mr Blair said that he did not agree that the UK needed to hold a full, independent inquiry into civilian casualties to comply with its international legal obligations, and stated that the figures from the Iraqi MOH were the most accurate available.[120] He continued:

> "… those who are killing innocent people in Iraq today … are the terrorists and insurgents … Any action that the multinational force or the Iraqi Army is taking in Iraq is intended to defeat those people …"

185. The IPU provided the Cabinet Office with a contribution to the Cabinet Office trial on 13 December.[121] The IPU analysis captured casualty figures for the five weeks from 1 November, sourced from the Iraqi MOH, the BBC, IBC, the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count project and Sky News. The casualty figures were broken down into two categories: killed by insurgents; and killed by coalition forces.

186. The total casualty figures produced by the Iraqi MOH were the highest among the five sources in four of the five weeks.

187. The figures produced by the Iraqi MOH showed that casualties caused by the coalition were higher than casualties caused by insurgents in four of the five weeks. Figures from all other sources showed that casualties caused by insurgents were higher than casualties caused by the coalition in all five weeks.

188. The IPU commented that, apart from the Iraqi MOH, the sources were "of no real value". The comparison of the figures did suggest, however, that the Iraqi MOH figures were incomplete. This could be due to delayed reporting of deaths at hospitals or bodies not being taken to hospitals. The Iraqi MOH had reported that its figures did not include the Kurdish provinces.

189. The IPU also commented that the analysis would not answer the demands from MPs and others that the UK should produce its own estimate of Iraqi civilian casualties. The only way a proper comparative analysis of the Iraqi MOH figures could be made was to set them alongside figures produced by the US and UK military.

190. The Inquiry has seen no indications that the Cabinet Office trial was taken further.

191. A detailed brief on civilian casualties produced for Mr Blair on 18 December in advance of his visit to Iraq made no mention of the trial or its conclusions.[122]

192. An IPU official informed Mr Straw's Private Office on 15 December that the MOD was now ready to "step forward and explain why it is impossible for us to use our military assets in Iraq to get an estimate [of civilian casualties]".[123] The official commented that this was welcome. It would force the MOD to take some responsibility for managing one of the "bear-traps" in the UK's existing policy:

> "… although we say there are no reliable estimates of civilian casualties in Iraq, there are estimates of a kind that are made by MND(SE) and others made by the Pentagon. They're unreliable but are used for military planning purposes as evidence of trends …"

193. Mr Ingram made that statement on 27 January 2005, in response to a question from Mr Peter Kilfoyle.[124] Mr Ingram stated that an analysis of incident reports between 1 May 2003 and 26 November 2004 indicated that 200 Iraqi citizens believed to have been enemy combatants had died, and 80 had been injured, in incidents where military force had been deliberately applied by UK forces. Five Iraqi citizens believed not to have been enemy combatants had died, and a further 13 had been injured, in incidents during the course of which military force had been deliberately applied by UK forces. These figures did not necessarily indicate that UK forces caused the casualties, only that they recorded them during the course of incidents in which deliberate military force was applied.

194. Mr Ingram also stated that 17 Iraqi citizens believed to have been enemy combatants had died, and 22 had been injured, during the course of other incidents, and 144 Iraqi citizens believed not to have been enemy combatants had died, and 192 had been injured, during the course of other incidents. This included the full range of incidents in which UK forces had been involved but where no deliberate military force had been applied, for example Improvised Explosive Device attacks by insurgent forces on civilian targets, road traffic accidents and in one case the discovery in May 2003 of a mass grave, thought to date back to 1991, containing 32 bodies.

195. Mr Ingram stated that those figures should not be taken as an accurate estimate of Iraqi casualties; they captured only those casualties which were witnessed or discovered by UK forces. The figures did not include the major combat operations phase of Op TELIC, prior to 1 May 2003, for which incident reports were not routinely submitted when casualties were "discovered".

196. Ms Short (who had resigned as International Development Secretary in May 2003) wrote to Mr Straw on 13 January 2005 to express her support for the Count the Casualties campaign.[125]

197. Mr Straw replied on 3 March:

> "We have never made our own assessment of Iraqi casualties … This is because, after careful consideration of the different means of calculating casualties, we decided that the current circumstances would prevent a valid assessment by the UK …"[126]

198. Mr Straw advised that the MOD had now published overall casualty figures drawn from military incident reports. The UK military aimed to minimise civilian casualties by using careful targeting procedures. Target clearance procedures considered targets on an individual basis; the MOD did not believe that an estimate of casualties in Iraq as a whole would help them to evaluate those targeting procedures.

199. Mr Asquith discussed civilian casualties with Dr Kirkup on 21 March.[127] Dr Kirkup "rebutted" the suggestion that an accurate assessment of casualties would be "an essential element of assessing and improving the current health situation in Iraq". He confirmed that the Iraqi MOH's figures provided "the most reliable assessment [of casualties] currently available".

200. Dr Kirkup identified four sources of information on casualties:

- the Iraqi MOH's systems for recording deaths, which had been reasonably sound before the conflict but had "taken a serious hit" and were only now recovering;
- civil registration (death certificates): there was no reliable civil registration system;
- surveys: the security situation was not conducive to effective research, in particular by limiting the scope to obtain the necessary range of data and by introducing interviewee bias; and
- figures from the military: "[those] would help to provide a more complete picture of the causes of death and whether deaths had actually occurred. When dealing with incomplete data it is important to have as many sources as possible."

201. Mr Asquith and Dr Kirkup also considered possible areas of assistance to the Iraqi health service, including data collection and analysis.

202. The record of the meeting concluded: "Our position on assessing Iraqi casualty figures reinforced."

203. IBC published A Dossier of Civilian Casualties 2003 – 2005 in July 2005.[128] The dossier stated that 24,865 civilians had been reported killed in the two years from 20 March 2003 to 19 March 2005, almost all of them as a direct result of violence.

204. Of the 13,811 fatalities for which IBC had age and gender information, 11,281 (81.7 percent) had been male (including the elderly) and 1,198 (8.7 percent) had been female (including the elderly). A total of 1,281 (9.3 percent) had been children and 51 (0.4 percent) babies.

205. The dossier also provided a breakdown of who had killed those civilians. That breakdown is reproduced in the table below.

Table 1: Civilian fatalities by category

	Killers by category	Number killed	Percentage of total
1	US-led forces alone	9,270	37.3
2	Anti-occupation forces alone	2,353	9.5
3	Both US-led and anti-occupation forces involved	623	2.5
4	Iraqi MOH-defined “military actions”	635	2.5
5	Iraqi MOH-defined “terrorist attacks”	318	1.3
6	Predominantly criminal killings	8,935	35.9
7	Unknown agents	2,731	11.0
	Total deaths	24,865	100.0

206. The “unknown agents” category included attacks which apparently targeted only civilians and lacked any identifiable military objective – for instance suicide bombs in markets and mosques, or attacks apparently motivated by personal or inter-group vendettas. The category also included 334 individual killings where media reports provided no clear information about the killer. This category was likely to overlap with others.

207. The dossier reported that 98.5 percent of deaths caused by US-led forces were attributable to the US and 1.5 percent of deaths were attributable to other coalition forces including the UK.

208. The dossier also stated that in incidents for which both death and injury information was available, it had recorded 42,500 injuries (of all kinds) against 13,424 deaths, a ratio of over 3 to 1.

[128] Iraq Body Count, July 2005, A Dossier of Civilian Casualties 2003 – 2005.

209. IBC stated in the introduction to the dossier that:

> "Assurances that military forces 'make every effort to avoid civilian casualties' are no substitute for real data-gathering and analysis, and can have no basis without it. On the eve of the invasion Tony Blair stated that '[Saddam Hussein] will be responsible for many, many more deaths even in one year than we will be in any conflict'. Only data such as presented here will allow a realistic evaluation of such predictions."

210. The US Government was required under the Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act 2005 to provide quarterly reports to Congress on political, economic and security progress in Iraq.[129]

211. The second quarterly report, in October 2005, included a graph showing the average daily number of coalition and Iraqi casualties caused by insurgents since 1 January 2004.[130] The report did not provide the data used to produce that graph.

212. On the basis of that graph, The New York Times estimated that over 25,000 Iraqi civilians and members of the Iraqi Security Forces had been killed and wounded by insurgents since 1 January 2004.[131] The New York Times stated that that was fewer than reported by the Iraqi MOH and IBC.

213. A Pentagon spokesperson stated that the figures were compiled from reports filed by coalition military units after they responded to attacks. Those reports did not provide a comprehensive account of Iraqi casualties, but did provide information on trends in casualties resulting from insurgent attacks.

214. The New York Times reported that the graph had been included in the quarterly report as a result of specific questions posed by Congressional staff, and commented that its disclosure was significant as it showed that the US military was tracking Iraqi casualties, having "previously avoided virtually all public discussion of the issue".

215. In subsequent quarterly reports to Congress, the Pentagon updated that graph and added a breakdown of casualties by province.[132]

216. In June 2006, the UK Government signed the Geneva Declaration on Armed Violence and Development.[133] Signatories resolved to take action to reduce armed violence and its negative impact on socio-economic and human development, including by supporting initiatives "to measure the human, social and economic costs of armed violence, to assess risks and vulnerabilities, to evaluate the effectiveness of armed violence reduction programmes, and to disseminate knowledge of best practices".

217. The UK became one of 15 members of the "Core Group" charged with steering the Geneva Declaration process and guiding its implementation.[134]

218. The Lancet published the second Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health cluster sample survey of excess mortality in Iraq (direct and indirect, violent and non-violent deaths) on 12 October 2006.[135] The first Johns Hopkins study had been published by The Lancet in October 2004.

219. The second study used the same (cluster sample survey) methodology as the first study, but was based on a larger sample (1,849 households as against 988 in the first study).

220. The study estimated that between March 2003 and June 2006, there had been 654,965 excess Iraqi deaths and 601,027 excess violent Iraqi deaths as a consequence of the war. The study attributed 31 percent of violent excess deaths to the coalition, 24 percent to "other" and 45 percent to "unknown". The study also concluded that levels of violence were increasing.

Criticisms of the Lancet studies

The 2004 and 2006 Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health studies published by The Lancet have been subject to several criticisms. The most significant are:

- That the baseline pre-invasion mortality rate used by the studies was lower than the actual pre-invasion mortality rate, leading to an over-estimation of excess mortality in the post-invasion period. The second study used a pre-invasion mortality rate of 5.5 deaths per thousand people.[136] The 2008 Iraq Family Health Survey (IFHS) used a figure of nine deaths per thousand.[137]
- That the sample sizes were too small. The 2004 Lancet study (central estimate 98,000 excess deaths) surveyed 988 households and the 2006 Lancet study (central estimate 655,000 excess deaths) surveyed 1,849 households. The 2008 IFHS (central estimate 151,000 excess violent deaths) surveyed 9,345 households. The IFHS team highlighted the implications of that difference in scale: "The estimated number of deaths in the IFHS is about three times as high as that reported by the Iraq Body Count. Both sources indicate that the 2006 study by Burnham et al [the second Lancet study] considerably overestimated the number of violent deaths. For instance, to reach the 925 violent deaths per day reported by Burnham et al for June 2005 through June 2006, as many as 87 percent of violent deaths would have been missed in the IFHS and more than 90 percent in the Iraq Body Count. This level of underreporting is highly improbable, given the internal and external consistency of the data and the much larger same size and quality-control measures taken in the implementation of the IFHS."

221. An Iraqi Government spokesperson commented on 12 October that "these figures [in the study] are unrealistic and give a very exaggerated picture".[138]

222. A DFID Statistics Adviser provided advice on the study to IPU on 12 October, at their request.[139] He concluded that "in essence, the method is tried and tested".

223. Professor Anderson provided his views on the study the following day.[140] He stated that he had received comments on the study from an independent expert on statistical epidemiology and demography. Professor Anderson advised:

> "… the study design is robust and employs methods that are regarded as close to 'best practice' in this area, given the difficulties of data collection and verification in the present circumstances in Iraq … The methods are an improvement on those used in the 2004 Lancet article by the same author …"

224. Professor Anderson advised that deaths were much more prevalent among adolescent to middle-aged men and suggested that bias might remain with respect to the level of non-combatant mortality.

225. Professor Anderson concluded that, given the reasonably robust study design and appropriate analysis methods, the UK Government should be cautious in publicly criticising the Lancet study.

226. An IPU official produced a brief on the study for Mr Blair later on 13 October.[141] The brief summarised the advice from the DFID Statistics Adviser and Professor Anderson, and identified several "key points":

- … People are dying at the hands of those who choose violence to pursue their aims …
- There are conflicting estimates [of the number of civilian casualties] from a number of sources, and no comprehensive or accurate figures;
- The numbers that the Lancet has extrapolated are a substantial leap from other figures. There is no reason to assume the Lancet figure is any more accurate than any other is."

227. The same IPU official wrote to colleagues on 16 October:

> "… we do not (not) accept that the figures quoted in the Lancet survey are accurate … The figures are extraordinarily high and significantly larger than the figures quoted by the Iraq Body Count or Iraqi Government – however the survey methodology used here cannot be rubbished, it is a tried and tested way of measuring mortality in conflict zones. The overriding message is that there are no accurate or reliable figures of deaths in Iraq."[142]

228. On 18 October, in response to a Parliamentary Question from Sir Menzies Campbell, Mr Blair stated:

"It is correct that innocent civilians are dying in Iraq. But they are not being killed by British soldiers. They are being killed by terrorists and those from outside who are supporting them …"[143]

229. Researchers at Oxford University (Mr Sean Gourley and Professor Neil Johnson) and Royal Holloway, University of London (Professor Spagat) issued a press release on 19 October, claiming that there were "serious flaws" in the methodology used by the Lancet study which acted to inflate its casualty estimate.[144]

230. In response to a question from Mr Jeremy Corbyn on 6 November, Mr Ingram set out the Government's position on the Lancet study:

"Maintaining records of civilian deaths in Iraq is ultimately a matter for the Government of Iraq and we believe they are best placed to monitor the situation. The Lancet report is one of a number of recent studies … none of which can be regarded as definitive. The figures in the Lancet report are significantly higher than other casualty estimates."[145]

231. Professor Anderson revisited the Lancet study in March 2007, following Mr Straw's request for further advice on the study in the light of the public exchanges since its publication.[146] Professor Anderson wrote to Mr Straw on 19 March, stating that while there was "clearly a possibility of [sampling] bias":

"I reiterate my earlier advice, which acknowledged that bias and moderate confidence bounds remain in the study, and that at this stage I see no value in either criticising the study or engaging in the public debate."

232. Later that month, following the release of papers relating to the Lancet study under the Freedom of Information Act, the Government was asked how it could accept the Lancet study's methodology but reject its findings.[147] A Government spokesperson responded:

"The [Lancet study] methodology has been used in other conflict situations, notably the Democratic Republic of Congo. However, the Lancet figures are much higher than statistics from other sources, which only goes to show how estimates can vary enormously according to the method of collection. There is considerable debate amongst the scientific community over the accuracy of the figures."

233. General David Petraeus, Commanding General MNF-I, presented Congress with his assessment of the US troop surge on 10 September 2007.[148] He highlighted the "considerable data collection and analysis … using a methodology that has been in place for well over a year and that has benefitted over the past seven months from the increased presence of our forces living among the Iraqi people" which underpinned his assessment, and offered Congress statistics on the number of violent civilian deaths and "ethno-sectarian" deaths.

234. Colonel Steven Boylan, Gen Petraeus' spokesman, provided details of that methodology to The Washington Post later that month.[149] Col Boylan reported that the statistics quoted by Gen Petraeus drew on data which combined "unverified" Iraqi reports and coalition Significant Activities reports (SIGACTS).

235. A 2008 RAND report, sponsored by the Office of the US Secretary of Defense, considered the argument for documenting civilian casualties.[150] The report stated:

"Because protecting the population is one of the central tenets of US COIN [counter-insurgency] doctrine, it can be surmised that trends related to Iraqi civilian fatalities should be a chief concern for the U.S. military."

236. RAND reviewed a number of studies of civilian casualties, including the two Lancet studies, the 2008 Iraq Family Health Survey (IFHS) Study Group and IBC. RAND went on to present its own dataset, which combined the RAND Terrorism Knowledge Base with the IBC dataset. RAND drew a number of observations and conclusions from the consolidated dataset, including that:

- The US military had devoted considerable effort to defeating Improvised Explosive Device (IEDs), yet IEDs accounted for only 5 percent of civilian fatalities in 2006. Firearms accounted for 58 percent of civilian deaths in 2006. RAND concluded that while measures to defeat IEDs might save coalition lives, they might not be useful for reducing civilian fatalities; the coalition and the Iraqi Government needed to implement measures to counter the types of attacks that were claiming civilian lives.
- The insurgency was specifically targeting the Iraqi Government and the Iraqi economy. Over 30 percent of insurgent attacks were aimed at these two aspects of the Iraqi polity.

- Most violence was directed at "for lack of a better word, the common Iraqi civilian". For over 50 percent of the individuals killed in 2006 there was "… no identifying data, no apparent or recorded reason, and no discernible affiliation or target. All we know of these people is that they were killed; this fact alone suggests that our capacity to understand, analyze, and effectively respond to the bloodshed is limited by a lack of information."

237. In April 2009, researchers from King's College London, Royal Holloway, University of London and IBC used IBC's record of Iraqi non-combatant civilian deaths to analyse the nature and effects of various weapons.

238. The researchers concluded that in events with at least one Iraqi non-combatant civilian casualty, the methods that killed the most non-combatant civilians per event were aerial bombing (17 per event), combined use of aerial and ground weapons (17 per event) and suicide bombers on foot (16 per event). Aerial bombs killed on average nine more non-combatant civilians per event (17) than aerial missiles (8). The team commented:

> "It seems clear from these findings that to protect civilians from indiscriminate harm, as required by international humanitarian law … military and civilian policies should prohibit aerial bombing in civilian areas unless it can be demonstrated – by monitoring of civilian casualties for example – that civilians are being protected."

The WikiLeaks Iraq War Logs

On 22 October 2010, WikiLeaks released 391,832 US Army Field Reports, covering the period from 1 January 2004 to 31 December 2009 (except for the months of May 2004 and March 2009).[151] WikiLeaks stated that the Field Reports detailed 109,032 deaths in Iraq over that period, comprising:

- 66,081 "civilian" deaths;
- 23,984 "enemy" deaths ("those labelled as insurgents");
- 15,196 "host nation" deaths (Iraqi Government forces); and
- 3,771 "friendly" deaths (coalition forces).

IBC reported that, based on an "early analysis", the Field Reports contained 15,000 previously unreported civilian deaths.[152] Once a full analysis was complete, casualty data would be integrated into IBC's record.

IBC stated that the majority of the previously unreported deaths came from small incidents comprising one to three deaths. That was not unexpected, as larger incidents attracted more media coverage than smaller incidents.

Witness comment

239. The Inquiry asked Mr Ingram, Minister for the Armed Forces from June 2001 to June 2007, why the UK Government had been unable to produce an estimate of civilian casualties when other organisations including NGOs and academic organisations had done so, in particular given the public interest on the issue.[153]

240. Mr Ingram told the Inquiry:

> "The idea that somehow or other an NGO is the fount of all wisdom and knowledge and accuracy I don't think stands up.
>
> "So if we were going to take the figures from external sources, then we would have had to put effort and verification into that. Should we have done so? Perhaps, yes, and I'm not so sure it wasn't being done …"

241. Mr Ingram added that establishing the number of civilian casualties would not have changed the reality on the ground:

> "… the concept of ground truth is absolutely vital in this and, by establishing that fact, wouldn't have altered where we were. Because we couldn't, in one sense, easily have stopped the civilian casualties because it wasn't being carried out by us on the civilians, it was being carried out by the tribal wars, the family feuds, by the Sunni/Shia factionalism that was taking place, by the Shia on Shia factionalism that was taking place, but we … were being vilified, attacked and criticised that we had precipitated all of this.
> "I have to say I believe that to be a false logic, because that may have happened at any time under Saddam Hussein and, therefore, the establishment of the facts perhaps should have been carried out by – elsewhere in Government. I don't really think it was an MOD function in that sense."

242. The Inquiry asked Mr Ingram whether the Government would not have been better placed than external organisations to develop credible estimates of civilian casualties, and asked which department within government should have been responsible for producing such estimates. Mr Ingram told the Inquiry:

> "You [the responsible department] have then to go to the hospitals. You then have to put civilians or a military person at that hospital counting the bodies in and the bodies out. So you need force protection to do that. You put people at risk to do that. Is that what people wanted, soldiers or civilians being killed at hospitals? Because they would have been at risk.
> "… the UN may have been the mechanism by which we'd establish true facts, but they were withdrawn.

---

[153] Public hearing, 16 July 2010, pages 30-34.

"So there were points at which, yes, it would have been desirable, but how do you achieve that objective? Do you put other lives at risk to do that? I would say no."

243. The Inquiry asked if it was the MOD's function to develop estimates of civilian casualties, or that of another department. Mr Ingram told the Inquiry:

"Unquestionably. Is it something that DFID could have funded? Is it something the FCO should have taken ownership care of? The UN had become engaged – it was still engaged, but not in terms of presence on the ground – is it a role that they should have played? Yes. Of course the answer to that is yes.

"But what – the very establishment of the facts would not have changed what was happening. It would have confirmed what everyone knew, but it wouldn't have led to a solution …"

Records and estimates of the number of Iraqi fatalities

Approaches to determining fatalities due to conflict

There are two broad approaches to determining the number of fatalities attributable to a conflict:

- Incident, or passive, reporting. This approach, which aims to capture direct conflict deaths, typically involves the collation of reports from the media, other non-government and government sources. Its accuracy depends in part on the accuracy and completeness of those reports. Access to conflict-affected areas (or to particular communities) may be difficult, and there may be pressure to distort information. Incident reporting frequently undercounts the number of direct conflict deaths.
- Estimates derived from a survey of part of a population. This approach typically aims to estimate the number of excess deaths caused by conflict, by extrapolating from the data produced by a survey. Those excess deaths would include both direct deaths (caused by war-related injuries) and indirect deaths (caused by the worsening of social, economic and health conditions in a conflict-affected area). The accuracy of such estimates can be undermined by a lack of detailed, baseline mortality data (and conflicts often occur in areas without such information, or lead to the disintegration of the systems which provide it), the selection of an unrepresentative sample, the methodology used, and the conduct of the survey.

244. The IBC project, founded in 2003 by UK and US volunteers, aims to record the violent civilian deaths resulting from the 2003 military intervention in Iraq.[154] It draws its evidence from cross-checked media reports of violent events or of bodies being found, supplemented by the review and integration of hospital, morgue, NGO and official figures. Further details of the methodology and inclusion criteria used by IBC are available on its website.

245. IBC has publicly stated that while its database cannot provide a complete record of violent civilian deaths, it does provide an "irrefutable baseline of certain and undeniable deaths based on the solidity of our sources and the conservativeness of our methodology".[155]

246. IBC continually updates its figures as new information becomes available. As at April 2016, IBC had recorded between 156,531and 175,101 violent civilian deaths since January 2003.[156]

247. As apparent from the material addressed earlier in this Section, estimates of the number of fatalities caused by conflict in Iraq after 2003 vary substantially.

248. In October 2004, The Lancet published a study by the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health entitled Mortality before and after the 2003 invasion of Iraq: cluster sample survey.[157] The study was based on a survey of 988 households in 33 clusters. It estimated that there had been 98,000 more deaths from all causes in Iraq than expected in the 18 months since the invasion (95 percent confidence interval 8,000–94,000). That estimate did not include data from one cluster in Fallujah.

249. In October 2006, The Lancet published a second study by the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health.[158] The study used the same (cluster sample survey) methodology as the first study but was based on a larger sample.

250. The study estimated that between March 2003 and June 2006, there had been 654,965 excess Iraqi deaths and 601,027 excess violent Iraqi deaths as a consequence of the conflict.

251. The IFHS was undertaken in 2006 and 2007 by the Iraqi Government in collaboration with the World Health Organization (WHO); the results were published in The New England Journal of Medicine in January 2008.[159] The IFHS collected data from 9,345 households across Iraq on a number of issues, including mortality.

252. The IFHS Study Group estimated that, between March 2003 and June 2006 (the period covered by the second Lancet study), there were 151,000 violent deaths in Iraq.

253. In a September 2008 report, the Geneva Declaration on Armed Violence and Development pooled a number of datasets, including IBC, to provide a consolidated estimate of violent (direct) deaths in Iraq.[160] It estimated that, between 2003 and 2007, at least 87,000 direct conflict deaths had occurred.

254. The report also considered indirect deaths, and commented on the difference between the figures reported by the two Lancet studies and the IFHS:

> "At first glance, such a wide range seems to imply that the exact number of deaths due to violence remains unknown. But the quality and reliability of these surveys is not equal. The most recent study (2008) [the IFHS] surveyed 9,345 households, and was conducted under the auspices of the World Health Organization. The previous two studies [the Lancet studies], both conducted under difficult circumstances and with limited resources, surveyed 990 (2004) and 1,849 (2006) households. The gain in precision with greater numbers of households surveyed in the 2008 study is obvious …"

255. The report estimated that there had been more than 150,000 indirect deaths in Iraq between March 2003 and March 2008 (with a wide possible range between 80,000 and 234,000).

256. A further analysis was undertaken in 2013 by a team of American, Canadian and Iraqi researchers, based on a sample of 2,000 households.[161] Unlike earlier studies, this was undertaken when the situation on the ground was relatively calm. The study concluded that there had been 461,000 excess deaths from 2003 to 2011. Most excess deaths were due to direct violence but about a third resulted from indirect causes, such as the failures of health, sanitation, transportation, communication and other systems.

257. About a third of the deaths due to direct violence were attributed to coalition forces (some 90,000), and a third to militias. The study reported that at the peak of the conflict men faced a 2.9 percent higher risk of death than they did before the war and women a 0.7 percent higher risk of death.

258. The majority (63 percent) of violent deaths were the result of gunshot with 12 percent attributed to car bombs.

Non-Iraqi civilian fatalities

259. The Inquiry is not aware of any comprehensive list of non-Iraqi civilian casualties, or of UK civilian casualties in Iraq. The UK Government did not maintain a record of deaths and injuries to UK civilians in Iraq.

260. The Brookings Iraq Index, drawing on a partial list of contractors killed in Iraq maintained by the Iraq Coalition Casualty Count (ICCC), reported that by October 2009

(the end of the period covered by this Inquiry) 523 non-Iraqi civilians had been killed in Iraq.[162] The Index did not offer any breakdown of that total.

261. The ICCC reported 464 contractors killed in Iraq by October 2009, of whom it identified 45 as British.[163] Of those, the ICCC identified 37 as security contractors or security guards.

262. The US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction (SIGIR) reported in July 2012 that 321 US civilians had died during Operation Iraqi Freedom from 1 May 2003 (the end of major combat operations) to 31 August 2010.[164]

263. The Committee to Protect Journalists recorded that 191 Iraqi and international journalists and other media workers were killed in Iraq between 19 March 2003 and October 2009 (the end of the period covered by this Inquiry).[165]

Conclusions

264. In a series of Assessments in the second half of 2002, the Joint Intelligence Committee identified the possibility of significant civilian casualties in the event of a Coalition attack on Iraq, in particular as a result of Iraqi use of chemical and biological weapons, the implementation of a scorched earth policy, and disorder after the end of major combat operations.

265. The MOD made only a broad estimate of direct civilian casualties arising from an attack on Iraq, based on previous operations.

266. In the months before the invasion, Mr Blair emphasised the need to minimise the number of civilian casualties arising from an invasion of Iraq. He repeatedly asked the MOD for details on the accuracy of the weapons that the UK would use, the targeting policy and guidelines, and the estimated number of civilian casualties.

267. Sections 6.1 and 6.2 consider the MOD's responses, which offered reassurance based on the tight targeting procedures governing the air campaign. Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, Chief of the Defence Staff, advised Mr Blair on 25 February 2003 that civilian casualties were likely to be in the "low hundreds".[166]

268. In his public statements before the invasion, Mr Blair suggested that the number of civilians who would be killed in any conflict should be set in the context of the number of civilians who had been killed by Saddam Hussein's regime or were dying as a result of its policies. On the eve of the invasion, Mr Blair stated that Saddam Hussein "will be responsible for many, many more deaths even in one year than we will be in any conflict".[167]

269. In November 2003, in response to media and NGO reporting on the high levels of civilian casualties, the Government began to consider whether and how it should respond to demands for information on the number of civilians killed in Iraq, including the number killed by UK forces.

270. That consideration was driven by the Government's concern to sustain domestic support for operations in Iraq. Mr Straw and Mr Hoon agreed in November 2003 that the Government needed to produce accurate casualty figures to rebut claims that Coalition Forces were killing large numbers of civilians; in October 2004, Mr Blair stated that the Government needed an estimate of civilian casualties which showed the extent of insurgent responsibility.

271. With hindsight, greater efforts should have been made in the post-conflict period to determine the number of civilian casualties and the broader effects of military operations on civilians. A trial monitoring exercise initiated by No.10 in November 2004 was not completed. Much more Ministerial and senior official time was devoted to the question of which department should have responsibility for the issue of civilian casualties than to efforts to determine the actual number.

272. The Government was aware of several reports and studies (the Iraqi Ministry of Health in October 2004, the Lancet studies in October 2004 and October 2006, and the Iraq Body Count dossier in July 2005) which suggested that coalition forces were responsible for more civilian deaths than were the insurgents.

273. Those reports did not trigger any work within the Government either to determine the number of civilian casualties or to reassess its military or civilian effort. An FCO official commented that the Iraqi Ministry of Health's figures "will not help make the case that more civilians have been killed by terrorists than by military action".[168]

274. The Inquiry has considered the question of whether a Government should, in the future, do more to maintain a fuller understanding of the human cost of any conflict in which it is engaged.

275. All military operations carry a risk of civilian casualties. The parties to a conflict have an obligation under International Humanitarian Law to limit its effects on civilians.

276. In Iraq, the UK Government recognised that obligation in its Rules of Engagement, Targeting Directive and guidance on Battle Damage Assessment. The Government did not consider that it had a legal obligation to count civilian casualties.

[167] House of Commons, Official Report, 19 March 2003, column 934.
[168] Minute FCO [junior official] to Owen, 13 October 2004, 'Iraq: Civilian Casualty Figures'.

277. The Inquiry considers that a Government has a responsibility to make every reasonable effort to identify and understand the likely and actual effects of its military actions on civilians.

278. That will include not only direct civilian casualties, but also the indirect costs on civilians arising from worsening social, economic and health conditions. (Section 10.4 considers the scale of the reconstruction challenge in Iraq after the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime and the Government's contribution to meeting that challenge).

279. It may not be possible, before committing to a course of action, to produce even broad estimates of the number of civilians that would be directly and indirectly affected by it, or to identify all the effects on civilians.

280. The Government should be ready to work with others, in particular NGOs and academic institutions, to develop such assessments and estimates over time.

281. The Government should take account of those assessments and estimates in developing its strategy and plans as well as in its military tactics and use of ordnance, in order to minimise, to the extent possible, the effects on civilians. The Inquiry considers that RAND's conclusion in relation to US military operations should apply equally to the UK:

> "Because protecting the population is one of the central tenets of US COIN [counter-insurgency] doctrine … Iraqi civilian fatalities should be a chief concern for the US military."[169]

282. As well as serving to minimise the effect of military action on civilians, such assessments and estimates will also enable the Government to address criticisms of the human cost of military operations.

Introduction

1. This Section addresses:

- the roles and responsibilities of key individuals and bodies; and
- the machinery established in order to make decisions pre-conflict, and post-conflict.

2. This Section does not address:

- the Inquiry's conclusions in relation to the decision to join the US-led invasion of Iraq, which can be read in Section 7.

Roles and responsibilities

Cabinet

3. Under UK constitutional conventions – in which the Prime Minister leads the Government but is not personally vested with the powers of a Head of State – Cabinet is the main mechanism by which senior members of the Government take collective responsibility for decisions that are of critical importance to the public. The decision to deploy UK Armed Forces to Iraq clearly falls into that category.

4. Cabinet is formally a Committee of the Privy Council, chaired by the Prime Minister.

5. In 2003, the Ministerial Code said:

> "The Cabinet is supported by Ministerial Committees (both standing and ad hoc) which have a two-fold purpose. First, they relieve the pressure on the Cabinet itself by settling as much business as possible at a lower level or, failing that, by clarifying the issues and defining the points of disagreement. Second, they support the principle of collective responsibility by ensuring that, even though an important question may never reach the Cabinet itself, the decision will be fully considered and the final judgement will be sufficiently authoritative to ensure that the Government as a whole can properly be expected to accept responsibility for it."[1]

6. The Code also said:

> "The business of the Cabinet and Ministerial Committees consists in the main of:
> a. questions which significantly engage the collective responsibility of the Government because they raise major issues or policy or because they are of critical importance to the public;
> b. questions on which there is an unresolved argument between Departments."

[1] Cabinet Office, Ministerial Code, July 2001, page 3.

7. The Prime Minister was and is responsible for the Code and for judging whether Ministerial behaviour is consistent with its standards.

8. The Ministerial Code encapsulates the role of Cabinet Committees in identifying, testing and developing policy options; analysing and mitigating risks; and debating and honing proposals until they are endorsed across government. Cabinet Committees are relied on every day to keep the process of policy-making moving.

9. Although the practice of using Cabinet Committees has been a constant feature over many decades, the number of Committees, the subjects they consider and the way in which they are used has evolved, and has varied from Prime Minister to Prime Minister.

10. Discussion in full Cabinet meetings differs from that in Cabinet Committees. Cabinet would not normally be expected to explore the detailed aspects of a policy.

11. In his Statement of Reasons for the exercise of the executive override under Section 53 of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (the 'Ministerial Veto') to prevent the disclosure of the minutes of meetings of Cabinet on 13 and 17 March 2003, Mr Jack Straw, Lord Chancellor from 2007 to 2010, set out the then Government's perspective on the functions of Cabinet.

12. Mr Straw wrote:

> "Serious and controversial decisions must be taken with free, frank – even blunt – deliberation between colleagues. Dialogue must be fearless. Ministers must have the confidence to challenge each other in private. They must ensure that decisions have been properly thought through, sounding out all the possibilities before committing themselves to a course of action. They must not feel inhibited from advancing opinions that may be unpopular or controversial. They must not be deflected from expressing dissent by the fear that they may be held personally to account for views that are later cast aside.
> "Discussions of this nature will not however take place without a private space in which thoughts can be voiced without fear of reprisal, or publicity. Cabinet provides this space. If there cannot be frank discussion of the most important matters of Government policy at Cabinet, it may not occur at all. Cabinet decision taking could increasingly be drawn into more informal channels, with attendant dangers of lack of rigour, lack of proper accountability, and lack of proper recording of decisions.
>
> "The [Information] Tribunal thought that the deployment of troops was a hugely important step in the nation's recent history and that Cabinet should be accountable for it. I also believe that to be the case, but accountability for this decision – as for any other Cabinet decision – is properly with the Government as a whole and not with individual Ministers …

> "Collective responsibility requires that Ministers should be able to express their views frankly in the expectation that they can argue freely in private while maintaining a united front when decisions have been reached …
> "If permitted to demonstrate their degree of attachment to any given policy, Ministers could absolve themselves from responsibility for decisions that they have nevertheless agreed to stand by … Thus, every Minister in the 2003 Cabinet could legitimately be held to account for the decision to use armed force in Iraq. The resignation of Ministers at the time of this particular decision recognised and reinforced that principle.
>
> "… The Government is committed to ensuring public participation in its decision making: it exposes its thinking to Parliament and public via parliamentary debate, public consultation, and engagement with the media …"

13. Mr Straw also described a "decision to commit British Service Personnel to an armed conflict" as being an "exceptionally serious" issue.

14. Many of Mr Straw's points were reiterated by Mr Dominic Grieve, the Attorney General, when maintaining the veto in 2012.

15. Mr Geoff Hoon, Defence Secretary from 1999 to 2005, told the Inquiry that he had:

> "… always seen the position of any Secretary of State as being in a sense the department's voice in the Cabinet, but equally, the Cabinet's voice in the department. So it is a two-way process …"[2]

Role of the Civil Service

THE CABINET SECRETARY

16. The Cabinet Secretary is the most senior civil servant providing policy advice to the Prime Minister.

17. There is no fixed set of functions attached to the role. Priorities and objectives for each appointee are set by the Prime Minister of the day.

18. Certain responsibilities sit by convention and long practice with the Cabinet Secretary:

- overall responsibility for security and intelligence systems and structures (in 2003, day-to-day responsibility was delegated to Sir David Omand by Sir Andrew Turnbull);

[2] Public hearing, 19 January 2010, page 178.

- responsibility for the machinery of Government (including the division of departmental responsibilities and the Cabinet Committee structure); and
- the organisation and recording of Cabinet meetings.

19. Particularly in relation to the latter two responsibilities, the Cabinet Secretary has a dual responsibility to the Prime Minister and to Cabinet collectively, and to both former and future governments.

20. In 2009, three former Cabinet Secretaries[3] told the House of Lords Select Committee on the Constitution:

> "… each of us, as Secretary of the Cabinet, has been constantly conscious of his responsibility to the Cabinet collectively and of the need to have regard to the needs and responsibilities of the other members of the Cabinet (and indeed of other Ministers) as well of those of the Prime Minister. That has coloured our relationships with Number 10 as well as those with other Ministers and their departments."[4]

21. During Sir Andrew Turnbull's tenure, the Cabinet Secretary was Head of the Home Civil Service, with leadership of the Civil Service as a whole. This role placed on the Cabinet Secretary a duty of care for the well-being of civil servants and the responsibility to be a fair employer.

22. The Cabinet Secretary has line management responsibility for departmental Permanent Secretaries across Whitehall.

23. The first edition of The Cabinet Manual, published in October 2011, ascribes the following specific responsibilities to the Cabinet Secretary:

- "The Cabinet Secretary is head of the Cabinet Secretariat."[5]
- "The Cabinet Secretary, unless unavoidably absent, attends all meetings of Cabinet and is responsible for the smooth running of Cabinet meetings and for preparing records of its discussions and decisions."[6]
- "Permanent Secretaries are responsible to the Cabinet Secretary or the Head of the Civil Service for the effective day-to-day management of the relevant department, or the particular issues for which they are responsible …"[7]

24. The Manual also describes the Cabinet Secretary's advisory role:

> "The Prime Minister decides – with the advice of the Cabinet Secretary – the overall structure of the Cabinet committee system, including … the terms of reference of each Cabinet committee."[8]

25. The Manual, according to Sir Gus O'Donnell's preface, records "the current position rather than driving change". It is quoted here on that basis.

PERMANENT SECRETARIES

26. The Permanent Secretary (referred to in some departments as the Permanent Under Secretary or PUS) is the most senior civil servant within a government department. He or she is appointed Accounting Officer (AO) for that department.

27. The Ministerial Code explained that an AO takes personal responsibility for the propriety and regularity of public finances, for keeping proper accounts, for the avoidance of waste and extravagance and for the efficient and effective use of the resources for which they are responsible.[9]

28. In addition:

> "Accounting Officers have a particular responsibility to see that appropriate advice is tendered to Ministers on all matters of financial propriety and regularity and more broadly as to all considerations of prudent and economical administration, efficiency and effectiveness and value for money."

29. The PUS of the FCO is also designated Head of the Diplomatic Service.

NO.10 CHIEF OF STAFF

30. In 1997, Mr Jonathan Powell was appointed as the first Chief of Staff in No.10. This was a new role for a political appointee.

31. Mr Powell wrote:

> "Robin [Butler, the Cabinet Secretary] told us we needed a special Order in Council to allow Alastair [Campbell] and me to tell civil servants what to do. He thought perhaps Tony would want another similar political appointee so he suggested we allow for three positions with special powers."[10]

32. That proposal became the Civil Service (Amendment) Order 1997 which exempted "up to three situations in the Prime Minister's Office which are designated by him" from the principle of selection on merit based on a fair and open competition, allowing political appointees to hold central executive roles.[11] The Order was revoked by Mr Gordon Brown when he took office in June 2007.[12]

33. Mr Powell described his role to the Inquiry as "to bring together the foreign and domestic, the political and the Civil Service, the press and the policy bits of Number 10."[13] He said:

> "It was my job to make sure that Number 10 was co-ordinated to make sure that those things [provision of support and advice to the Prime Minister and government] were happening … I followed the Prime Minister's priorities, so I would shift from subject to subject …"[14]

34. In relation to Iraq, Mr Powell said that he operated more in a "link role", ensuring that Mr Blair was kept up to date and that his decisions were communicated rapidly.[15]

35. In his book The New Machiavelli Mr Powell wrote:

> "The most important task of a chief of staff is saying 'no'. Politicians always like to say 'yes', and it is important they continue doing so if they are to remain popular. But it is not possible to see everyone who asks for a meeting, nor to attend every event… so someone needs to refuse and take the flak for doing so. Likewise, not all advice should be accepted and someone has to send it back asking for more work or even rejecting it."[16]

36. Mr Blair said of Mr Powell: "his main contributions to the office were a knowledge of the Civil Service system, an extraordinary work rate… and a politics that was completely and naturally New Labour".[17]

THE SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE CO-ORDINATOR

37. Commenting on the decision to create the post of Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator, the Butler Review reported that it had been "represented to us that this change had been particularly necessary after the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001".

38. The Butler Review commented that the effect of creating the post was:

> "… that the Cabinet Secretary is no longer so directly involved in the chain through which intelligence reaches the Prime Minister. It follows that the Cabinet Secretary, who attends the Cabinet and maintains the machinery to support their decision-making is less directly involved personally in advising the Prime Minister on security and intelligence issues … the Security and Intelligence Co-ordinator does not attend Cabinet and is not part of the Cabinet Secretariat supporting Cabinet Ministers in discharging their collective responsibilities in defence and overseas policy matters. We understand that the Intelligence and Security Committee will shortly review how this arrangement has worked."[18]

39. Asked about his dual role in relation to the Chairman of the JIC, Sir David Omand told the Inquiry that the Butler Report had commented that "as a result" of his appointment, the "Cabinet Secretary is no longer so directly involved in the chain through which intelligence reaches the Prime Minister" but that: "It wouldn't be correct to assume that any Cabinet Secretary had been in the loop in the provision of advice on assessed intelligence."[19] That had always been "a duty that had fallen on the Chairman of the JIC". Sir David told the Inquiry that a condition of appointment had been that he "would not interpose his judgement on the content of the intelligence".

40. Sir David told the Inquiry that his role in relation to the intelligence community was to "make sure it was in good health, argue for its resources and negotiate those with the Treasury, ensure that the Agencies were working together, try to generate some efficiencies and be on the look out … for new ways in which the community could be made more effective".[20]

Departmental roles

The Cabinet Office

41. The Cabinet Office contains the Cabinet Secretariats, which support the Cabinet and Cabinet Committees, and draw staff from across government.[21] In the period from 2001 to 2003, the Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec)[22] was responsible for foreign and defence policy issues, including Iraq.[23]

42. In 2001 and 2002, of about a dozen staff in OD Sec, only two covered Iraq.[24] In both cases, Iraq was one part of their job.

43. Sir David Manning became Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of OD Sec in September 2001. That marked a change from previous arrangements, in which the two roles had been held by two different individuals.

[24] Public hearing McKane, 19 January 2011, pages 2-3.

44. Lord Wilson of Dinton, Cabinet Secretary from 1998 to 2002, told the Inquiry that the appointment of Advisers and their role as Heads of the relevant Secretariats in the Cabinet Office had reflected Mr Blair's desire to have his senior people around him: "He had his own team. That is, to be honest, how he liked to work."[25] Lord Wilson said that he had been against the change.

45. The Butler Review commented that the effect of the decision to combine "two key posts at the top of the Cabinet Secretariat" (the Heads of the Overseas and Defence and of the European Secretariats), with the posts of the Prime Minister's Advisers on Foreign Affairs and on European Affairs, had been to: "weight their responsibility to the Prime Minister more heavily than their responsibility through the Cabinet Secretary to the Cabinet as a whole".[26]

46. The Butler Review acknowledged that the "view of the present post-holders is that the arrangement works well, in particular in connecting the work of the Cabinet Secretariat to that of the Prime Minister's office". It also recorded that "it was clear from the departmental policy papers it had seen that there was very close co-operation between officials in the Prime Minister's office and in the FCO in policy making on Iraq". The Review commented: "It is nonetheless a shift which acts to concentrate detailed knowledge and effective decision-making in fewer minds at the top."

47. The Butler Review concluded that the changes to the key posts at the head of the Cabinet Secretariat had:

> "… lessened the support of the machinery of government for the collective responsibility of the Cabinet in the vital matter of war and peace."[27]

48. Asked whether it would have been helpful for him to have a dual role similar to Sir David Manning's roles as both the Prime Minister's Foreign Policy Adviser and the Head of OD Sec, Sir David Omand told the Inquiry that he had "concluded on balance, the arrangement had more disadvantages than advantages".[28] He added that:

> "I think there is a helpful external perception of objectivity and support for the collective process amongst departments, if you are on the Cabinet Office side of the … door rather than in No.10.
> "I hesitate to say this, but I think it does over a period of time tend to disenfranchise the Cabinet Secretary. It is a very subtle psychodynamic effect… any Prime Minister … is going to have a trusted group of inner confidants and advisers and if … the adviser is simultaneously the Deputy to the Cabinet Secretary and Head of the Secretariat, then over a period of time it is likely that there will be an implicit assumption that the Cabinet Secretary's interests are being represented… so you don't really need to invite the Cabinet Secretary to the meeting."

49. Asked whether that had affected decision-making on Iraq, Sir David Omand responded that:

"I think the Cabinet Secretary was not as present as previous Cabinet Secretaries … would have been. Of course one of the reasons for that is that the Prime Minister had given the Cabinet Secretary a very different agenda … the new Cabinet Secretary was chosen explicitly on that basis."

50. Sir David agreed that the Cabinet Secretary could have "made a fuss" about that:

"But it would have been at the direct expense of not being able to devote the time to sorting out reform and delivery across the government's agenda." [29]

51. Describing the resource constraints in the Cabinet Office, Sir David Omand told the Inquiry that he had "inherited an overspend where there wasn't enough money to pay for all" the units in Downing Street and the Cabinet Office, which were "funded from the same vote".[30] The Treasury had kept them, he expected "deliberately", on a "very tight leash in order to restrain the growth of Downing Street". Sir David had found it "quite hard" to staff the Cabinet Office at the level he would have wanted and it had been necessary to prioritise.

52. In relation to Iraq, Sir David said:

"We did find money for OD Secretariat to expand… at the time of Iraq. We did find money to enable the Joint Intelligence Committee's assessment staff to work at full tilt as the crisis – the run up to the campaign – developed.

"But it was a bit of a struggle and not necessarily ideal. It was also the case that the Overseas and Defence Secretariat, who were hard pressed on Iraq, were also valiantly providing me the sole support I had to work on a counter-terrorism strategy. I have nothing but praise for them. They did a fantastic job, but it was a stretch."

53. Sir David added:

"In a sense, one of the lessons … is that you can't enter into a run-up to a major conflict and continue with business as usual. There was a certain sense that the government was trying to do everything as well as manage this very major military operation – I don't think that's possible.

> "… during the Falklands [Conflict in 1982] … although it was a much shorter affair … for that period that dominated the work of that group of Ministers. They delegated everything else. That didn't happen… on Iraq."

54. Sir David Manning recognised that the teams working on Iraq were small and heavily loaded, and that fatigue was a factor, but told the Inquiry:

> "I did not feel that, at official level, we were unable to manage the decision making processes or to relay the wishes of Ministers to the system or to reflect [the] system's concerns to Ministers themselves."[31]

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office

55. In December 2003, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) presented a "Strategy for the FCO" to Parliament, in which it listed the department's "key contributions" to government.[32] They included:

- "co-ordination and leadership of the UK's international policies";
- "expert foreign policy advice for Ministers and the Prime Minister, feeding into the wider policy process"; and
- "rapid gathering, analysis and targeting of information for the Government and others".

56. In the period from 2001 to 2003, prime responsibility within the FCO for information on other countries fell to the relevant regional department. For Iraq, that was the Middle East Department (MED), under the supervision of the Director, Middle East and North Africa.

57. The FCO Political Director, later known as the Director General (Political), is the senior FCO official responsible for developing and implementing FCO policy on the most significant bilateral and multilateral foreign policy issues facing the UK, and for directing policy advice to Ministers on those issues.

58. The Political Director is a member of the FCO Board and reports to the PUS.

59. The FCO Directorate of Strategy and Innovation (DSI) reports to the PUS and the FCO Board. Its role is to review policy in areas of high priority and supplement or challenge advice from the relevant department within the FCO. DSI was a significant contributor of strategy papers on Iraq in the second half of 2002.

60. The FCO Research Analysts provided expert support and background for the policy recommendations made by MED and the Iraq Policy Unit, drawing on information gained from contacts with Iraqi politicians and exiles, academics and journalists, those who had visited Iraq and from intelligence.[33] The Research Analysts also acted as the contact point within government for the US State Department's Future of Iraq project (see Section 6.4).

61. The FCO told the Inquiry that one analyst worked full-time on Iraq during 2001, increasing to two from mid-2002.[34]

62. On 29 November 2002, the FCO Board discussed priorities for the coming months, including reviewing Iraq policy and planning:

> "The Board agreed that the possibility of war in Iraq would remain the prime focus of attention over the next months. It discussed contingency plans being put in place. Work was in hand on staffing and establishing emergency units [see Section 6.5]. Procedures were due to be tested in January … Board members stressed the need to keep the level of threat under review; and to keep examining and testing out the contingency plans."[35]

63. On 2 December, Mr Ricketts (FCO Political Director) sent Sir Michael Jay (FCO PUS) advice on "preparations for handling an all-out Iraq crisis".[36] Mr Ricketts explained that he held daily meetings at 0900 to co-ordinate FCO activity, chaired in his absence by another FCO Board member or Mr Edward Chaplin (FCO Director, Middle East and North Africa). He also described the Iraq-related responsibilities of FCO senior officials:

> "William Ehrman [Director General Defence and Intelligence] deals with JIC and MOD, Graham Fry [Director General Wider World] supervises work on consular planning …; Edward Chaplin and Charles Gray take the lead on policy advice, working with DSI for longer range thinking, with the UN and CFSP [Common Foreign and Security Policy] teams, with the Legal Advisers and others. I have deliberately involved a wide spread of senior managers, because we may well have to sustain an intense crisis for a significant period …
> "You will of course want to be closely involved in all the policy-making. One of the key tasks of the Emergency Unit is to prepare the Foreign Secretary and you for the [anticipated] No.10 meetings, to ensure the FCO is pro-active and thinking ahead. I propose to take responsibility under you as overall co-ordinator …
> "MED and Personnel Command discussed again this week the staff numbers required to produce this structure, and other essential augmentation (for example, for the Press Office and Consular Division) … But it will be vital that the Board meets early and decides which tasks can fall away …

64. The FCO Emergency Unit, responsible for co-ordination of all aspects of FCO Iraq policy during the military campaign, opened on 14 March 2003.[37] The FCO Consular Crisis Centre opened on 17 March. Both operated 24 hours a day throughout the military campaign.

65. After the closure of the Emergency Unit on 2 May, Mr Ricketts resumed daily Iraq policy meetings in his office from 6 May.[38]

The Secret Intelligence Service and C

66. The 1994 Intelligence Services Act placed the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS) on a statutory basis, giving the Foreign Secretary responsibility for the work of SIS, defining the functions of the Service and the responsibilities of its Chief, who is known as C.[39]

67. The principal role of SIS is the production of secret intelligence on issues concerning Britain's vital interests in the fields of security, defence, foreign and economic policies in accordance with requirements established by the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) and approved by Ministers. SIS uses human and technical sources to meet those requirements, as well as liaison with a wide range of foreign intelligence and security services.[40]

68. Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry:

> "… the Service is not the Foreign Office. It's not a policy department. It's a department which is essentially an operational department, which contains a lot of people with some really remarkable knowledge and expertise."[41]

69. Under Section 2 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994, the Chief is responsible for the efficiency of the Service and it is:

> "… his duty to ensure –
>
> a. that there are arrangements for securing that no information is obtained by the Intelligence Service except so far as is necessary for the proper discharge of its functions and that no information is disclosed except so far as necessary –
> (i) for that purpose;

(ii) in the interests of national security;

(iii) for the purposes of the prevention or detection of a serious crime; or

(iv) for the purpose of any criminal proceedings …"

70. The Chief is required to make an annual report on the work of the Service to the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary and "may at any time report to either of them on any matter relating to its work".[42]

71. As a later version of the Cabinet Office document National Intelligence Machinery states, the Agencies are responsible for evaluating and circulating their "mainly single-source reports".[43]

PROVISION OF INTELLIGENCE REPORTS TO KEY CUSTOMERS

72. Intelligence collected by the three Intelligence Agencies – SIS, the Security Service and the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) – is passed directly in the form of reports to customer departments in government. Those reports assist decision-making. They also contribute, with other sources of information, to longer-term analysis, including Assessments issued by the JIC.

73. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that Mr Blair's travels overseas to secure support for action against Usama Bin Laden had had an impact on the relationship between No.10 and the Intelligence Agencies.[44] Sir Richard Dearlove, Chief of SIS, travelled with Mr Blair and had, in Lord Wilson's words: "seized his chance, quite understandably, and got to know the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister got to know him".

74. Asked about the pressures on SIS as a result of their success in producing material for the dossier, and when Mr Blair was relying on them and had put them on a pedestal, Sir Richard Dearlove told the Inquiry that was:

> "… a fragile and dangerous position, as one was well aware at the time. I don't deny that. But such are the events of government sometimes."[45]

75. Asked about his joint visits to Washington with Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that they "probably reflected the new weight that the intelligence Agencies had in the system" after 9/11:

> "It's in a sense inevitable because the Americans chose to play it this way. [George] Tenet [Director of the CIA] is an absolutely key figure … and we have to find our counterparts."[46]

76. Sir David also commented that:

> "… after 9/11 you see a completely new emphasis in Whitehall from Ministers, and indeed in terms of budgetary provision, for the Agencies. The fact that they had become the natural interlocutors of key players in the Bush Administration, and … given … much higher priority for resourcing … reflect[ed] a sort of shift in weight in the system."[47]

77. Asked whether Sir Richard Dearlove spent more time with Mr Blair than his predecessors, Sir David commented that he did not know; but:

> "Richard was certainly part of the group the Prime Minister consulted regularly, and … had access to the Prime Minister … pretty much when he wanted it."

78. Asked for his observations on how the relationships between the intelligence services, in particular Sir Richard Dearlove, and Mr Blair, Mr Straw and himself had changed, Sir David told the Inquiry:

> "… because the whole terrorism issue moved so rapidly up the agenda, and because there is a sense that we are vulnerable to asymmetric threats in a way that we haven't been in the past, there is a new recognition of the importance of the Agencies, a new willingness among Ministers to fund and resource the Agencies, and a much greater dependence on advice from the Agencies on threats that are not the conventional threats that we have been used to.
>
> "… in addition … you have two rather remarkable personalities as the Heads of [their respective] Agencies, Richard [Dearlove] and Eliza [Manningham-Buller] … and if you find that the American system is using the Agencies really rather extensively, then it does change the pattern and the way we work, partly because the Government puts much more emphasis on the Agencies and much less, in my view – and I think it's a mistake – on the traditional departments, but partly because we don't have a lot of choice because this is the sort of network that's developing.
> "… in a way I think you have to accept that the Heads of the Agencies are much more like the traditional Permanent Under Secretaries, that their departments are frequently better funded to deal with these issues than the traditional departments are, have more resource, can act more quickly …
>
> "So I think there has been a shift in the way that Whitehall operates, and I think it is inevitable that, as a result of that shift, the Heads of the Agencies have greater weight in the system …"[48]

[48] Private hearing, 24 June 2010, pages 43-45.

79. Sir David added that when, in crises, time was very short, there was a "tendency", if a message was being passed through an Agency, for that Agency to deliver it.[49]

80. Asked if the Agencies were being drawn into giving policy advice without necessarily having the experience fully to occupy that role, Sir David responded that they did "give more policy advice than in the past".[50] Because of the way the process had changed they had "found themselves almost being sucked into giving that advice from time to time". They had found themselves more in a "policy influencing role, than was traditional".

81. Asked for the perspective from No.10 on whether SIS had oversold what it could deliver, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry: "I can only say, looking back … that the fact was the intelligence does feel as though it delivered more than it actually did. I think quite quickly after the invasion it became clear that some of them felt that too."[51]

82. In relation to Sir Richard Dearlove's role, Sir David Omand said that:

> "SIS were very much in the inner council. They had proved their worth to the Prime Minister in a number of really very, very valuable pieces of work, not just delivering intelligence, but … conducting back channel diplomacy, and that, I'm sure weighed heavily on the Prime Minister's calculation that, 'These are people I should be listening to.'
>
>
> "… it is quite tempting to comment if you are the confidant of the Prime Minister – and you can go back to Churchill and his intelligence advisers … to find this in the role of the then Chief of the SIS in Churchill's inner council. It is quite tempting to go over that line and start expressing an opinion on the policy itself. I wasn't there to know if that happened … I'm making a more general point."[52]

83. Sir David added:

> "I think there were certainly people in the intelligence community, and there are still some, who believe that something will turn up in Syria, and I am certainly not going to break my own rules and say categorically that won't happen. We could all still be surprised. But there was a sense in which, because of past successes – very, very considerable successes supporting this government, that SIS overpromised and underdelivered, and when that became clear that the intelligence was very hard to find … they really were having to bust a gut to generate the intelligence.
> "I think the Butler Committee really uncovered that the tradecraft at that point wasn't as good as it should have been for validation… that's one of the background reasons why people were very unwilling to actually conclude: no … we may have miscalculated, or misassessed this."[53]

84. Asked about his views on Sir David Omand's comment from the standpoint of the JIC, Sir John Scarlett (Chairman of the JIC from 2001 to 2004) replied:

"I think what David was referring to there was the situation in January and February 2003, when UNMOVIC [the United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission] were not finding things, and so the reaction might have been: well, why is that? But the reaction was: well it's there. This just goes to show that UNMOVIC aren't much use and we will find it."[54]

85. In a letter to Mr Hoon on 17 September 2002, Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote:

"I also counselled against excessive briefings of the Prime Minister by the intelligence agencies, when it was evident that their input could be transmitted in written form and his time could be better spent with those Ministers (ie you and the Foreign Secretary) in the small groups needed to decide executive action or give policy direction."[55]

The Ministry of Defence

86. The Ministry of Defence (MOD) is both a Department of State and a Military Strategic Headquarters.

87. The Defence Secretary is responsible for the formulation and conduct of defence policy and chairs the Defence Council, which provides the formal legal basis for the conduct of Defence in the UK.

88. The Defence Council has a range of powers vested in it by Parliament (through statute) and, under Letters Patent issued by Her Majesty The Queen, exercises on Her behalf the function of the Royal Prerogative, including committing the Armed Forces to military operations.[56]

89. The Defence Secretary has two principal advisers: the PUS and the Chief of the Defence Staff (CDS).[57] They are separately responsible for ensuring that sound and timely advice reaches Ministers.[58]

90. The PUS is the Secretary of the Defence Council.

91. The Defence Secretary is responsible for the direction and conduct of all operations by UK Armed Forces.[59] He provides strategic direction, endorses the allocation of resources and sets the constraints on the use of force and is accountable to Parliament for all the decisions and actions of Defence.[60]

92. Force levels and Rules of Engagement are subject to policy decisions made by Ministers, taking into account legal advice. Those decisions are recorded in a CDS Directive.

93. As a Department of State, MOD Head Office ensures the conduct of operations reflects the Defence Secretary's direction and is consistent with wider government policy.[61] Its focus is at the strategic level: to define the ways in which military force will contribute to the achievement of the Government's current and future security objectives and to determine the military means required to deliver them.

94. As the most senior civil servant in the Department of State, the PUS has primary responsibility for policy, finance and administration in the MOD.[62]

95. The PUS provides policy advice to Ministers on current and potential operations.[63]

96. The PUS's core responsibilities and accountabilities comprise:

"
- Leading [the Ministry of] Defence, with CDS (to Defence Secretary).
- Defence and nuclear policy advice …
- Accounting Officer duties …
- Developing an affordable programme (to Defence Secretary).
- Formulating Defence strategy (with CDS) (to Defence Secretary).
- Acting as head of profession for MOD civil servants (to Defence Secretary).
- Co-ordinating delivery of top level decision making …"

97. The PUS is also responsible for: "Leading the [MOD's] relationship with other Government Departments."[64]

98. The PUS is the MOD's Principal Accounting Office and is personally accountable to Parliament for the expenditure of all public money voted for Defence purposes.[65]

99. As professional head of the Armed Forces, the CDS is responsible for the delivery of military capability, including the direction of military operations.[66]

100. Lord Boyce, CDS from February 2001 to May 2003, told the Inquiry that his responsibility was to advise on military capability and capacity.[67]

101. As the principal military adviser to the Defence Secretary and the Government/ Prime Minister, the CDS will attend Cabinet or its sub-committees as required and will draw on the operationally focused advice provided by the Service Chiefs of Staff and senior civil servants through the Chiefs of Staff Committee.[68]

102. The CDS, advised by the Vice Chief of the Defence Staff (VCDS) and the Service Chiefs, is responsible for the formulation of the military strategy and its coherence with government policy. Following the Defence Secretary's direction, the CDS is responsible for the planning, direction and conduct of all military operations.

103. Through a CDS Directive, he:

- Appoints the operational commander.
- Provides strategic direction.
- Identifies the military conditions for success.
- Designates the theatre and joint operations area.
- Specifies force levels and resources.
- Promulgates the constraints on the use of force.
- Sets the strategic intelligence requirements.[69]

104. The Chiefs of Staff Committee (COS) is the main forum through which the CDS seeks and obtains the collective military advice of the single Service Chiefs of Staff, and through which he discharges his responsibility for the preparation and conduct of military operations.[70]

105. The Committee is chaired by the CDS. The three Service Chiefs of Staff and the VCDS are the only other full members. Responsibility for the decisions and advice that emerge rests solely with the CDS. More information on COS is set out below.

106. Mr Hoon told the Inquiry that it was important that he, the CDS and the PUS "worked together, otherwise we had problems":

> "… it was important for me to enjoy the confidence of the military, but at the same time ensure that those responsible for developing policy on the Civil Service side were comfortable with where we were going."[71]

107. Mr Hoon added that "one of the great successes" of the MOD was the extent to which it was "genuinely joined up" and the "real integration between the civil servants and the military". He had "excellent relationship[s]" with each of the Chiefs of Defence Staff with whom he worked, and "very regular … informal and formal meetings". In the course of "campaigns like Iraq", such meetings were "on a daily or more than daily basis".[72]

ROLES WITHIN THE MOD

108. The principal task of the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS)[73] was the provision of intelligence to inform MOD policy formulation and procurement decisions, and to support military operations.[74]

109. DIS worked closely with other UK intelligence organisations and with overseas allies.[75] Its sources included human, signals and imagery intelligence, as well as open sources. The DIS produced a number of reports on the state of Iraq.

110. The Defence Crisis Management Organisation (DCMO) is tasked to provide "politically aware military advice to inform the strategic commitment of UK forces to overseas joint and combined operations".[76]

111. The DCMO comprises the Permanent Joint Headquarters (PJHQ) and elements of the MOD Central Staff, single service frontline commands and other relevant departments.[77]

112. As head of PJHQ, the Chief of Joint Operations (CJO) is responsible for the planning and execution of joint (tri-Service) operations.[78]

113. CJO reports directly to the CDS for contingency planning and advice on the conduct and resourcing of current operations.[79] At the operational level, CJO is responsible for the deployment, direction, sustainment and recovery of deployed forces in order to deliver the military strategy set out in the CDS's Directive.

114. The CJO is the Commander Joint Operations for current operations for which he is responsible.

115. The MOD Central Staff advises both the PUS and CDS. Between 2001 and 2009 it was led jointly by the VCDS and the Second Permanent Secretary (2nd PUS), supported by a joint staff.

116. The two most senior members of the Central Staff with responsibilities for decisions on military operations were the Deputy Chief of the Defence Staff (Commitments) (DCDS(C)) and the Policy Director. They were supported by the Assistant Chief of Defence Staff Operations (ACDS(Ops)) and the Director General Operational Policy (DG Op Pol).[80]

117. In the period from 2002 to 2003, DCDS(C) was supported by the Strategic Planning Group (SPG).

118. Lieutenant General Sir Robert Fry, DCDS(C) from July 2003 to January 2006, stated that he was "responsible for the military strategic advice to the Chiefs of Staff".[81]

119. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the Policy Director was responsible for leading the effort to balance political and military considerations in producing advice.[82]

THE CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

120. The Chiefs of Staff Committee is supported by the Chiefs of Staff Secretariat (COSSEC), which ensures that minutes and decisions are promulgated swiftly, a record of outstanding actions is prepared and maintained, and papers are prepared and circulated to support discussions.

121. The papers prepared for COS meetings and the minutes of its discussions (although they are not a verbatim record) provide a major source of information for the Inquiry.

122. From time to time, the Chiefs of Staff also hold discussions which are unminuted. Those include early discussions on Iraq in the first half of 2002 and Chiefs of Staff (Informal) (COS(I)) meetings.

123. By early 2002, the COS Committee was already meeting at least once a week, often designated as COS (Operations), to discuss operational issues in addition to the regular cycle of meetings on non-operational issues.

124. In 2002, there were 71 meetings of the COS Committee. Issues related to Afghanistan constituted the main business until 19 September, when COS discussed a paper addressing potential UK support to US operations against Iraq.[83]

125. From 19 September, the COS Committee met weekly, usually on a Wednesday morning, to discuss Iraq, and other operational issues.

[83] Minutes, 19 September 2002, Chiefs of Staff meeting.

126. The agenda for the weekly COS (Operations) meetings usually comprised a briefing from the Chief of Defence Intelligence, followed by:

- "political/military overview";
- operational planning;
- media; and
- next steps.

127. By the autumn of 2002, COS (Operations) meetings were attended by a range of military and civilian officials or their representatives.

128. In late 2002/early 2003, that included the MOD PUS, the Chief of Defence Logistics, the DCDS(C), the Chief of Defence Intelligence, the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Equipment Capability), the Deputy Chief of Defence Staff (Personnel), the Policy Director, the Director General of Corporate Communications and, frequently, senior officials from some or all of the Cabinet Office, the FCO, SIS and GCHQ.

129. The first recorded attendance by a DFID representative was on 19 February 2003.

130. Meetings with Defence Ministers often followed COS (Operations) meetings. The papers examined by the Inquiry for the period between 2001 and 2009 suggest that they were essentially briefing meetings and no records of the discussions were produced.

131. The MOD has conducted an extensive search of its archives and no records of minutes for these meetings have been located.

132. Lord Boyce told the Inquiry that attendance at COS meetings provided "transparency of what the military were doing" for other departments, and that they would provide inputs setting out their thinking.[84]

133. Sir Kevin Tebbit added that it was "a very important way of making sure people understood the tempo of planning".

134. General Sir John Reith, Chief of Joint Operations from August 2001 to July 2004, told the Inquiry that PJHQ had a "very, very close relationship" with the MOD and in particular with the Commitments Staff:

> "… every single paper that we produced at PJHQ was staffed through the … MOD before it went under my signature into the Chiefs of Staff Committee, and we had a VTC [video conference] every morning … I was on regular VTCs for the op[erations] Chiefs of Staff meetings and for the Ministerials."[85]

The Department for International Development

135. In 2003, the Department for International Development (DFID) was responsible for leading the Government's contribution to eliminating poverty. The International Development Act, which came into effect in June 2002, had established poverty reduction as the overarching purpose of British development assistance.

136. Within DFID, the Iraq Team in the Middle East and North Africa Department included advisers with expertise on conflict, humanitarian assistance, governance, infrastructure, economics and social development who provided analysis to inform decisions.[86] The DFID Iraq Team worked closely with the FCO and drew on the FCO's Iraq-related research and analysis.

137. Advisers were drawn from the relevant DFID professional cadres with consultants brought in to provide advice on specific issues and projects where required.

138. In addition, DFID's Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department (CHAD) provided specific policy and operational advice on Iraq.

Decision-making machinery pre-conflict

139. Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that between January 1998 and January 1999 he had attended and noted 21 Ministerial discussions on Iraq; 10 in Cabinet, of which seven had "some substance"; five in the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee (DOP); and six ad hoc meetings, including one JIC briefing.[87]

140. The Cabinet Office informed the Inquiry that there was no discussion of Iraq in DOP in 1999 or 2000, and that the four discussions in Cabinet in early 1999 (the last on 7 March) were confined to brief updates on the No-Fly Zones.[88] There is no record of any Cabinet discussion of Iraq in 2000.

141. In contrast, Lord Wilson told the Inquiry that between 9/11 and January 2002 he attended 46 Ministerial meetings on international terrorism and/or Afghanistan.[89] Those were: 13 Cabinet meetings (four of which were very short); 12 meetings of a new Cabinet Committee, DOP(IT) (Defence and Overseas Policy (International Terrorism)), which was set up as a sort of "War Cabinet"; and 21 ad hoc meetings, although many of those had taken place "round the Cabinet table".

The Defence and Overseas Policy Committee

142. DOP, formally a Sub Committee of the Cabinet, was created in 1963, with Terms of Reference: "To keep under review the Government's defence and overseas policy."

The conventions used in Cabinet minutes

The Guide to Minute Taking produced by the Cabinet Office in June 2001 said that the first purpose of a minute was to set out the conclusions reached so that those who have to take action know precisely what to do; the second purpose was to "give the reasons why the conclusions were reached".

The Guide said:

> "A good minute of a meeting will be:
>
> i. brief but intelligible;
>
> ii. self-contained;
>
> iii. in the main, impersonal; and
> iv. to the full extent that the discussion allows, decisive."[90]

The Guide made clear that a minute was "not a substitute for a verbatim record" and should not reproduce points made by every speaker. Instead they should be grouped into paragraphs which develop the argument.

Points should be attributed to an individual when "a specifically departmental view has been put forward, or a suggestion has been made to safeguard a departmental interest", or when a speaker reserves their position or registers dissent. Dissent to the conclusions of a Cabinet meeting should only be recorded if the dissenting Minister indicates an intention to resign.

The Guide advised that when the Chair had summed up a discussion "it is usually convenient to record this as a formal summing up" to record "the sense of the meeting" and avoid lengthy conclusions. A minute should end with conclusions which are "clear and precise".

The Guide explained that conventions govern the formulae used to indicate different kinds of action, which reflected "the constitutional position of Ministers as individually responsible for matters covered by their department while sharing in the collective responsibility of members of the Government". The formulae also distinguished the positions of the Chair of a Committee and its Secretariat. They were:

> "The Committee–
> 1. Approved [a memorandum].
> 2. Agreed [on a course of action].
> 3. Agreed to resume their discussion …
> 4. Instructed the Secretaries …
> 5. Invited the Chancellor of the Exchequer [or the Treasury in the case of an Official Committee] to … (do not say 'authorised').

6. Took note that the Chancellor of the Exchequer [or Treasury] would…
7. Took note.
8. Took note, with approval, of the Prime Minister's [Chair's] summing up of their discussions [and invited the Ministers concerned to proceed accordingly]."

The Ad Hoc Meeting (the War Cabinet)

144. In June 2002, officials began to discuss changes to the Government's machinery for Iraq policy and planning.

145. Recommendations to improve Whitehall co-ordination at official and Ministerial level were put to Mr Blair in mid-September.

146. Mr Tom McKane, Deputy Head of OD Sec, sent Sir David Manning a note on possible machinery "for managing Iraq" on 2 September.[91] He recalled that he and Sir David had already agreed that, "following the pattern of Afghanistan", there should be two groups of officials: an "inner group" chaired by Sir David (or Mr Desmond Bowen who would shortly be taking over from Mr McKane) and a more junior "wider group", chaired by Mr Bowen or Mr Drummond.

147. Mr McKane proposed that the inner group "should begin work once you [Sir David Manning] decide that the time is right". It would comprise the Chair of the JIC or Chief of the Assessments Staff, the FCO Middle East Director, the DCDS(C) and/or Mr Ian Lee (MOD Director General Operational Policy), and representatives of all three Intelligence Agencies and the Home Office. Mr McKane asked whether it should also include the Defence Intelligence Staff (DIS) and a No.10 information specialist. He proposed that the wider group "should meet periodically from now on and, inter alia, address the issues set out in Jim Drummond's minute of 30 August".

148. Mr McKane wrote that "we also need to consider the composition of a Ministerial Group". He recommended the creation of a separate Ad Hoc Sub-Committee of DOP, chaired by the Prime Minister, with the participation of the Foreign and Defence Secretaries and the Intelligence Chiefs. DOP "could meet less frequently and be the means of formalising decisions". Mr McKane also suggested that Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, be invited "to be in attendance at both these groups, as required" and Mr Robin Cook, the Leader of the House, "be invited to attend DOP".

149. Sir David Manning put the proposals to Mr Blair on 12 September.[92] At official level, Sir David recommended that he or Mr Bowen should chair an inner group, to include the JIC, the FCO, the MOD, SIS, the Security Service, GCHQ, the Home Office and Sir David Omand, the Cabinet Office Permanent Secretary.

[91] Minute McKane to Manning, 2 September 2002, 'Iraq'.
[92] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 12 September 2002, 'Iraq'.

150. A wider group, chaired by OD Sec, would be "tasked as necessary by the inner group". The additional members would include DFID, the Metropolitan Police Service, the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry (DTI) and media specialists from No.10 and the FCO.

151. In his advice to Mr Blair, Sir David Manning adjusted slightly Mr McKane's proposal for a Ministerial Group. He suggested:

> "If we follow the Afghan precedent, we would set up an Ad Hoc Group (perhaps technically a Sub-Committee of DOP under your chairmanship) to include Jack [Straw], Geoff [Hoon], CDS [Admiral Sir Michael Boyce], C [Sir Richard Dearlove] and No.10. The idea would be to keep it tight with meetings in the Den. If we move to military action, we would, of course, need to widen this to include John Prescott [the Deputy Prime Minister], David Blunkett [the Home Secretary] and perhaps others.
>
> "This leaves the question of what to do about the Attorney. I assume that you would not want him to attend your Ad Hoc Group except by invitation on specific occasions."

152. Ms Clare Short, the International Development Secretary, was not on Sir David's list of recommended participants.

153. Mr Blair wrote on Sir David Manning's advice: "Yes but we can wait before setting up a key Cabinet Group."[93]

154. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, instructed Sir David Manning: "to progress official groups and leave Minist[eria]l groups for now".[94]

155. Asked by the Inquiry whether having more stress testing by very senior ministers not directly involved with Iraq issues might have helped to highlight some of the weaknesses in areas such as post-conflict planning, Mr Blair replied:

> "… in one sense I would like to say 'yes', because it would be in a way an easy enough concession to make. My frank belief is it would not have made a great deal of difference, no. The committee meetings that we had, small 'a', small 'h', ad hoc meetings, I think there were 28 of them, 14 of which were minuted. I had the right people there … no-one was saying to me 'Do it a different way'. I mean, if someone had I would have listened to it, but I have to say to you in addition when I looked, for example, at Mrs Thatcher's War Cabinet, it didn't have the Chancellor of the Exchequer on it… you have there the people that you need there."[95]

156. A member of OD Sec wrote to Sir David Manning on 30 January with a draft minute from Sir Andrew Turnbull to Mr Blair setting out "on a contingency basis" a proposal for "meeting and briefing arrangements for handling any conflict with Iraq".[96] The official suggested that Sir David might like to discuss the issue with Mr Blair before the draft was submitted to Sir Andrew.

157. The draft minute proposed that, "given the sensitivity of the issues to be discussed", the "War Cabinet" should be a "very small, informal group" "limited to the Foreign Secretary, the Defence Secretary, CDS, C, John Scarlett plus a small Secretariat". There was also "a case for including a non-departmental Cabinet Minister who is not quite so close to the action". The membership could also be "extended as necessary on a case by case basis, if there was a need to involve any other Minister (such as the Attorney General or Development Secretary) in the discussions".

158. The draft stated:

> "The core group could be formally constituted as a Cabinet Committee. But I recommend that it be established as an Ad Hoc Ministerial Committee. This would help foster an air of informality and obviate the need to publish any composition and terms of reference."

159. The covering minute to Sir David stated that:

> "In terms of managing the business this is fine. But in the absence of a formally constituted 'War Cabinet' as we had with Afghanistan, which was the public face of decision taking, could lead to unhelpful speculation about how the conflict was being managed. Other Ministers might also feel excluded. One way round the problem would be for DOP to be convened occasionally (thereby bringing in Clare Short and Gordon Brown) when there is a need for a wider discussion – perhaps before Cabinet each week. This would be in addition to more regular meetings of the inner group."

160. The draft minute stated that COBR should be "activated in the immediate run up to any military action, and manned on a 24 hour basis"; and that: "As during the Afghanistan conflict, David Manning would chair official-level meetings (both in restricted and wider formats) to co-ordinate and galvanise Departmental activity and to ensure that you are properly briefed on developments." A daily intelligence update, an 'Overnight Sitrep' prepared early each morning "covering the main international and military developments", and "a more detailed thematic 'Evening Round-Up' following the Afghanistan model" were also proposed.

---

[96] Minute Gibbons to Manning, 30 January 2003, 'Iraq: Crisis Management'.

161. The official also informed Sir David that the MOD was planning on the basis of a daily press briefing at 1000, and the importance of striking a balance between the various briefings in theatre, London and Iraq.[97]

162. Sir David Manning sent the minute to Mr Jonathan Powell, writing: "Grateful if we could discuss."[98]

163. An 'Ad Hoc Meeting' of Ministers took place daily from 19 March to 12 April, with the exception of Sundays 30 March and 6 April. The Committee then met five times before the end of April.

164. Sir Kevin Tebbit wrote to Sir Andrew Turnbull on 5 March stating:

> "I am sure you have this in hand already, but in case it might help, I should like to offer you my thoughts on the procedure for handling the legal basis for any offensive operations … in Iraq – a subject touching on my responsibilities since it is the CDS who will need to be assured that he will be acting on the basis of a lawful instruction from the Prime Minister and the Defence Secretary.
>
> "It is not possible to be certain about the precise circumstances in which this would arise because we cannot be sure about the UN scenario involved … Clearly full UN cover is devoutly to be desired – and not just for the military operation itself …
>
> "My purpose in writing, however, is not to argue the legal merits of the case … but to flag up … that the call to action from President Bush could come at quite short notice and that we need to be prepared to handle the legalities so we can deliver …
>
> "In these circumstances, I suggest that the Prime Minister should be prepared to convene a special meeting of the inner 'war' Cabinet (Defence and Foreign Secretaries certainly, Chancellor, DPM [Deputy Prime Minister], Home Secretary possibly, Attorney General, crucially) at which CDS effectively receives his legal and constitutional authorisation. We have already given the Attorney General information and MOD briefings on objectives and rationale, and I understand that John Scarlett is conducting further briefing on the basis of the intelligence material.
> "While it is not possible to predict the timing of the event precisely … could conceivably be as early as 10 March … in the event, albeit unlikely, that the Americans lost hope in the UN and move fast. Michael Jay may have a better fix on this, but I guess the more likely timing would be for Security Council action around the weekend of 15/16 March, and therefore for a meeting after that."[99]

165. In a minute of 14 March, Mr Powell recorded that "we have agreed" that Mr Blair would start to hold daily meetings of a 'War Cabinet" from 0830 on 19 March. Mr Powell advised Mr Blair that he would need Mr Hoon, Mr Straw and Adm Boyce and asked which Ministers and officials Mr Blair wanted to attend, including whether Mr Blair wanted Ms Short, Sir Andrew Turnbull or Sir David Omand, and the Heads of the Intelligence Agencies.[100]

166. The minute was copied to Baroness Sally Morgan (Director of Political and Government Relations), Mr Alastair Campbell (Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy), Mr Jeremy Heywood (Mr Blair's Principal Private Secretary), Sir David Manning and Mr Rycroft. It was not copied to Sir Andrew Turnbull.

167. Sir Andrew Turnbull set out the arrangements for a small 'War Cabinet', chaired by Mr Blair "to oversee the UK's involvement in military action in Iraq", in a minute to Mr Heywood on 18 March 2003.[101] The minute said:

- OD Sec would produce a short note recording the main decisions after each meeting, which would be "sent only to those who attend".
- "There might also be a case for having weekly meetings of DOP (including the Chancellor and Home Secretary in addition), perhaps convening just before Cabinet. This would provide an opportunity for wider Ministerial involvement, including on day after issues. I suggest this is something that David Manning keeps under review."
- COBR was being activated on a 24 hour basis on 18 March: "As during the Afghanistan conflict" Sir David Manning would "chair official level meetings (both in restricted and wider formats) to co-ordinate and galvanise Departmental activity and to ensure that the Prime Minister is properly briefed on developments".
- COBR would produce "early-morning sitreps and a more detailed thematic Evening Round-Up, following the Afghanistan model".
- Mr Scarlett would "brief the Group on the intelligence picture".
- The Assessments Staff were producing daily written intelligence updates, which would "normally issue at 08:00".

168. The Committee's remit was to "cover … military and other updates and the day's events"; and "to focus on longer term policy decisions", although the time for that would be limited and would need to be "rationed carefully".[102]

169. The members of the Committee were: Mr John Prescott (the Deputy Prime Minister), Mr Gordon Brown (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), Mr Jack Straw (the Foreign Secretary), Mr David Blunkett (the Home Secretary), Ms Clare Short (the International Development Secretary), Dr John Reid (Minister without Portfolio),[103] and Mr Geoff Hoon (the Defence Secretary).

170. From 20 March, Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney General, attended almost every meeting and Mrs Margaret Beckett, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, was a regular attendee from 25 March.

171. Adm Boyce, C and Mr Scarlett attended the meeting to advise on the progress of the military campaign and the intelligence picture.

172. The Cabinet Office circulated a record of the discussion.

173. Mr Rycroft advised Mr Blair on 19 March that there would be a standard agenda each day for the meeting, issued by the Cabinet Office, along with an update of key events which they would prepare each evening.[104] No.10 would provide Mr Blair with "a short note of specific points to cover each day". Mr Rycroft also advised that: "As this is a large group, we shall have to see in a couple of days whether it is practicable or whether we shall need a small group as well."

174. In a minute to Mr Powell dated 30 March, Mr Blair requested a change to his daily rhythm, stating:

> "I need a longer private meeting with CDS, Geoff Hoon etc.
> "So I suggest we make that: 8.30am. The War Cabinet at 9.00am. The political meeting at 9.30am. This should … include media handling."[105]

175. Mr Blair also set out his ideas for a communications strategy and asked for "more overt work on the guarantees to the Iraqi people".

Official-level inter-departmental machinery

THE JOINT INTELLIGENCE COMMITTEE

176. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) is a cross-Government Committee created in 1936, which has been part of the Cabinet Office since 1957.

177. The JIC was (and remains) responsible for:

> "… providing Ministers and senior officials with co-ordinated intelligence assessments on a range of issues of immediate and long-range importance to national interests, primarily in the fields of security, defence and foreign affairs."[106]

---

[105] Minute Blair to Powell, 30 March 2003, 'Note'.
[106] Cabinet Office, National Intelligence Machinery, November 2010, pages 23-24.

178. The Chairman of the JIC is "responsible for the broad supervision of the work of the JIC" and "specifically charged with ensuring that the Committee's warning and monitoring role" was "discharged effectively". He also has direct access to the Prime Minister.

179. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that the JIC was designed to be at the interface between intelligence and policy.[107] The Chairman of the JIC played a key role:

> "… to represent the views, which are very thoroughly considered, of the JIC itself. He doesn't have a separate status, separate from the Committee itself. He carries his authority, because he is carrying the authority of the Committee and he is representing those views."

180. Sir John Scarlett told the Inquiry that he was "answerable" to Sir David Omand "for the efficient functioning of the Committee and the Secretariat", but he was "responsible for the presentation of intelligence assessment to Government".[108]

181. The JIC is supported by the Joint Intelligence Organisation (JIO), including the Assessments Staff, comprising analysts seconded to the Cabinet Office from other departments. The JIO is "responsible for drafting assessments of situations and issues of current concern", taking "into account all sources of information, including intelligence reports produced by the Agencies, diplomatic reporting and media reports".

182. The Assessments Staff's draft Assessments are subject to formal inter-departmental scrutiny and challenge in Current Intelligence Groups (CIGs), which bring together working-level experts from a range of government departments and the intelligence agencies. In the case of Iraq between 2001 and 2003, the CIG brought together the desk-level experts from the FCO (including MED and RA), MOD (including DIS), the Cabinet Office and the intelligence agencies, and any other department with an interest in the issue being considered.

183. The JIC's terms of reference from 2001 to 2005 included responsibilities to:

- "monitor and give early warning of the development of direct or indirect foreign threats to British interest, whether political, military or economic";
- "on the basis of available information, to assess events and situations relating to external affairs, defence, terrorism, major international criminal activity, scientific, technical and international economic matters";
- "keep under review threats to security at home and overseas and to deal with such security problems as may be referred to it";
- "bring to the attention of Ministers and departments, as appropriate, assessments that appear to require operational, planning or policy action":

[108] Public hearing, 8 December 2009, page 4.

the Chairman was "specifically charged with ensuring that the Committee's monitoring and warning role is discharged effectively"; and

- "report to the Secretary of the Cabinet", except where "special assessments" were required by the Chiefs of Staff, which would be "submitted to them directly in the first instance".

184. The JIC agrees most Assessments before they are sent to Ministers and senior officials, although some papers, including urgent updates on developing issues, are issued under the authority of the Chief of the Assessments Staff.

185. The current JIC terms of reference make clear that it is expected to draw on "secret intelligence, diplomatic reporting and open source material."[109]

186. JIC Assessments are most frequently produced in response to a request from a policy department which determines the precise issues to be addressed. The JIC also commissions Assessments and can direct that the ground covered in any Assessment should be amended if it considers that is required.

187. Some CIG Assessments are issued under the authority of the Chief of the Assessments Staff and are noted but not discussed by the JIC, including where the content is regarded as routine or as an update of previous Assessments.

188. Iraq was regularly considered by the JIC in 2000 and 2001, with the focus on weapons of mass destruction (WMD), sanctions and the implications of the No-Fly Zones.[110]

189. Sir John Scarlett considered that Iraq had been one of the top priorities for the JIC for most of his time as Chairman.[111]

190. As Chairman of the JIC, Mr Scarlett attended many of the meetings on Iraq held by Mr Blair and provided advice and briefing, including in response to requests from No.10.

191. In late July 2002, Mr Scarlett was asked to provide updated intelligence on Iraq on a weekly basis for Mr Blair's weekend box.[112]

192. Mr Scarlett provided the first 'Weekly Intelligence Summary' on Iraq on 26 July.[113]

193. From 15 November, the Summary was replaced by an 'Intelligence Update' produced by the Assessments Staff. Until the end of January 2003, the Updates were produced weekly. In February the frequency increased, rising to three a week by the end of the month.

194. From March until mid-May 2003, Intelligence Updates on Iraq were produced on a daily basis.[114]

195. The Updates were used "to sweep up and summarise recent intelligence" and included "explanatory comments"; but they were "not a vehicle for assessment".[115]

THE AD HOC GROUP ON IRAQ

196. On 26 June 2002, Mr Webb informed Mr Hoon's Private Office that MOD officials were encouraging the Cabinet Office to supplement the Pigott Group (an MOD-led, inter-departmental group of senior officials – see Section 6.4) with a broader body involving a wider range of departments with a policy interest in Iraq and the region.[116]

197. Those ideas began to take shape on 8 August, when Mr Jim Drummond, Assistant Head of OD Sec, informed Mr McKane that he had spoken to Sir David Manning about possible changes to Whitehall structures.[117] Mr Drummond explained that one consequence of existing Whitehall mechanisms for discussing Iraq, including in particular the Pigott Group's focus on military matters, was that "we are focusing a lot on military aspects and less on the alliance building, morning after, unintended consequences etc. Come September there may be a case for a tighter grip from the Centre."

198. Mr Drummond raised the issue with Sir David Manning again on 30 August. He recalled that Sir David had commented earlier in the summer that it was too soon to think about management of the unintended consequences of conflict, but that the issue would probably need to be discussed in the autumn.[118]

199. Mr Drummond enclosed a "skeleton" paper on the subject prepared by a Cabinet Office junior official and suggested meeting to discuss the paper and Whitehall machinery for Iraq at the same time.

200. The Cabinet Office paper on unintended consequences focused on the possible impact of war on UK interests and on countries in the region, rather than on post-conflict Iraq.

201. The FCO produced a more substantial paper on the unintended consequences of conflict for the region and beyond on 20 September (see Section 6.4).

202. Also attached to Mr Drummond's minute was a "list of headings for future work" on unintended consequences, which included: "avoiding fragmentation of a failed state in Iraq".

203. Sir David Manning replied to Mr Drummond: "Let us discuss p[lea]se with Tom McKane before he goes. We need to do this work: there is a question about timing."[119]

204. Mr McKane sent Sir David Manning a note on possible machinery "for managing Iraq" on 2 September, which is addressed earlier in this Section.[120]

205. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, instructed Sir David Manning "to progress official groups and leave Minist[eria]l groups for now".[121]

206. Sir Kevin Tebbit set out his views about the new Whitehall arrangements to Mr Hoon on 17 September:

> "Mindful of the difficulties (and frustrations) we have experienced in the past in establishing the right machinery and processes to run crucial politico/military campaigns, I saw David Manning yesterday to discuss the arrangements which might be presented to the Prime Minister, designed to help successful delivery of an Iraq campaign.
>
> "I reminded David of the importance of a small 'core' Ministerial team, meeting very regularly to execute daily business (as distinct from less frequent policy meetings and Cabinet itself). I outlined the linkage needed with the wider COBR and DOP machinery that would pull in government departments and agencies as a whole …
>
> "David said that he had little influence over such matters as distinct from Jonathan [Powell]. However, he took the point, especially about the importance of acting through key Ministers in small groups. The position at present was that the Prime Minister had decided over the weekend on the following:
> a. no Ministerial meetings at this stage;
> b. a preference, when they became necessary, for the 'late Afghan' model to apply – ie PM; Defence Secretary; Foreign Secretary; CDS; C; Scarlett; Attorney General and Alastair Campbell as appropriate;
> c. meanwhile for Restricted COBR meetings to begin on a twice weekly basis under Manning's chairmanship;
> d. for a wider DOP Committee of officials to begin work, under Bowen's chairmanship, which would be the vehicle for bringing in OGDs – DFID, Customs etc."[122]

207. Sir Kevin commented:

> "This seems satisfactory for the time being, although we shall need to watch to ensure that (b) does not begin without you being present and that (c) provides the framework we need to link effectively with the contingency planning in the MOD (and perhaps to begin to consider tricky issues of wider relevance, eg the effect on energy prices and oil aftermath management). I should have preferred Bowen to run a restricted officials forum, given the other pressures on Manning's time, the need to begin setting a regular rhythm, and some of the wider issues to be confronted. But I do not think we can do better for the present."

208. At official level, the cross-Whitehall Ad Hoc Group on Iraq (AHGI) met for the first time on 20 September 2002. It became the principal forum for co-ordination of planning and preparation for a post-Saddam Hussein or post-conflict Iraq (see Section 6.5).

209. Mr Bowen told the Inquiry that when the AHGI started its work in September 2002, the context was "a serious policy commitment to deal with weapons of mass destruction in Iraq".[123] Conflict was just one of "any number of outcomes".

COBR(R)

210. In his 12 September minute to Mr Blair, Sir David Manning recommended that he should chair an "Inner Group", to include the JIC, the FCO, the MOD, SIS, the Security Service, GCHQ, the Home Office and Sir David Omand.[124]

211. A "Wider Group", tasked by the Inner Group and chaired by OD Sec, would include, additionally, DFID, the Metropolitan Police, the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry and media specialists from No.10 and the FCO.

212. The Inner Group, which discussed a range of issues including counter-terrorism and Afghanistan and was not minuted (although actions were recorded in some instances), was known as the Restricted COBR or COBR(R); the wider group was the AHGI.

213. Sir David Manning told Mr Blair that:

> "This Wider Group would be tasked as necessary by the Inner Group."

214. When he reported the new arrangements to Mr Hoon on 17 September, Sir Kevin Tebbit explained that the Prime Minister had decided there should be no Ministerial meetings at this stage, but that twice weekly Restricted COBR meetings chaired by Sir David Manning and a wider officials' group under Mr Desmond Bowen (Mr McKane's successor), should begin their work.[125] Sir Kevin commented:

> "… we shall need to watch to ensure … that (c) [Restricted COBR] provides the framework we need to link effectively with the contingency planning in the MOD … Ideally, I should have preferred Bowen to run a Restricted officials forum, given the other pressures on Manning's time, the need to begin setting a regular rhythm, and some of the wider issues to be confronted."

215. Asked to explain the Whitehall arrangements, Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that the Restricted group chaired by himself or his deputy included "all those who had access to the most sensitive intelligence".[126] It was not focused solely on Iraq, and often had other pressing issues to deal with but:

> "… it was an opportunity to bring – to report on the progress that different departments had made, on the latest assessment that may have come out of the agencies, the political issues that were being confronted by the Foreign Office, the difficulties that the Ministry of Defence might be encountering and so on and so forth."

216. The wider group drew in those with less or very little access to sensitive intelligence.

217. Between 20 September 2002 and 27 August 2003 there were 67 meetings of COBR(R).[127]

218. Agendas for the discussions usually recorded Iraq as item one, under which a bullet point list of topics followed. The first of those was usually an intelligence update.

219. None of the meetings were fully minuted. After 22 meetings out of 67 a list of actions was recorded.[128] For the others, no official record of the discussion was made.

220. Actions were allocated to specific departments or agencies. The only reference to the AHGI is found in the list of actions arising from a meeting of COBR(R) on 5 February 2003, which said:

> "The FCO to ensure that key elements of the ongoing work on 'aftermath' planning are fed to COBR(R) via the Ad Hoc Group (Action: FCO/OD Sec)."[129]

221. There is no evidence of issues being formally escalated by the AHGI to COBR(R).

222. Lord Turnbull told the Inquiry that the role of COBR(R) was "to take the fallout from that War Cabinet meeting and try and take things forward".[130]

Creation of the Iraq Planning Unit

223. The inter-departmental (FCO/MOD/DFID) Iraq Planning Unit (IPU), based in the FCO, was established on 10 February to improve Whitehall co-ordination on post-conflict issues.

224. Although the IPU was an inter-departmental unit, its head was a senior member of the Diplomatic Service and it was integrated into the FCO management structure.

225. The draft terms of reference stated that:

- The IPU would report to Mr Chaplin in the FCO, but without defining the relationship between the Unit and senior officials in DFID and the MOD.
- The IPU would work "within broad policy guidelines set by the Cabinet Office".
- Its main purpose would be to provide "policy guidance on practical questions" that UK civilian officials and military commanders would face in Iraq.
- The IPU was intended "to bring influence to bear on US plans".

226. Tasks assigned to the IPU by the AHGI included consideration of:

- the shape of the Iraqi political process needed to underpin the transition to Iraqi rule;
- management of Iraq's oil; and
- whether and where the UK should run its own sector before the restoration of Iraqi sovereignty.

227. After the creation of the IPU, the AHGI remained responsible for co-ordination of all post-conflict planning and preparation across government, including consular planning and civil contingencies.

228. On 3 February, Mr Ehrman reported to Mr Ricketts that the Pigott Group had decided that there was a need for a senior FCO official to co-ordinate full-time with MOD, DFID and others the rapidly increasing volume of work on aftermath planning.[131]

229. Mr Ehrman suggested that "in addition to work on overall legality … we will need sub-groups on WMD, OFF [the Oil-for-Food programme], SSR [Security Sector Reform], humanitarian, reconstruction, judicial, possibly terrorism. All this to feed into and influence the various aftermath groups in Washington."

[131] Minute Ehrman to Ricketts, 3 February 2003, 'Pigott Group, 3 February'.

230. Mr Ricketts informed Mr Chaplin on 4 February that he had agreed with Sir Michael Jay and Mr Ehrman that:

> "… the FCO should consolidate the lead we have already taken in this area [post-conflict issues] with the work that Dominick Chilcott has been doing under your supervision.
> "I am sure that this work will now grow fast, particularly with the prospect of the UK inheriting responsibility for a good slice of southern Iraq following a military conflict."[132]

231. Mr Bowen chaired a meeting in the Cabinet Office on 4 February, attended by the FCO, MOD and DFID, at which it was decided to set up an inter-departmental (FCO, MOD and DFID) unit, headed by an FCO official, Mr Chilcott, to "prepare for the aftermath in practical operational terms".[133] Wider strategy would continue to be co-ordinated through the AHGI.

232. In a letter to Mr Ehrman recording the outcome of the meeting, Mr Bowen explained that there was "a good deal of uncertainty about American intentions in administering Iraq in the event of (and after) hostilities to remove Saddam Hussein's regime". Meetings in Washington that week were likely to bring greater clarity but were unlikely to produce decisions.

233. Mr Bowen reported that the meeting had recognised that:

> "… even if some of the big strategic issues remained unresolved, a lot of detailed management issues were likely to arise. Much was likely to emanate from CENTCOM, which had the prospectively imminent task of administering a country whose leadership had been removed. With this in mind we agreed that we should set up an Iraq Operational Policy Unit with contributions from the FCO, DFID and MOD … My view was that we needed an integrated unit with high calibre representation to work through the sort of issues that would confront the Coalition on the 'day after'. Their initial remit would be to develop policy guidance to enable the administration of Iraq pending the appointment of a transitional civil administration, consistent as far as possible with the longer term vision for the future of Iraq. They would need to work their way, with the US, through issues as diverse as humanitarian relief, policing, administration of justice, local government and provision of utilities, environmental recovery and priorities for the return to normality. The view we all reached was that this unit ought to be up and running from Monday 10 February … It will need staff who think strategically and operationally and have some background in state reconstruction from other cases (in order to feed in the lessons of eg Kosovo and Afghanistan)."

[132] Minute Ricketts to Chaplin, 4 February 2003, 'Iraq: Day After Planning'.
[133] Letter Bowen to Ehrman, 5 February 2003, 'Iraq: Operational Policy Unit'.

234. Mr Bowen explained that the unit would work alongside the FCO consular and emergency units, and with the Defence Crisis Management Centre (DCMC) in the MOD and the Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department (CHAD) in DFID.

235. The Iraq Planning Unit (IPU), headed by Mr Dominick Chilcott, was established on 10 February.[134]

236. On 17 February, Sir Michael Jay sent draft terms of reference for the IPU to Sir Andrew Turnbull, the Cabinet Secretary, copied to Permanent Secretaries. The draft, which had already been discussed with DFID, the MOD and the Cabinet Office, stated:

> "The unit will operate within broad policy guidelines set by the Cabinet Office. In the FCO, it will report to the Director Middle East and North Africa Command [Mr Chaplin]. Its main customers will be British military planners in PJHQ, MOD and, mainly through them, British officers and officials seconded to the Pentagon and CENTCOM.
> "The main purpose of the unit will be to provide policy guidance on the practical questions that British civilian officials and military commanders will face, in the event of a conflict in Iraq. The advice will be designed to help them to minimise the suffering of the Iraqi people and to deal with the civil administration of any sector of Iraq under the control of British forces, particularly during the period before a transitional civilian administration is established. It will aim to ensure that British operational military planning for the post-conflict phase in Iraq is consistent with and promotes the UK's policy objectives on the future of Iraq. In doing so it will take particular account of the key role of the UN.
> "The unit will aim to bring influence to bear on US plans by providing similar guidance, through PJHQ and MOD, to seconded British personnel working within the US military planning machinery and through the Embassy to the NSC and other parts of the US Administration.
> "The unit will also provide a focus in Whitehall for developing policy advice and recommendations, as required, on strategic questions concerning a post Saddam Iraq.
> "The role of the unit will be reviewed in three months."[135]

237. The record of the 17 February meeting of the AHGI stated that the IPU had been formed initially "to meet a UK military planning need for detailed policy guidance on occupation issues".[136] In the event of UK participation in the occupation of Iraq it was likely to expand considerably.

[136] Minute Dodd to Manning, 17 February 2003, 'Ad Hoc Group on Iraq'.

238. The record of the next meeting, on 21 February, described the co-ordinating role of the AHGI:

> "… the Ad Hoc Group draws together work related to Iraq as follows:
>
> - Work on post-Saddam issues led by the Iraq Planning Unit. This includes the HMT [HM Treasury]-led sub-group on economic and financial issues;
> - Consular planning; and
> - HMT/CCS [Civil Contingencies Secretariat]-led domestic contingency planning (the Stephens Group).
> "AHGI receives updates on military and intelligence issues, but these issues are handled elsewhere. AHGI provides a forum for deciding how to cover any new Iraq-related issues. There is some read across from pre-existing DTI and HMT Whitehall groups looking at oil."[137]

239. After expressions of concern by Permanent Secretaries about the possible impact on the UK of war in Iraq, Sir Andrew Turnbull had agreed in January 2003 that the AHGI should conduct further work on domestic contingencies.[138]

240. Mr Chilcott told the Inquiry that, although numbers were small ("maybe only six, eight, ten, for the first couple of weeks"), the IPU drew on expertise elsewhere in Whitehall that allowed it to pull together a strategic view.[139] While military planners and PJHQ were planning what was needed as troops occupied territory and became "responsible … for the administration of where they were", the IPU was "thinking about the political process and the big issues about the development fund for Iraq or oil policy or what to do about war criminals or the importance of legitimacy and legal questions".

241. Asked how influential the IPU had been, Mr Chilcott stated:

> "… I don't think our main issue was having to convince other parts of the government machinery that they should be doing things that they didn't want to do.
>
> "I think we were really synthesising the views and expertise across government.
> "Where we needed to have clout … was in influencing the United States, and I think, there, we … had no more clout than a sort of body of middle to senior ranking British officials would have had with their American counterparts."[140]

242. Mr Chilcott warned against being "dazzled" by the IPU's late creation: "a lot of the work that the IPU was able to bring together in a more intense atmosphere had been going on for some time".[141] But he did accept that the IPU could have been set up sooner:

> "… one of the lessons is obviously you can't begin this sort of thinking too early, and although we did begin serious thinking about the day after in the preceding October … we could have created the IPU earlier. We could have had a greater sense of the reality of what we were doing. I think also, because it was contingency planning, because right up until the last moment we didn't know for sure that we were going to be involved in the military action, that maybe psychologically had an effect on us …"[142]

243. On the relationship with the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance (ORHA), Mr Chilcott said that: "ORHA in some ways weren't really our counterparts because they were the sort of operational implementers … as well as the drawers up of the plan, whereas we … were writing policy papers and briefing and lines to take."[143]

244. Mr Bowen told the Inquiry one reason for establishing the IPU was to set up a counterpart to ORHA: "as soon as we … understood where the centre of gravity was in America … we set up … a centre of gravity that could interact with it". At this early stage in the relationship, before misgivings about ORHA had begun to emerge in Whitehall, that seemed still to be the intention.

Decision-making machinery post-invasion

The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation

245. On 27 March, Mr Bowen sent Sir Andrew Turnbull a draft minute addressed to Mr Blair, recommending the creation of an "Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Reconstruction" chaired by Mr Straw.[144] Mr Bowen advised that he had opted for an ad hoc group because it was "inherently more flexible and less ponderous than a formal sub-group of DOP".

246. Sir Andrew Turnbull wrote to Sir Kevin Tebbit on 31 March, seeking his and, among others, Sir David Manning's agreement to a slightly revised version of the draft minute produced by Mr Bowen on 27 March.[145] Sir Andrew advised that the revised draft had already been agreed with Sir Michael Jay and Mr Chakrabarti.

247. The draft minute proposed:

> "… a new Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation reporting to you [Mr Blair]. The Foreign Secretary [Mr Straw] should chair … Its terms of reference would be: 'to formulate policy for the rehabilitation, reform and development of Iraq'."

248. The new Ministerial Group would be supported by an officials group, led by the Cabinet Office and including the Head of the IPU.

249. The Inquiry has not seen a final version of Sir Andrew Turnbull's minute.

250. Mr Chakrabarti wrote to Sir Andrew Turnbull on 1 April, confirming that the new groups proposed in Sir Andrew's draft minute to Mr Blair:

> "… seem the best way to take forward the detailed implications of any SCR's content, and what can be done before its passing … The key will be to agree very quickly on the work programme and to task those with the knowledge and experience in the subject areas to take the lead while consulting others with an interest in ensuring all the workstreams fit together into a coherent – and affordable – strategy. We must draw on the lessons learnt from other post-conflict situations such as Afghanistan, Kosovo, East Timor, Sierra Leone and Bosnia."

251. Sir Andrew Turnbull informed Mr Straw on 7 April that Mr Blair had agreed a new committee should be established "to formulate policy for the rehabilitation, reform and development of Iraq".[146] Mr Straw would chair; other members would be the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Defence Secretary, the International Development Secretary and the Trade and Industry Secretary. The committee would be supported by a group of officials, chaired by Mr Bowen.

252. Mr Straw chaired the first meeting of the Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq Rehabilitation (AHMGIR) on 10 April.[147]

The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq

253. In July 2004, the Butler Committee found:

> "… we are concerned that the informality and circumscribed character of the Government's procedures which we saw in the context of policy-making towards Iraq risks reducing the scope for informed collective political judgement."[148]

254. The Government accepted the Committee's conclusions, and said: "where a small group is brought together to work on operational military planning and developing the diplomatic strategy, in future such a group will operate formally as an ad hoc Cabinet Committee".[149]

255. The Ad Hoc Ministerial Group on Iraq (AHGI) met for the first time on 16 September 2004, chaired by Mr Blair.[150] It was established "to ensure the UK government approach to Iraq was fully co-ordinated in the period up to Iraqi elections in January 2005". Mr Blair intended that the Group should meet regularly.

256. Mr Blair wrote a note to his Private Secretary on 25 February 2005 instructing that Mr Straw be "put in charge" of the AHGI and asked to minute him each week with actions on "eg reconstruction in the South; Sunni outreach; progress on security plan".[151]

257. On 10 March, in his first meeting as Chair, Mr Straw explained that Mr Blair "had asked a core group of Ministers to meet on a weekly basis to focus more closely on the delivery of policy in Iraq".[152]

258. On 18 March, Mr Blair reminded Mr Quarrey: "I need J[ack] S[traw] to do me a note each week on progress (to keep him at it)."[153]

259. Mr Straw's first report to Mr Blair, dated 24 March, covered the first three meetings[154] of the AHGI.[155]

The Defence and Overseas Policy Committee (Iraq)

260. Sir Nigel Sheinwald told the Inquiry that the AHGI was set up "briefly" in order to "give extra urgency to Whitehall work ahead of the Iraqi elections".[156] That was "very complicated" and so, after the UK General Election in May 2005, arrangements were "simplified" and a new Committee was established.

261. The Iraq Sub-Committee of the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy (DOP(I)) met for the first time on 26 May 2005, chaired by Mr Blair.[157] It continued to meet until Mr Blair stood down as Prime Minister in June 2007.

262. DOP(I) replaced the AHGI, which ceased to meet.

NSID(OD)

263. After taking office as Prime Minister in June 2007, Mr Gordon Brown reorganised the structure of Cabinet Committees. Iraq fell within the remit of the Committee on National Security, International Relations and Development (NSID), and specifically its Overseas and Defence Sub-Committee (NSID(OD)).

264. The first scheduled meeting, on 19 July, was cancelled and NSID(OD) therefore met for the first time on 8 October.[158]

THE IRAQ STRATEGY GROUP

265. The Iraq Strategy Group (ISG) met from autumn 2003, chaired by Sir Nigel Sheinwald, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of OD Sec.

266. Sir Nigel described its function as "a strategy group that was trying to look at the big political, security and economic issues".[159]

THE IRAQ SENIOR OFFICIALS GROUP

267. The Iraq Senior Officials Group (ISOG) met on a monthly basis from autumn 2003, usually chaired by the Deputy Head of OD Sec. A record of the meeting was reported to Sir Nigel Sheinwald, who described its purpose as "senior officials looking at the more operational issues".[160]

268. Sir Nigel described both the ISG and the ISOG as "trying to feed into the Ministerial discussions which were taking place".

Introduction and key findings

1. This Section addresses the immediate impact of the attacks on the US on 11 September 2001 (9/11), and the way in which that shaped the context in which decisions on the policy towards Iraq were made.

2. UK policy on Iraq before September 2001 is addressed in Section 1.

3. The UK's concerns about the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and the risk of terrorists acquiring and using such weapons, which pre-dated the attacks on the US, and the Joint intelligence Committee (JIC) Assessments of that risk are addressed in Section 4. That Section also addresses the UK's assessments of Iraq's residual chemical, biological, nuclear and ballistic missile capabilities, its intent to preserve and enhance those capabilities, and the likelihood of proliferation from Iraq.

4. The roles and responsibilities of key individuals and bodies in the UK Government, including the JIC, are set out in Section 2.

Key findings

- After the attacks on the US on 9/11, Mr Blair declared that the UK would stand "shoulder to shoulder" with the US to defeat and eradicate international terrorism.
- Mr Blair took an active and leading role throughout the autumn of 2001 in building a coalition to act against that threat, including taking military action against the Taliban regime in Afghanistan.
- Mr Blair also emphasised the potential risk of terrorists acquiring and using a nuclear, biological or chemical weapon, and the dangers of inaction.
- In relation to Iraq, Mr Blair sought to influence US policy and prevent precipitate military action by the US, which he considered would undermine the success of the coalition which had been established for action against international terrorism. He recommended identifying an alternative policy which would command widespread international support.
- In December 2001, Mr Blair suggested a strategy for regime change in Iraq that would build over time, including "if necessary" taking military action without losing international support.
- The tactics chosen by Mr Blair were to emphasise the threat which Iraq might pose, rather than a more balanced consideration of both Iraq's capabilities and intent; and to offer the UK's support for President Bush in an effort to influence his decisions on how to proceed.
- That remained Mr Blair's approach in the months that followed.

UK policy on Iraq in early September 2001

5. Since the end of the Gulf Conflict in 1991, the international community had pursued a policy of "containment" towards Iraq. That was based on the provisions in a series of United Nations (UN) Security Council resolutions intended to prevent Iraq from developing WMD or threatening its neighbours and international peace and security.

6. The policy had a number of dimensions. Its key components were:

- a prohibition on the possession of WMD or long-range ballistic missiles, or programmes to develop such capabilities;
- an arms embargo;
- economic sanctions; and
- a strong deterrence component provided by US and UK forces stationed in the region enforcing the northern and southern No-Fly Zones (NFZs) and supporting the arms embargo and economic sanctions regime.

The UN Security Council

The UN Security Council is composed of five Permanent Members – China, France, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom and the United States; and ten non-permanent Member States, elected by the UN General Assembly for two-year terms and not eligible for immediate re-election.

The Presidency of the Security Council is held by the Member States of the Security Council in turn in the English alphabetical order of their names. Each President holds office for one calendar month.

Each Member State has one vote. Decisions on substantive matters, and the adoption of a Security Council resolution, require nine positive votes, without any of the five Permanent Members voting against the decision. That is usually described as the "veto" power held by the Permanent Members. Decisions on procedural matters are made by an affirmative vote of at least nine of the 15 Member States.

7. Throughout the 1990s, there were concerns about the willingness of President Saddam Hussein's regime to disarm in accordance with the obligations imposed by the UN.

8. After the election of May 1997, the Government had to deal with a series of confrontations between Iraq and the international community about the ability of inspectors from the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) to fulfil its remit, including difficulties over access to sites which Iraq had designated as Presidential palaces. Those events and the action in the UN Security Council, and by Mr Kofi Annan, UN Secretary-General from January 1997 to December 2006, to persuade Iraq to co-operate, are set out in Section 1.

9. It was widely assumed that Saddam Hussein had retained some of his chemical and biological capability and a small number of ballistic missiles which might be armed with chemical or biological warheads, and that he had aspirations to preserve and enhance his capabilities for the future.

10. The UK Government considered that a willingness to use force was an essential element of UK policy in persuading Saddam Hussein to co-operate.

11. For instance, in a statement to the House of Commons on 24 February 1998, Mr Blair stated that "nothing else" apart from "effective diplomacy and firm willingness to use force" would have changed Saddam Hussein's mind and produced a signed agreement with the UN:

> "Throughout the dispute, our aim has been a peaceful, diplomatic settlement. There was no desire on either side of the Atlantic to use force, but it was also clear to us throughout that Saddam Hussein only understands and respects force …
> "… As Kofi Annan said in Baghdad: 'You can achieve much by diplomacy, but you can achieve a lot more when diplomacy is backed by firmness and force.'
>
> "I would put it this way: with Saddam, diplomacy plus force equals success."[1]

12. Mr Blair concluded:

> "Saddam Hussein has spent seven years playing for time, but has been thwarted by the resolve of the international community. It is now clearer than ever that his games have to stop once and for all. If they do not, the consequences should be clear to all."[2]

13. Regime change became the officially-stated objective of US policy after the passage of the Iraq Liberation Act in October 1998.

14. Following further disputes about access for weapons inspectors and the withdrawal of the inspectors, the US and UK attacked a series of targets in Iraq in December 1998, in Operation Desert Fox. Its objective was described by Mr Blair as:

> "… to degrade the ability of Saddam Hussein to build and use weapons of mass destruction, including command and control and delivery systems, and to diminish the threat that Saddam Hussein poses to his neighbours by weakening his military capability."[3]

15. The impact of Operation Desert Fox is addressed in Section 4.1

16. In a press conference on 20 December 1998, Mr Blair explicitly ruled out a "land war in Iraq with literally hundreds of thousands of allied troops engaged" and called for a future strategy based on containment and stability for the region including a credible threat of force if Saddam posed a threat to the neighbourhood or developed WMD.[4]

17. By that stage, the Security Council was deeply divided on policy towards Iraq and the other three Permanent Members of the Security Council did not support the US and UK use of force.

18. A report on disarmament describing the work of UNSCOM since 1991 was sent to the Security Council on 25 January 1999.[5] That set out in three detailed annexes "material balances", for proscribed missiles, chemical and biological weapons, for which UNSCOM had been unable to account. Those were subsequently used by the UK as the basis for its estimates of the material Iraq might still retain.

Mr Blair's speech in Chicago, April 1999

In his speech to the Economic Club in Chicago of 22 April 1999 Mr Blair identified Saddam Hussein and Mr Slobodan Milošević, the President of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, as the cause of "many of our problems".[6]

That speech set out Mr Blair's thinking on a doctrine of the international community, including five principles for international intervention:

> "First, are we sure of our case? War is an imperfect instrument for righting humanitarian distress; but armed force is sometimes the only means of dealing with dictators.
>
> "Second, have we exhausted all diplomatic options? We should always give peace every chance, as we have in the case of Kosovo.
>
> "Third, on the basis of a practical assessment of the situation, are there military operations we can sensibly and prudently undertake?
>
> "Fourth, are we prepared for the long term? In the past, we talked too much of exit strategies. But having made a commitment we cannot simply walk away once the fight is over; better to stay with moderate numbers of troops than return for repeat performances with large numbers.
> "And finally, do we have national interests involved?"

Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the speech had been intended to set out the consequences of an interdependent world where countries would not be able to divorce their national interests from the impacts of security problems in other parts of the world.[7]

Ideas for the speech, which Sir Lawrence Freedman submitted in response to a request from Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, were set out in the attachment to Sir Lawrence's letter to Sir John Chilcot on 18 January 2010. The letter was published on the Inquiry's website.

19. UK policy towards Iraq was formally reviewed and agreed by the Defence and Overseas Policy Committee (DOP) in May 1999. The UK's policy objectives towards Iraq were defined as:

> "… in the short term, to reduce the threat Saddam [Hussein] poses to the region including by eliminating his weapons of mass destruction (WMD) programmes; and, in the longer term, to reintegrate a territorially intact Iraq as a law-abiding member of the international community."[8]

20. The policy of containment was seen as the "only viable way" to pursue those objectives. A "policy of trying to topple Saddam would command no useful international support". Iraq was unlikely to accept the package immediately but "might be persuaded to acquiesce eventually".

21. After prolonged discussion about the way ahead, the UN Security Council adopted resolution 1284 in December 1999, although France, Russia and China abstained.[9]

22. The resolution established:

- a new inspectorate, the United Nations Monitoring and Verification Commission (UNMOVIC), which Dr Hans Blix was subsequently appointed to lead;
- a timetable to identify and agree a work programme; and
- the principle that if the inspectors reported co-operation in key areas, that would lead to the suspension of economic sanctions.[10]

23. Iraq refused to accept the provisions of resolution 1284, including the re-admission of weapons inspectors. Concerns about Iraq's activities in the absence of inspectors increased.

24. The US Presidential election in November 2000 prompted a further UK review of the operation of the containment policy. There were concerns about how long the policy could be sustained and what it could achieve. That is addressed in detail in Section 1.2.

25. A JIC Assessment in October 2000, which assessed the prospects for Iraq after the death of Saddam Hussein, judged:

- There was "a significant risk of a period of violent factional and internecine strife amongst the Sunni elite followed by the emergence of a new military leader".
- "If the regime appeared weakened, the Kurds would be likely to try to re-establish control of the northern towns of Mosul and Kirkuk. But they would settle for consolidation of their autonomy rather than secession. The Shia would attack regime targets in the South, but they do not seek independence … Iraq's territorial integrity would be maintained."

- "Any new regime" was likely to be "autocratic and drawn from the Sunni elite". "Its policies and methods" were "unlikely to be different from Saddam's. Given Iraq's strategic interests in the Gulf, this will include a long-term desire for weapons of mass destruction."
- "Pressure would build internationally to end Iraq's pariah status and isolation. The level of pressure would reflect the extent to which the regime appeared to moderate its behaviour. But Iraq's political rehabilitation could be rapid, overwhelming any voices of caution from London, Washington or elsewhere."[11]

26. There were concerns over both the continued legal basis for operations in NFZs and the conduct of individual operations.[12]

27. A further Assessment on 1 November judged that Saddam Hussein felt "little pressure to negotiate over … resolution 1284 because the proceeds of oil smuggling and illicit trade have increased significantly this year, and more countries are increasing diplomatic contacts and trade with Iraq".[13]

28. The JIC also judged:

"Saddam would only contemplate co-operation with [resolution] 1284, and the return of inspectors … if it could be portrayed as a victory. He will not agree to co-operate unless:

- there is UN-agreed timetable for the lifting of sanctions. Saddam suspects that the US would not agree to sanctions lift while he remained in power;
- he is able to negotiate with the UN in advance to weaken the inspection provisions. His ambitions to rebuild Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programmes makes him hostile to intrusive inspections or any other constraints likely to be effective.

"Before accepting 1284, Saddam will try to obtain the abolition of the No-Fly Zones. He is also likely to demand that the US should abandon its stated aim to topple the Iraqi regime."

29. In November 2000, Mr Blair's "preferred option" was described as the implementation of 1284, enabling inspectors to return and sanctions to be suspended.[14]

30. In December 2000, the British Embassy in Washington reported growing pressure to change course from containment to military action to oust Saddam Hussein, but no decision to change policy or to begin military planning had been taken by President Clinton.[15]

31. The Key Judgements of a JIC Assessment in February 2001 included:

- There was "broad international consensus to maintain the arms embargo at least as long as Saddam remains in power. Saddam faces no economic pressure to accept … [resolution] 1284 because he is successfully undermining the economic sanctions regime."
- "Through abuse of the UN Oil-for-Food [OFF] programme and smuggling of oil and other goods" it was estimated that Saddam would "be able to appropriate in the region of $1.5bn to $1.8bn in cash and goods in 2001", and there was "scope for earning even more".
- "Iranian interdiction efforts" had "significantly reduced smuggling down the Gulf", but Saddam had "compensated by exploiting land routes to Turkey and Syria".
- "Most countries" believed that economic sanctions were "ineffective, counterproductive and should now be lifted. Without active enforcement, the economic sanctions regime" would "continue to erode".[16]

32. The Assessment also stated:

- Saddam needed funds "to maintain his military and security apparatus and secure its loyalty".
- Despite the availability of funds, Iraq had been slow to comply with UN recommendations on food allocation. Saddam needed "the Iraqi people to suffer to underpin his campaign against sanctions".
- Encouraged by the success of Iraq's border trade agreement with Turkey, "front-line states" were "not enforcing sanctions".
- There had been a "significant increase in the erosion of sanctions over the past six months".

33. There were differences of view within the UK Government about the benefits of in-country inspections, based on a concern that they could hand the initiative to Saddam Hussein without offering any substantive gains.[17]

34. The stated position of the UK Government in February 2001 was that containment had been broadly successful.[18]

35. When Mr Blair met President Bush at Camp David in late February 2001, the US and UK agreed on the need for a policy which was more widely supported in the Middle East region.[19] Mr Blair had concluded that public presentation needed to be improved. He suggested that the approach should be presented as a "deal" comprising four elements:

- do the right thing by the Iraqi people, with whom we have no quarrel;
- tighten weapons controls on Saddam;
- retain financial control on Saddam; and
- retain our ability to strike.

36. The UK's thinking was set out in a paper proposing a new policy framework, circulated by Mr John Sawers, Mr Blair's Private Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on 7 March 2001.[20] That comprised:

- The pursuit of a new sanctions regime to improve international support and incentivise Iraq's co-operation, narrowing and deepening the sanctions regime to focus only on prohibited items and at the same time improving financial controls to reduce the flow of illicit funds to Saddam Hussein, (so called "smarter sanctions").
- A renewed focus on human rights abuse by the Iraq regime; and a "contract with the Iraqi people", "setting out our goal of a peaceful law-abiding Iraq, fully reintegrated into the international community, with its people free to live in a society based on the rule of law, respect for human rights and economic freedom, and without threat of repression, torture and arbitrary arrest".
- The continued operation of the No-Fly Zones, but with patrolling set at levels which would minimise the risk to UK air crew.
- Iraqi compliance with resolution 1284 (1999). That would "remain one of our stated objectives (and retaining some incentives for Iraq to comply would be necessary to restore P5 [the five Permanent Members of the Security Council – China, France, Russia, the UK and the US] unity)".

37. The paper also stated that "the Iraqi regime's record and behaviour made it impossible for Iraq to meet the criteria for rejoining the international community without fundamental change".

38. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that one of the key elements of the policy was to seal Iraq's borders to make the sanctions regime more effective.[21]

39. During the summer of 2001 the UK had been exploring the way forward with the US, Russia and France on a draft Security Council resolution to put in place a "smart sanctions" regime:

- The US had agreed that a straight rollover of the Oil-for-Food (OFF) provisions would be seen as a defeat and supported reviving the UK's draft resolution. But it had not agreed the final form such a resolution should take.
- France had come to the broad conclusion that a rollover would strengthen the hawks in the US Administration. The UK draft resolution would be a starting point but French support was "tepid".
- Russia had set out its arguments about the defects of the UK draft but the FCO formed "the impression that the problems … were not insuperable".[22]

40. In the context of questions about the attitude towards Iraq in September 2001, Mr Blair emphasised that the nature of the Iraqi regime had made a difference to the nature of the WMD threat and that Saddam Hussein's "profoundly wicked" mindset "definitely impacted on our thinking".[23]

41. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that, until 11 September 2001, the UK had a policy of containment, but sanctions were eroding.[24] The policy was "partially successful", but it did not mean that Saddam Hussein was "not still developing his [prohibited] programmes".

The impact of 9/11

The immediate response to 9/11

42. On 11 September 2001 three aircraft were hijacked and flown into the twin towers of the World Trade Centre in New York and the Pentagon in Washington. A fourth hijacked aircraft crashed in Pennsylvania. The attacks were unprecedented and resulted in the largest ever loss of life from an enemy attack on the territory of the United States. Nearly 3,000 people died, including 67 British citizens.[25]

43. The UK's response to the attacks was to offer support to the US, including constructing an agenda for action against international terrorism and co-opting international support.

44. On 12 September Mr Blair wrote to President Bush advocating action before further catastrophes, including a suggestion that the Taliban regime in Afghanistan should be presented with a demand to yield Usama Bin Laden and close the Al Qaida camps.

45. In his statement following the attacks, Mr Blair stated that the democracies of the world must come together to defeat and eradicate mass terrorism.[26] It was:

> "… not a battle between the United States of America and terrorism, but between the free and democratic world and terrorism. We, therefore, here in Britain stand shoulder to shoulder with our American friends in this hour of tragedy, and we, like them, will not rest until this evil is driven from our world."

46. Describing the events of 11 September 2001, Mr Alastair Campbell, Mr Blair's Director of Communications and Strategy, recorded that after the discussion in the Cabinet Office Briefing Rooms (COBR), Mr Blair held a smaller meeting in No.10 with Mr Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary, and Mr Geoff Hoon, the Defence Secretary.[27] During the meeting Mr Blair asked them to work up "an international agenda which went beyond the US just hitting Afghanistan"; and stated that he intended to advise President Bush to issue an ultimatum to the Taliban to hand over Usama Bin Laden (UBL).

47. Mr Blair sent a Note to President Bush on 12 September setting out three goals to:

- bring to justice those responsible;
- construct an agenda for action against international terrorism; and
- co-opt the world's leading countries in support of action.[28]

48. Mr Blair wrote that action on the second and third goals should take place as soon as possible.

49. Action on the first goal might include presenting the Taliban with a demand to yield Usama Bin Laden and his associates and close their camps or "face guilt by complicity". That would have to be "decided on evidential and military grounds".

50. In considering the need for a political agenda, Mr Blair wrote:

> "[A]fter reflection, there will be many who ask: what is the next stage of this evil? What of their capacity to get hold of biological, chemical and other WMD? We know that there are countries and individuals trading in WMD and/or trying to acquire them. We need a range of sanctions and pressures to stop this.
> "Some of this will require action that some will baulk at. But we are better to act now and explain and justify our actions than let the day be put off until some further, perhaps even worse catastrophe occurs. And I believe this is a real possibility."

51. Mr Blair added: "It would also help in the Islamic world if we could find a way to revive the Middle East Peace Process."

52. Mr Blair stated that Russia and China would be crucial and that it was "time to put aside other geo-political differences and unite against a common enemy".

53. A copy of the Note was sent to Mr Hoon's Private Office, which was circulated to senior officials within the MOD.

54. In the context of evidence about Mr Blair's Note to President Bush of 28 July 2002 (see Section 3.3), Mr Powell told the Inquiry that Mr Blair:

> "… had a habit of writing notes, both internally and to President Clinton and to President Bush, on all sorts of subjects, because he found it better to put something in writing rather than simply talk about it orally and get it much more concretely and … in focused terms."[29]

55. The UN Security Council adopted resolution 1368 on 12 September which stated that the Security Council had:

> "Determined to combat by all means threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts,
>
> "Recognising the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence in accordance with the Charter".[30]

56. Condemning the attacks "as a threat to international peace and security" the Security Council called on:

- "all States to work together urgently to bring to justice the perpetrators, organisers and sponsors of these terrorist attacks" and stressed "that those responsible for aiding, supporting or harbouring the perpetrators, organisers and sponsors of these acts" would be "held accountable";
- "the international community to redouble their efforts to prevent and suppress terrorist acts …"; and expressed:

- "its readiness to take all necessary steps to respond to the terrorist attacks of 11 September 2001, and to combat all forms of terrorism, in accordance with its responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations".

57. In his statement to the House of Commons on 14 September, Mr Blair said that the events of 11 September had been a warning and that "we should act on the warning".[31] Terrorists would:

> "… if they could, go further and use chemical, biological and or even nuclear weapons of mass destruction. We know, also, that there are groups of people, occasionally states, who will trade the technology and capability of such weapons."

58. Mr Blair concluded:

> "We believe in reason, democracy and tolerance. These beliefs are the foundation of our civilised world. They are enduring, they have served us well, and as history has shown, we have been prepared to fight, when necessary, to defend them. The fanatics should know that we hold our beliefs every bit as strongly as they hold theirs, and now is the time to show it."

59. In response to an intervention from Mr Paul Marsden (Labour), who asked for caution in the light of reports from American sources that NATO bombing might occur in Sudan, Iraq, Iran, Syria and Afghanistan, Mr Blair replied that Mr Marsden and others:

> "… should not pay too much attention to some of the wilder pieces of speculation that inevitably are made at a time like this. It is important to recognise that the way in which the United States of America has proceeded so far is exactly right: in a calm and considered way, and in close consultation with allies such as ourselves."[32]

60. Mr Blair added that it was:

> "… important that … we base our identification of those responsible on proper evidence, but then that we are relentless in our pursuit of those responsible and bringing them to justice."

61. In the subsequent debate on international terrorism, Iraq was mentioned briefly by a number of speakers, including Mr Tam Dalyell (Labour), who argued that a generation in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East was "growing up absolutely to loathe the United States and Britain" and urged the Government to look again at "10 years of bombing of Iraq and sanctions".[33]

62. Asked when he had taken the decision that "we should be prepared to join the Americans in using force and that we should be prepared to use force ourselves" against Iraq, Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "I think I said in my statement of 14 September 2001 that I think this issue of WMD is going to take on a different meaning now. Of course the Americans had already a policy of regime change. That was a policy in fact articulated by President Clinton, passed in 1998 following the military action we took in Iraq, US and UK in 1998. So it was obviously going to be on the agenda. I was always going to make it clear and did make it clear we would be shoulder to shoulder with America in dealing with these threats after September 11th. So how we were to deal with that would be an open question. That we were going to deal with it I think was pretty clear from that moment on."[34]

63. Following the attacks, President Bush determined that the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, which was harbouring Al Qaida, should be the priority for the US Administration in what it called a war on terrorism.

64. In the context of a possible Phase 2 of that war, President Bush also ordered the US Defense Department to be ready to deal with Iraq if it acted against US interests.

65. On 15 September the British Embassy Washington reported to London that the US now looked at the world through a new prism: US policy towards Iraq would harden, especially if any evidence emerged which linked Saddam Hussein to the terrorists.[35] The "regime-change hawks" in Washington were arguing that a coalition put together for one purpose [against international terrorism] could be used to clear up other problems in the region.

66. President Bush convened a meeting of his national security team at Camp David on 15 September.[36] The team included Vice President Dick Cheney, Mr Colin Powell (US Secretary of State), Mr Donald Rumsfeld (US Secretary of Defense), Mr George Tenet (Director of Central Intelligence), Dr Condoleezza Rice (US National Security Advisor) and Mr Paul Wolfowitz (Deputy Secretary of Defense).

67. The National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, the 9/11 Commission, reported that:

- President Bush had wondered immediately after the attack whether Saddam Hussein's regime might have had a hand in it; and that he had also thought about Iran.
- On the afternoon of 11 September, Secretary Rumsfeld had instructed General Myers, the Vice-Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that the US response should consider a wide range of options and possibilities; and said that his instinct was to hit Saddam Hussein at the same time – not only Usama Bin Laden.[37]

68. Dr Rice told the Commission that the US Administration had been concerned that Iraq would take advantage of the 9/11 attacks. She recalled that, in the first Camp David session chaired by the President, Mr Rumsfeld had asked what the Administration should do about Iraq; and that Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz had made the case for striking Iraq during "this round" of the war on terrorism.

69. Dr Rice also told the Commission that a Department of Defense (DoD) briefing paper for the meeting, on the strategic concept for the war on terrorism, had specified three priority targets for initial action: Al Qaida, the Taliban, and Iraq. The paper had argued that Al Qaida and Iraq both posed a strategic threat to the United States, citing Iraq's long-standing involvement in terrorism and its interest in weapons of mass of destruction.

70. Secretary Powell told the Commission that: "Paul [Wolfowitz] was always of the view that Iraq was a problem that had to be dealt with … And he saw this as one way of using this event as a way to deal with the Iraq problem." President Bush saw Afghanistan as the priority.

71. In his memoir, Decision Points, President Bush recorded:

- Secretary Rumsfeld had said: "Dealing with Iraq would show a major commitment to antiterrorism."
- Secretary Powell had cautioned against it and Mr Tenet had agreed.
- Vice President Cheney had "understood the threat of Saddam Hussein and believed we had to address it. But now is not a good time to do it … We would lose our momentum."[38]

72. Mr Tenet wrote:

> "When an informal vote was taken on whether to include Iraq in our immediate response plans, the principals voted four to zero against it, with Don Rumsfeld abstaining."[39]

73. According to his memoir, President Bush took the decision on 16 September that:

> "Unless I received definitive evidence tying Saddam Hussein to the 9/11 plot, I would work to resolve the Iraq problem diplomatically. I hoped unified pressure by the world might compel Saddam to meet his international obligations. The best way to show him we were serious was to succeed in Afghanistan."[40]

74. Dr Rice told the 9/11 Commission that President Bush had called her that day to say the focus would be on Afghanistan, although he still wanted plans for Iraq should the country take some action or the US Administration eventually determine that it had been involved in the 9/11 attacks.[41]

75. The 9/11 Commission reported that there was some further discussion of Phase 2 of the war on terrorism, at a meeting in Washington of the National Security Council on 17 September. President Bush had ordered the Defense Department to be ready to deal with Iraq if Baghdad acted against US interests, with plans to include possibly occupying Iraqi oilfields. Within the Pentagon, Mr Wolfowitz had continued to press the case for dealing with Iraq.

76. Secretary Rumsfeld provided guidance on 19 September to US commanders working on their contingency plans.

77. The Commission reported that General Tommy Franks, Commander in Chief CENTCOM (US Central Command), told them that he:

> "… recalled receiving Rumsfeld's guidance that each regional commander should assess what these plans meant for his area of responsibility. He [Franks] knew he would soon be striking the Taliban and Al Qaida in Afghanistan. But, he told us, he now wondered how that action was connected to what might be needed to be done in Somalia, Yemen or Iraq. The CENTCOM commander told us he renewed his appeal for further military planning to respond to Iraqi moves shortly after 9/11 … Franks said that President Bush again turned down the request."

78. The JIC assessed on 18 September that the attacks on 11 September had set a new benchmark for terrorist atrocity and terrorists seeking comparable impact might use chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear (CBRN) devices. But only Islamic extremists such as those who shared Usama Bin Laden's agenda had the motivation to pursue attacks with the deliberate aim of causing maximum casualties.

79. The potential threat to UK interests would be higher the more closely the UK was identified with the US.

80. Following a request from Mr Blair, for a reassessment of the nature and scale of the threat posed to the UK by terrorism and the contingency plans for dealing with it, the JIC considered whether the scale and nature of the terrorist threat to the UK had changed.[42]

[41] Final Report of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States. The 9/11 Commission Report. Norton. Page 335.
[42] Minutes, 14 September 2001, JIC meeting.

81. The Assessment, issued on 18 September, considered whether the attacks of 11 September changed the nature and scale of the terrorist threat to the UK, and its potential vulnerability to major terrorist attack, and "the current and immediately foreseeable threat in terms of the intention and capability of known terrorist groups".[43] The Assessment assumed that there would be "a continuation of the current political circumstances in which the UK is closely identified with the US".

82. The JIC's Key Judgements included:

- The attacks had "set a new benchmark for terrorist atrocity. The level of destruction and the public impact are unprecedented."
- "Terrorists seeking comparable impact may try to use chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear devices …"
- The "potential scope for terrorist attacks" was "very wide": "But in order to assess the threat to the UK, we need to consider both the capabilities and the intentions of the terrorist groups."
- "Only Islamic extremists such as those who shared Usama Bin Laden's agenda currently have the motivation to pursue" attacks "with the deliberate aim of causing maximum casualties". The more closely the UK was identified with the US, "the higher the potential threat" to UK interests "both here and overseas".
- Major attacks like those of 11 September required considerable planning and were "therefore likely to remain relatively infrequent".

83. The development of the JIC position on the risk of terrorists acquiring and using CBRN is addressed in Section 4.

84. On 20 September, Mr Blair advised President Bush to "take our time to see whether we could build up the case against Iraq or other countries" before acting.

85. Mr Blair attended a memorial service for British victims of the 9/11 attacks on the World Trade Centre in New York on 20 September, and subsequently travelled to Washington to meet President Bush.[44]

86. In relation to suggestions then circulating in the US that Iraq was behind the 9/11 attacks, the record states that Mr Blair told President Bush there was no doubt that Saddam Hussein was evil:

> "But before any action was taken against him, we would need to be very sure indeed that there was compelling evidence. It would be best to deal with Afghanistan initially and then take our time to see whether we could build up the case against Iraq or other countries."[45]

87. Mr Blair added that there was very wide international support for a careful and considered US approach. It was sometimes frustrating to work with a coalition, but its support was a crucial investment.

88. Citing the US National Security Council's record of the meeting between President Bush and Mr Blair, the 9/11 Commission wrote:

"When Blair asked about Iraq, the President replied that Iraq was not the immediate problem. Some members of his administration, he commented, had expressed a different view, but he was the one responsible for making the decisions."[46]

89. Mr Campbell wrote in his diaries that President Bush had said the focus was on Usama Bin Laden and the Taliban: "But he also talked about how they could go after Saddam's oilfields."[47]

90. Mr Jonathan Powell, Mr Blair's Chief of Staff, told the Inquiry that President Bush had agreed: "the focus would be on Afghanistan and Al Qaida".[48]

91. Sir Christopher Meyer, British Ambassador to the United States from 2001 to February 2003, told the Inquiry that Mr Blair had sent a message to President Bush:

"… setting out his views on what needed to be done and he argued very strongly for a laser-like focus on Al Qaida and Afghanistan. By the time he got to Washington … the door was already open. He didn't have to argue the case."[49]

92. In a speech to Congress, President Bush set out the US determination to fight a war against terrorism by every means at its disposal.

93. That included an ultimatum to the Taliban regime in Afghanistan to give up the leaders of Al Qaida and close its training camps.

94. Addressing the US Congress on 20 September, President Bush stated that the US had "no truer friend than Great Britain" and thanked Mr Blair for crossing the "ocean to show his unity of purpose".[50]

95. President Bush stated that the evidence for responsibility for the attacks on 11 September pointed to "a collection of loosely affiliated terrorist organizations" known as Al Qaida, which was also linked to "many other organizations in different countries". Al Qaida had "great influence" in Afghanistan, and supported the Taliban regime.

96. President Bush condemned the Taliban regime for "aiding and abetting murder", and demanded that it should:

> "Deliver to United States authorities all the leaders of Al Qaida who hide in your land … Release all foreign nationals … Protect foreign journalists, diplomats and aid workers … Close immediately and permanently every terrorist training camp in Afghanistan, and hand over every terrorist, and every person in their support structure, to appropriate authorities … Give the United States full access to terrorist training camps, so we can make sure they are no longer operating.
>
> "These demands are not open to negotiation … The Taliban must act, and act immediately. They will hand over the terrorists, or they will share in their fate."

97. President Bush stated:

> "Our war on terror begins with Al Qaida, but it does not end there. It will not end until every terrorist group of global reach has been found, stopped, and defeated.
>
>
> "… How will we fight and win this war? We will direct every resource at our command – every means of diplomacy, every tool of intelligence, every instrument of law enforcement, every financial influence, and every necessary instrument of war – to the disruption and to the defeat of the global terror network.
>
> "This war will not be like the war against Iraq a decade ago … It will not look like the air war above Kosovo …
> "Our response involves far more than instant retaliation and isolated strikes. Americans should not expect one battle, but a lengthy campaign, unlike any other we have ever seen … And we will pursue nations that provide aid or safe haven to terrorism. Every nation … now has a decision to make. Either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists … From this day forward, any nation that continues to harbour or support terrorism will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime."

98. The attacks on 11 September 2001 fundamentally changed the context within which the US Administration and the UK Government viewed policy towards Iraq.

99. Secretary Rumsfeld recorded that President Bush had first asked him to "look at the shape of our military plans on Iraq" on 26 September; and had said that the options should be "creative".[51]

---

[51] Rumsfeld D. Known and Unknown: A Memoir. Sentinel, 2011.

100. Secretary Rumsfeld ordered a review of existing US war plans for Iraq on 29 September.[52]

101. Subsequent accounts by key members of the US Administration set out how they considered the context for US policy on Iraq had changed following the attacks.

102. In remarks to the press at the White House during Mr Blair's visit on 31 January 2003, President Bush said:

> "After September the 11th, the doctrine of containment just doesn't hold any water … My vision shifted dramatically after September the 11th, because I now realize the stakes. I realize the world has changed."[53]

103. In his memoir President Bush wrote that the "lack of a serious response" to previous Al Qaida attacks had been interpreted:

> "… as a sign of weakness and an invitation to attempt more brazen attacks … After 9/11, I was determined to change that impression."[54]

104. Describing the impact of the attacks on his view on Iraq, President Bush wrote:

> "Then 9/11 hit, and we had to take a fresh look at every threat in the world. There were state sponsors of terror. There were sworn enemies of America. There were hostile governments that threatened their neighbors. There were nations that violated international demands. There were dictators who repressed their people. And there were regimes that pursued WMD. Iraq combined all those threats …
>
>
> "Before 9/11, Saddam was a problem America might have been able to manage. Through the lens of the post-9/11 world, my view changed … I could only imagine the destruction possible if an enemy dictator passed his WMD to terrorists. With threats flowing into the Oval Office daily – many of them about chemical, biological or nuclear weapons – that seemed like a frighteningly real possibility … The lesson of 9/11 was that if we waited for a danger to fully materialize, we would have waited too long. I reached a decision: We would confront the threat from Iraq, one way or another."

105. Dr Rice wrote that after 9/11:

> "No security issue ever looked quite the same again, and every day our overwhelming preoccupation was to avoid another attack … Our entire concept of what constituted security had been shaken."[55]

106. Mr Tenet wrote:

> "After 9/11, everything changed. Many foreign policy issues were now viewed through the prism of smoke rising from the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. For many in the Bush administration, Iraq was unfinished business. They seized on the emotional impact of 9/11 and created a psychological connection between the failure to act decisively against Al Qaida and the danger posed by Iraq's WMD programs. The message was: We can never afford to be surprised again … we might wake up one day to find that Saddam possessed a nuclear weapon, and then our ability to deal with him would take on an entirely different cast.
> "… it seemed a given that the United States had not done enough to stop Al Qaida … and had paid an enormous price. Therefore … we could not allow ourselves to be in a similar situation in Iraq."[56]

107. Sir Peter Ricketts, Chairman of the JIC until September 2001 and subsequently FCO Political Director until July 2003, told the Inquiry that "through to 9/11, the dominant player [on Iraq policy in Washington] was the State Department"; but after 9/11 the dominant force changed.[57]

108. Sir David Manning, Mr Blair's Foreign Policy Adviser and Head of the Cabinet Office Overseas and Defence Secretariat (OD Sec), told the Inquiry that "Indefinite containment … looked increasingly implausible". After 9/11 the mood in Washington had "changed dramatically" and "tolerance for containment had changed".[58]

109. Mr Powell told the Inquiry that the US saw 9/11 as a "Pearl Harbour of the 21st Century"; they were being attacked at home and that made them "much more willing to be pre-emptive".[59]

110. Mr Straw told the Inquiry that 9/11 changed everything and that in his view "people in Europe still don't quite comprehend the degree".[60] Mr Straw added that the attacks led to a consensus across the world that a policy of tolerating failing or failed states was unacceptable. The perception of risk changed.

111. Mr Blair told the Inquiry:

> "… I think I would fairly describe our policy … as doing our best, hoping for the best, but with a different calculus of risk assessment … up to September 11, we thought there was a risk but we thought it was worth trying to contain it. The crucial thing after September 11 is that the calculus of risk changed."[61]

112. Mr Blair added: "after September 11, our view, the American view, changed dramatically".[62]

113. Mr Blair stated that his:

> "… primary consideration … was to send an absolutely powerful, clear and unremitting message that … if you were a regime engaged in WMD, you had to stop."[63]

114. In the UK, pursuit of agreement in the Security Council for improvements in the sanctions regime for Iraq was seen as key to both sustaining the policy of containment and to removing an impediment to securing a coalition for action against international terrorism.

115. The FCO proposed amending the UK draft resolution to address the perception that it imposed additional obligations on Iraq's neighbours to enforce sanctions.

116. The background to the UK's pursuit of an improved economic sanctions regime for Iraq is set out in Section 1.2.

117. Following a meeting to "discuss the options available for dealing with the UK's draft UNSCR [UN Security Council resolution} and the best way forward in the light of terrorist attack in the US", Mr Tom McKane, the Deputy Head of OD Sec, advised Sir David Manning:

> "The Cabinet Office Assessments Staff reported that Saddam Hussein was comfortable and in control. He had no desire for a confrontation but could change his stance if the security situation changed in the North or if a new resolution was passed which brought with it tighter controls on imports and exports. Currently his position is not being challenged …
> "… there was no intelligence of an Iraqi link to the terrorist attacks in the US last week. But the Iraqis were nervous of being blamed for the attack. There were indications of the dispersal of Iraqi military assets. Saddam Hussein had urged the US to exercise restraint."[64]

118. Mr McKane added that there had been diplomatic activity over the summer to explore options. In relation to the end of November deadline for the renewal of the sanctions regime authorised by resolution 1360 in July 2001, the US had supported reviving the UK draft "smart sanctions" resolution. But Mr McKane advised that "it was doubtful in current circumstances whether they [the US] would be willing to throw much weight behind it, particularly with the Russians".

119. Mr McKane reported that officials had agreed that a revised draft resolution, which "dropped the proposals to tighten existing controls and the references to neighbouring states", was the option "most likely to succeed in building a consensus". He added:

> "In practice, there was no realistic prospect of tightening the existing controls at the present time, though we should return to this at a later date."

120. Mr William Patey, Head FCO Middle East Department, advised Mr Straw:

> "In the context of building the broadest possible coalition for a sustained attack on terrorism we need to address some of the wider concerns about our Iraq policy …
>
> "The main objection to the current proposals is the perception that they impose additional obligations on neighbouring states by putting the onus on them for enforcing sanctions on Iraq. The reality is that our draft resolution does not impose any new obligations on neighbouring states … These tightening provisions were mainly window dressing. We would not lose a great deal in reality by removing the provision relating to neighbouring states although it would increase the presentational difficulties for the US.
> "… we would undermine the Russian and other objections, and increase the prospects for consensus in the Security Council. The unanimous backing … for a Goods Review List is worth having. It would not remove the existing obligations on neighbouring states or the international community as a whole … This would not be easy to sell … but the alternative is a weakening of containment through growing sanctions busting and the withering away of existing controls on Iraq. This would leave us with little to fall back on, other than excessive reliance on military force, which in turn would undermine our ability to maintain a coalition against terrorism."[65]

121. Mr Alan Goulty, FCO Director Middle East and North Africa, commented:

> "If this approach is to be tried we should tackle the Americans soon. The key argument is that progress on Iraq will help coalition-building. But that will be hard to sell to the Washington hawks, especially in the Pentagon."[66]

122. Mr Straw's Private Office responded that he agreed with the proposed way forward set out in Mr Patey's advice, subject to any views which Sir David Manning might have and the need for it to be worked through with senior members of the US Administration.[67]

123. Sir David and Mr McKane were sent copies of the exchange.

124. Mr Blair's speech to the Labour Party Conference on 2 October 2001 provides a clear indication of Mr Blair's thinking and approach, including: the need for the international community to come together to act to address terrorism; the dangers of inaction; and the failure of the Taliban to respond to the ultimatum to surrender Usama Bin Laden and his followers.

125. Mr Blair did not mention Iraq in his speech, but many of the points he made about Afghanistan appeared in later speeches about Iraq.

126. In a speech addressing the Assembly on Terrorism on 1 October, Mr Annan stated that, after the attacks of 11 September, "no one can dispute the nature of the terrorist threat, nor the need to meet it with a global response". He added that that would require:

> "… Member States to live up to their responsibilities under international law. They must deal firmly with the reality of armed groups and other non-State actors who refuse to respect common principles of human dignity.
> "It is hard to imagine how the tragedy of 11 September could have been worse. Yet, the truth is that a single attack involving a nuclear or biological weapon could have killed millions … The greatest danger arises from a non-State group – or even an individual – acquiring and using a nuclear, biological, or chemical weapon. Such a weapon could be delivered without the need for any missile or any other sophisticated delivery system."[68]

127. Mr Blair set out his vision for the world after the events of 9/11 in his speech to the Labour Party Conference on 2 October 2001:

> "It [9/11] was a tragedy. An act of evil. From this nation, goes our deepest sympathy and prayers for the victims and our profound solidarity with the American people.
>
> "We were with you at the first, we will stay with you to the last."[69]

128. Of the relatives of those who died, Mr Blair said:

> "They don't want revenge. They want something better in memory of their loved ones.

"I believe their memorial can and should be greater than simply the punishment of the guilty. It is that out of the shadow of this evil, should emerge lasting good: destruction of the machinery of terrorism … hope amongst all nations of a new beginning … so that people everywhere can see the chance of a better future through the hard work and creative power of the free citizen, not the violence and savagery of the fanatic."

129. Setting out his thoughts on the way ahead, Mr Blair stated:

"I know that here in Britain people are anxious … People know we must act but they worry about what might follow …

"Whatever the dangers of the action we take, the dangers of inaction are far, far greater …

"So what do we do? … Look for a diplomatic solution. There is no diplomacy with Bin Laden or the Taliban regime.

"State an ultimatum and get their response. We stated an ultimatum; they haven't responded …

"There is no compromise possible with such people … Just a choice: defeat it or be defeated by it. And defeat it we must …

"I say to the Taliban: surrender the terrorists; or surrender power. It's your choice …"

130. Mr Blair added:

"I have long believed … interdependence defines the new world we live in. People say: we are only acting because it's the USA that was attacked. Double standards, they say. But when Milošević embarked on the ethnic cleansing of Muslims in Kosovo, we acted.

"… if Rwanda happened again today … we would have a moral duty to act there also. We were there in Sierra Leone …

"We can't do it all. Neither can the Americans.

"But the power of the international community could, together, if it chose to.

"… our self-interest and our mutual interests are today inextricably woven together. This is the politics of globalisation …

"This is a moment to seize. The kaleidoscope has been shaken. The pieces are in flux. Soon they will settle again. Before they do, let us re-order this world around us …

> "By the strength of our common endeavour we achieve more together than we can alone.
> "For those people who lost their lives on September 11 and those that mourn them; now is the time for the strength to build that community. Let that be their memorial."

131. Commenting on the impact of Mr Blair's speech on 2 October, and in particular the reference to being with the US at the first and staying with them to the last, Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry that, in the weeks after 9/11, Mr Blair's:

> "… reputation … was sealed … The man above all other Europeans … who expressed his sympathy for, support for the United States of America in its hour of need with unparalleled eloquence.
>
> "That speech, and that particular phrase … resonated enormously around the United States."[70]

132. Military action in Afghanistan began on 7 October.

133. A UK Government document on the responsibility for the attacks on the US on 11 September was issued by No.10 on 4 October.[71]

The October 2001 "dossier"

On 4 October 2001, No.10 issued a document setting out its conclusions on responsibility for the attacks in the US on 11 September.[72]

The document made clear that it was, in part, based on intelligence and stated:

> "The details of some aspects cannot be given, but the facts are clear from the intelligence.
> "The document does not contain the totality of the material known to HMG, given the continuing and absolute need to protect intelligence sources."

On the basis of the information and intelligence available, the Government was "confident of its conclusions" that:

> "Usama Bin Laden and Al Qaida, the terrorist network which he heads, planned and carried out the atrocities on 11 September 2001;
>
> "Usama Bin Laden and Al Qaida retain the will and resources to carry out further atrocities;
> "the United Kingdom, and United Kingdom nationals are potential targets; and

> "Usama Bin Laden and Al Qaida were able to commit these atrocities because of their close alliance with the Taliban regime [in Afghanistan], which allowed them to operate with impunity in pursuing their terrorist activity."
>
> The document also stated that:
> - "[F]rom the early 1990s", Al Qaida had "sought to acquire nuclear and chemical materials for use as terrorist weapons".
> - In June 2001, the US had warned the Taliban that "it had the right to defend itself and that it would hold the regime responsible for attacks against US citizens by terrorists sheltered in Afghanistan".
> - The "Taliban regime had responded by saying no evidence existed against Usama Bin Laden, and that neither he nor his network would be expelled".
> - When asked in 1998 about obtaining chemical or nuclear weapons, Usama Bin Laden had said "acquiring such weapons for the defence of Muslims [was] a religious duty".

134. Mr Tim Dowse, Head of the FCO Non-Proliferation Department from January 2001 to November 2003, told the Inquiry that the issue of the dossier was "regarded as a rather successful action".[73]

135. The air campaign against the Taliban in Afghanistan began on 7 October.[74]

136. Concern that continuing speculation about further American military action against other states was undermining support for the campaign against Al Qaida led Mr Blair to try to influence President Bush to "deal with" Iraq at a later date, including suggesting that President Bush should avoid debate in public on the next steps until they knew what that might mean.

137. Following discussions with leaders in the Middle East, Mr Blair wrote to President Bush on 11 October about the military operation in Afghanistan and the pressures generated by the "War against Terrorism".[75] Mr Blair described "extending the war zone" and the Middle East Peace Process (MEPP) as the "top flashpoints".

138. Mr Blair wrote that it was time to move to the "next stage of the military operation [in Afghanistan]", and that it was "hard to see how we do this without removing the Taliban".

139. In a section headed "Extending War Aims", Mr Blair wrote that there was "a real willingness in the Middle East to get Saddam out but a total opposition to mixing this up with the current operation" in Afghanistan. The uncertainty caused by references to a "Phase 2" in the war on terrorism "seeming to extend to Iraq, Syria etc" was "really hurting … because it seems to confirm the UBL propaganda that this is West vs Arab".

140. Mr Blair added that he had:

> "… no doubt we need to deal with Saddam. But if we hit Iraq now, we would lose the Arab world, Russia, probably half the EU … I am sure we can devise a strategy for Saddam deliverable at a later date."

141. Mr Blair suggested that:

> "… in order to give ourselves space that we say:
>
> "Phase 1 is the military action focused on Afghanistan because it's there that the perpetrators of 11 September hide.
> "Phase 2 is the medium and longer term campaign against terrorism in all its forms. Of course we will discuss that … This kicks it away for the moment but leaves all options open. We just don't need it debated too freely in public until we know what exactly we want to do; and how we can do it."

142. Mr Blair concluded that a "dedicated tightly knit propaganda unit" was required, and suggested that he and President Bush should "talk soon".

143. In a telephone conversation on 17 October, mainly about Afghanistan, Mr Blair and President Bush discussed the recent anthrax attacks on the US and whether the source of the material might be Iraq.[76]

144. In his memoir, President Bush wrote that "One of the best intelligence services in Europe" had told the US it suspected Iraq.[77]

145. On 19 October, US Special Forces landed in Afghanistan to link up with the CIA and Northern Alliance.[78]

146. Lord Wilson of Dinton, Cabinet Secretary from 1998 to September 2002, told the Inquiry that he thought Mr Blair had:

> "… played … an important part in dissuading them [the US] from any thoughts that 9/11 was connected with Iraq and dissuading them from taking any action against Iraq".[79]

147. Lord Wilson stated that international terrorism and the military action in Afghanistan was the major focus of the UK government at that time.[80]

148. By mid-October, discussions on a revised economic sanctions regime for Iraq had made little progress. Russia was seen as the main obstacle to agreement.

149. Following a visit by Mr Blair to Moscow, where there was no movement in the Russian position, Mr Simon McDonald, Mr Straw's Principal Private Secretary, wrote to Sir David Manning on 11 October stating:

> "The present position is not sustainable. Sanctions are eroding. Iraqi WMD programmes are continuing. The Security Council is divided."[81]

150. Mr McDonald recorded that another, simple Oil-for-Food rollover resolution would be seen as a victory for Saddam Hussein at the US and the UK's expense.

> "We need to convince them [the US] that uniting the Security Council on Iraq is a core component of building a coalition against terrorism, not a peripheral issue. We also need to head them off the temptation to take military action against Iraq which would fracture the coalition."

151. Sir David Manning discussed the UK's draft resolution, and the need for US help to persuade Russia to support it, with Dr Rice on 12 October. He reported that it was unlikely to be a priority for President Bush in his discussions with President Vladimir Putin, the President of Russia.[82]

152. Sir David and Dr Rice also discussed differences between the UK and the US about the scale of any response if a UK or US pilot was shot down in the No-Fly Zones.[83]

Operations in the No-Fly Zones

The UK had continuing concerns about the potential US response if a UK or US pilot enforcing the No-Fly Zones (NFZs) was shot down by Iraq.

UK operations in the No-Fly Zones had been reviewed twice in the previous two years, largely at the request of Mr Robin Cook, the previous Foreign Secretary, and Lord Williams of Mostyn, the Attorney General, and his successor Lord Goldsmith. Those reviews and the outcomes are considered in Section 1.2.

Mr McKane responded to a letter of 24 August from Mr David Brummell, the Legal Secretary to the Law Officers, on 16 October.[84] Mr McKane stated that, if the UK pulled out of the southern No-Fly Zone it would have to be explained; and that "could only be politically sustainable if couched on the basis that the Zone was no longer required, presumably because we judged that Saddam's behaviour and intent had shifted in a satisfactory direction".

Mr McKane added that it would be "very difficult" to maintain the northern Zone without the southern Zone; Turkey would be "unlikely, in a minority of one, to continue to facilitate" coalition patrols. Regular patrols of the northern Zone were "necessary" if lives were to be saved.

Mr McKane also wrote that nothing had happened to change the Ministerial conclusion earlier in the year that, if patrolling of the southern Zone ceased, "an unacceptably high risk" of "extreme humanitarian distress" would remain.

Mr McKane informed Sir David Manning that the MOD had been asked what would have to be done to ensure that Kuwait could be defended effectively if patrolling over the southern NFZ stopped. He suggested that "once the immediate crisis is over" the issue should be considered again; stopping patrolling in the Zones could "remove a major source of discomfort from our relations with the Arab world".[85]

At the Cabinet Office meeting on 30 October, the MOD reported that the US had "returned to normal operations over Iraq" but there were "fewer coalition patrols over a more restricted area (largely south and west of the Euphrates)".[86] Contingency plans in the event that a coalition aircraft was shot down were being discussed with the US.

In January 2002, Mr McKane reported that there had been no Iraqi violation of the southern No-Fly Zone since 11 September 2001, and that the last Allied bombing of an Iraq air defence target had taken place on 27 November 2001.[87] The MOD was "concerned about the risks to RAF aircrew" and considering whether "It might be necessary to attack air defence targets north of the 33rd parallel … in order to make it safe for such patrols to be resumed."

153. In late October, Sir Jeremy Greenstock advised that a damaging "vacuum" in collective policy towards Iraq was looming; a "clear long-term strategy" agreed with the US would be needed. The key elements included determining whether UNMOVIC had any genuine value and convincing the US that the UK would not support heavy military action against Iraq. The UK could not do nothing and allow "war against Iraq to become the only option by default".

154. Officials concluded that a revised draft resolution was the preferred option but, if that was not achievable, a rollover resolution would just sustain containment.

155. A paper written within the FCO on 24 October stated that the US was deliberately keeping open the option of coercive military action and US military Commanders in Chief had been "instructed … to work up contingency plans for dealing with terrorist targets within their area of responsibility".[88] The MOD was "trying to discover some of the detail".

156. In relation to Iraq, the FCO paper stated that it was:

> "The prime candidate for military action among US hawks and the only realistic target for coercive/punitive/regime-change military action (as opposed to targeted strikes). But such action would carry significant downsides in terms of alienating world opinion."

157. The FCO concluded:

"The US is in no mood to co-operate with Iraq. A likely option is to make specific demands backed up by threats of tougher action in the event of non-compliance. Whether this includes military action will depend on US judgements about the balance of advantage between the domestic pressures and the international ramifications of such actions."

158. Sir Jeremy Greenstock, UK Permanent Representative to the UN in New York, wrote to Sir David Manning on 29 October warning that the UK's draft resolution adapting the sanctions regime "looks unachievable this autumn, largely because of Russian obduracy and US unwillingness to exert sufficient pressure to move them".[89]

159. Sir Jeremy added:

"… there remains an urgent need for us to sort out a coherent strategy with the Americans, and at a level which binds in the whole Administration and not just the State Department. Our conversations with them recently … have not managed this. The WMD danger is too great to ignore. A vacuum not just in the Security Council, but also in our collective policy is looming. Most dangerously, the volume of talk … about the military option looks from here to risk real damage to our wider interests in the Middle East and our campaign against terrorism.

"In New York, there is widespread scepticism of the US/UK approach … The policy is seen not only as a failure, but also the foremost example of the double standards … in the Middle East. This corrodes support directly for sanctions … but also insidiously for our broader objectives on Afghanistan and terrorism. In the longer run, the failure of the Council to secure Iraqi compliance with the resolutions undermines its credibility more generally.

"We therefore need to think hard about a clear long-term strategy … to fill this vacuum (and to prevent the militarists doing so)."

160. Sir Jeremy set out the main elements for such a strategy, including:

- Drawing in the Russians on controlling Iraq's WMD and Saddam Hussein more generally.
- Exploring the possibility of restoring P5 unity, which would require thinking about the clarification of resolution 1284 (1999).
- Working out whether UNMOVIC had any genuine political value. The Americans did "not want a repeat of the UNSCOM problem, with Saddam calling the shots".

---

[89] Letter Greenstock to Manning, 29 October 2001, 'Iraq: Cabinet Office Meeting, 30 October'.

Sir Jeremy thought an "intensive capability" on the ground would be "an enormous asset" and that the US should be persuaded it was "worth paying a price for".

- "… perhaps most crucially, convincing the US that we will not support heavy military action against Iraq in the current circumstances. If the Americans do not buy into the strategy outlined above, then together we will have to think of another one. We cannot do nothing and allow war against Iraq to become the only option by default."[90]

161. The objectives should be:

- a "unified P5 approach to tackle Iraqi WMD, perhaps involving a negotiation to clarify but not renegotiate 1284";
- clear limits "to avoid the Russians demanding endless concessions to secure Iraqi cooperation"; and
- "reinvigorated action to tackle illegal Iraqi revenue".

162. Sir Jeremy wrote that he "remained surprised at the lack of US and UK activity to take on the Syrians over their pipeline".

163. Sir Jeremy concluded:

"Much of this deals with the US angle … The most immediate need is to have a dedicated discussion with them at a senior level in sufficient detail to thrash out the answers on the complex questions involved."

164. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that:

"As the US-led Coalition in Afghanistan began to deal effectively with the problems there, and as the US machine gathered itself to create firmer defences against any possible further terrorist attacks, we began to see that there was not much energy being expended in Washington on outreach, consultation and good relationships. Even before I heard of any serious action being taken to prepare for a possible attack on Iraq, I was coming to the conclusion that the United States was missing an opportunity …"[91]

165. FCO junior officials prepared a draft paper, 'Iraq: Fallback option' for a meeting on Iraq to be chaired by the Cabinet Office on 30 October, setting out the background to the differing positions of Iraq and of the P5 members of the Security Council.[92] Those included:

- Iraq's claims that resolution 1284 (1999) was so ambiguous that the US could easily deny that co-operation had been adequate to trigger suspension of sanctions;

[90] Letter Greenstock to Manning, 29 October 2001, 'Iraq: Cabinet Office Meeting, 30 October'.

- a Russian proposal to suspend sanctions in return for Iraq allowing weapons inspectors to return:
- a French preference to clarify the provisions of resolution 1284 – including:
  - definition of the key remaining disarmament tasks rather than leaving that right to UNMOVIC (the United Nations Monitoring, Verification, and Inspection Commission);
  - shortening the timetable for suspension of sanctions;
  - clarifying the trigger for suspension; and
  - defining the key differences pre- and post-suspension particularly in financial controls; and
- a prevalent view in the US Administration that resolution 1284 was best left unimplemented and UN weapons inspections were of limited value.

166. Against that background, the FCO recommended "a simple rollover resolution with a P5 statement of commitment to engage in serious discussion on how to tackle Iraqi WMD, within existing SCRs [Security Council resolutions] but including the clarification of ambiguities in SCR 1284".

167. The Cabinet Office meeting on 30 October discussed the wider approach to Iraq.[93]

168. Mr McKane reported to Sir David Manning that there was little change to Saddam Hussein's position:

- "Sanctions erosion continued with a near regular air service and up to 500,000 b/d [barrels per day] exported outside the oil for food regime. Saddam's efforts to acquire aluminium tubes and graphite for his nuclear/missile programmes showed his intention to continue to build up his WMD capability. His division of the country into semi-autonomous zones and his recent dispersal of military equipment, including from suspect CBW related sites, were indicative of contingency plans in case of coalition strikes. But there were no indications that he felt threatened."
- "Externally, Saddam maintained leverage over his neighbours through his oil exports."

169. Mr McKane stated that the US had agreed that the UK's draft resolution "remained the least bad option available" but there would be difficulties persuading Russia to support it. If that proved to be the case, the UK wanted to avoid a second veto. It would seek a P5 statement "of commitment to engage in serious discussion on Iraqi WMD, including clarification of UNSCR 1284". If that was not possible, a simple rollover resolution would be a setback: "But it would sustain containment, just."

---

[93] Minute McKane to Manning, 31 October 2001, 'Iraq'.

170. Sir David Manning continued to pursue the UK proposals for "smarter sanctions" in his contacts with Russia.[94]

171. Sir Jeremy Greenstock told the Inquiry that although the focus on Afghanistan and terrorism "overshadowed discussions on Iraq … there were intensive efforts … to re-establish P5, and especially Russian support, for a revised Goods Review List resolution".[95] That included three meetings between the Mr Straw and Mr Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, and discussion on the telephone between Mr Blair and President Putin.

172. Mr Patey told the Inquiry that there had been British efforts "to sweeten the deal for the Russians".[96]

173. Mr Blair met President Bush on 7 November, primarily to discuss Afghanistan.

174. Sir Christopher Meyer sent Mr Straw a letter, 'America after 11 September', on 5 November.[97] That drew attention to President Bush's anxiety about the anthrax attacks.

175. Commenting on the balance between multilateralism and unilateralism, Sir Christopher wrote that the US had a historic preference for "informal alliances and coalitions of the willing, over the sovereignty-limiting provisions of international conventions". The UN was "usually an exercise in damage limitation, save where the organisation can advance US interests, as in providing Article 51 cover to fight terrorism". The best Europe could hope for was "the continued predominance of mainstream pragmatists in the conduct of US foreign policy", but "even that" was "not guaranteed".

176. Sir Christopher added that Mr Blair, Mr Straw and Mr Hoon had leveraged UK popularity "brilliantly to influence the conduct of the war on terrorism". The "real test" of that influence would be "whether we can generate a recalibrated and more energetic US policy towards the Middle East, and stop the Americans doing something self-defeating in Iraq or elsewhere".

177. Sir Christopher concluded:

> "The Americans are very good at compartmentalising their sentimental and sincere affection for Britain from the single minded pursuit of national interest. It is a gap we have to close …"

178. Mr Blair visited Washington on 7 November for talks with President Bush, primarily about Afghanistan.[98]

179. Mr Blair gave President Bush a Note during their private meeting, which, under a section on 'International Initiatives', referred to the need for a new UN resolution on Iraq and a wider 'WMD Agreement'.[99]

180. The record of the meetings contains no information about discussions of Iraq.[100]

181. The Government has confirmed that a telephone conversation between Mr Blair and President Bush on 12 November did take place but it has been unable to find a record of the conversation.[101] Other papers indicate that the conversation focused primarily on Afghanistan.

182. In mid-November Mr Powell suggested that, after Afghanistan, the UK should use its leverage to engage President Bush on an alternative strategy to deal with the threat posed by terrorism, including the need to persuade the US to take the Middle East Peace Process seriously.

183. Mr Powell argued that only the removal of Saddam Hussein and a new regime would deal with the risks from Iraq.

184. Mr Powell envisaged that would be achieved by "proper backing" for the internal opposition in Iraq, not the insertion of arms inspectors or bombing Baghdad.

185. On 15 November Mr Powell wrote to Mr Blair stating that:

> "If we are successful in Afghanistan over the next few days and weeks there is a real danger that we will part company with the Americans on what comes next. The right wing of the Republican Party will want to carry on by bombing Iraq and Somalia. [President] Bush's natural tendency would be to support them unless presented with an alternative. David [Manning] has commissioned some work by the FCO on this, but I think it needs some lateral political thinking about what would provide an attractive – and effective – alternative strategy.
> "I think the first thing is to persuade the Americans that rather than repeating what we have done in Afghanistan elsewhere we need to use the leverage that our success in Afghanistan provides to achieve our aims elsewhere."[102]

186. On Iraq specifically, Mr Powell wrote:

> "… I think we need a new policy for Iraq. I do not believe that a warmed over UN Security Council resolution re-inserting arms inspectors and changing sanctions is likely to cut any ice with the Americans let alone the Russians and French … I think we need a completely fresh look at our policy starting from our objectives."

187. Mr Powell added:

> "It seems to me that our over-riding objective is the removal of Saddam not the insertion of arms inspectors. It is only with a new regime that we can be sure of an end to CBRN proliferation and an end to hostile intent towards his neighbours plus his support for terrorism. We need to make a far greater effort to bring him down […] with proper backing for internal opposition […]
>
> "There will be a military role, but bombing Baghdad is not the most obvious route to changing regime."

188. Mr Powell made a number of proposals for dealing with terrorists, including the need:

- for "much stronger domestic defence against future terrorist attacks";
- to stop the "martyrdom of UBL setting him up as … an inspiration to another wave of suicide bombers"; and
- to address political causes.

189. Mr Powell wrote: "Most importantly that means persuading the Americans to take the MEPP seriously."

190. Mr Powell concluded that Mr Blair should engage President Bush:

> "… on all this next week, and perhaps send him another note setting out the way forward before the Pentagon tries to take him off on another tangent".

191. Mr Blair replied: "I agree with this entirely and I should prepare a note for GWB [President Bush] next week."[103]

Resolution 1382

192. By late-November it was clear that agreement could not be reached on the UK draft resolution.

193. Resolution 1382, adopted on 29 November, was significantly less than the UK had originally sought.

194. Mr McKane wrote to Sir David Manning on 23 November, advising:

> "The UK draft does not now appear to have any realistic chance of being accepted by the Security Council."[104]

[104] Minute McKane to Manning, 23 November 2001, 'Iraq'.

195. Mr McKane identified two options:

- a further, simple rollover of the OFF resolution which "would do nothing to address the humanitarian position in Iraq or to stop erosion of the sanctions regime and would indicate that the approach to Iraq set out in SCR 1284 had hit the buffers"; and
- a compromise of a further rollover for six months with a commitment to revisit the items controlled under the Goods Review List (GRL).

196. The FCO preferred the second option, but with a two month, rather than six month rollover.

197. On 29 November, the Security Council unanimously adopted resolution 1382 extending the existing regime for 180 days and proposing a Goods Review List. The procedures for operating the List would be adopted "subject to any refinements … agreed by the Council", for implementation on 30 May 2002.[105]

198. The resolution also reaffirmed the Security Council's "commitment to a comprehensive settlement on the basis of the relevant resolutions … including any clarification necessary for the implementation of resolution 1284 (1999)".

President Bush's comments, 26 November 2001

199. On 26 November, President Bush called publicly for the readmission of weapons inspectors by Iraq.

200. In a press conference on 26 November, President Bush was asked what message he would like to send to Iraq. He responded that his message was:

> "… if you harbour a terrorist, you're a terrorist … If you develop weapons of mass destruction that you want to terrorize the world, you'll be held accountable … And I also have said … we're going to make sure that we accomplish each mission that we tackle. First things first."[106]

201. Asked whether agreement to allow weapons inspectors back into Iraq was an "unconditional demand", President Bush stated that Saddam Hussein needed to let weapons inspectors return to prove to the world that he was not developing weapons of mass destruction.

202. Asked what would be the consequences if Saddam did not, Mr Bush said: "That's up for – he'll find out."

203. Asked to confirm previous remarks that Afghanistan was "just the beginning", President Bush replied that he could not make it clearer that, if nations developed weapons of mass destruction "that will be used to terrorize nations, they will be held accountable".

204. Asked if the definition of terrorism was being expanded to countries like North Korea which did not just harbour terrorists but developed such weapons, President Bush stated:

> "… we want North Korea to allow inspectors in …
>
> "So part of the war on terror is to deny … weapons to be used for means of terror getting into the hands of nations that will use them.
>
> "… I've always had that definition, as far as I'm concerned."

205. Asked when and where President Bush had included any country that produced weapons of mass destruction in his definition of terrorist aiding states, Mr Ari Fleischer, President Bush's Press Secretary, suggested that referred to "the obvious and well-known fact that Iraq and North Korea" were already listed by the US State Department as state sponsors of terrorism.[107]

206. Mr Fleischer subsequently referred to concerns that Al Qaida or another terrorist organisation would seek to acquire nuclear weapons from Iraq or North Korea. That was "another way they would use nuclear weapons if they were to give them to another nation or an entity, a terrorist group like Al Qaida".

207. Following President Bush's remarks, speculation about the possibility of military action against Iraq immediately increased.

208. The British Embassy Washington commented that although the White House spokesman had described President Bush's remarks as a re-iteration of existing policy, they would fuel media speculation about a shift towards military moves towards Iraq.[108] In its public posture the US was keeping all options open.

209. In the Embassy's view, a debate behind closed doors indicated unresolved differences between different elements of the US Administration about the way ahead, including whether to support any of the opposition groups inside or outside Iraq as part of planning for regime change.

210. Asked about the meaning of President Bush's comments, Secretary Powell stated that the President had not said what he meant and he was "not going to prejudge what it might mean".[109] The only way to make sure Iraq was complying with the agreements "to give up all weapons of mass destruction activity" was to let the inspectors back in and allow them to do their work.

211. Asked if the term "he'll find out" was threatening, Secretary Powell stated that it should be seen "as a very sober, chilling message". There were "many options available to the international community and to the President".

212. Secretary Powell stated that the US had been pushing "smart sanctions". It had support from 14 of the 15 members of the Security Council, and he had been "working with the Russians to see if we can find a compromise that would satisfy the need".

213. Secretary Powell added that sanctions had kept the Iraqi regime "fairly well bottled up". Iraq was a "danger" and continued "to try to develop" weapons of mass destruction. The US would:

> "… keep the pressure on them to make sure these weapons do not become a serious threat to the region or to the world."

214. In the context of President Bush's remarks on 26 November, the British Embassy Washington reported that US officials in Washington and New York were discussing the draft resolution with Russian officials.[110]

215. Mr Ben Bradshaw, the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, told the House of Commons on 27 November that he did not think it was "helpful to speculate about the expansion of the current military campaign [in Afghanistan]":

> "People should not speculate about expanding the … campaign beyond Bin Laden and al-Qaeda … There is no evidence of any other state involvement … We have always made it clear that the military campaign is limited and specific."[111]

216. Asked specifically about Iraq and President Bush's remarks, Mr Bradshaw replied that Iraq "could very easily solve the problem by adhering to the demands" made by the UN. He reiterated that the military campaign was directed specifically at those responsible for "the mass murder of 11 September".[112]

217. In an interview in October, Mr Tariq Aziz, Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister, stated that Iraq would not allow weapons inspectors to return asking: "Why should they return?".[113]

218. Responding to a question on whether in the light of Iraq's rejection of the call to admit weapons inspectors there was a need to increase the pressure on Iraq and the next steps, Mr Fleischer stated on 27 November that the focus remained on the first phase of the war on terrorism.[114] He emphasised the US support for the discussion in the Security Council on more effective and narrowly defined sanctions.

219. Following discussions with senior US Senators, primarily about developments in Afghanistan, the British Embassy Washington reported on 29 November that Mr John Prescott, the Deputy Prime Minister, had been told there was "an overwhelming majority (80 votes) in the Senate in favour of taking out Saddam Hussein, as a piece of unfinished business".[115]

220. One Senator suggested that the military had a "very detailed plan", which he described as constituting precision bombing and Special Forces' support for internal uprisings. He "believed they had the capacity to decapitate Saddam Hussein. Preparations were well beyond the discussions stage."

221. The Senator also suggested that the decision to attack the Taliban in Afghanistan was "a feint: he [President Bush] had been offered the choice between Afghanistan and Iraq and had chosen to do the former first".

222. Another Senator had set out a strategy of "increased heat": with strengthened sanctions, the re-introduction of inspectors, and compiling evidence followed by military action. That Senator had said that if the UK could not agree with this it should be weighing in now with the Administration. It would be much more difficult for the US to go it alone than with the European allies in support. Other countries linked to international terrorism were not threats of the same order as Iraq.

223. The Embassy commented that the discussions offered "an interesting insight into the mood on the Hill". There was "no reason to believe" that either Senator spoke for the Administration or had privileged access to Pentagon plans; the military details did "not square with what we understand of military thinking".

224. On 1 December, the British Embassy Washington reported that public speculation about action against Iraq was moving faster than Administration thinking; and that the momentum in the debate had shifted in the direction of the hawks.[116] A Washington Post poll of 27 November had found that 78 percent of Americans favoured "having US forces take military action against Iraq to force Saddam Hussein from power".

225. The Embassy reported that, in addition, two new elements had emerged in comments from the Administration: an increased stress on the need for arms inspectors; and a clearer identification of WMD with the terrorist threat. The increased emphasis on weapons inspectors had been seen by some as a step towards military action – "a Taliban-like deadline"; others might see it as an alternative to unilateral action.

[116] Telegram 1631 Washington to FCO London, 1 December 2001, 'The Wider War against Terrorism: Iraq'.

226. In comments during an interview on CBS on 2 December, Secretary Powell stated explicitly that President Bush had not taken any decisions on what the next phase of the campaign against terrorism would be.[117] Moreover, none of the President's advisers, either individually or collectively, had yet made "recommendations … as to what we should do in the next phase" of the war on terror.

227. Secretary Powell stated that the US was "watching Iraq" because it had "always developed weapons of mass destruction that are a concern to us". Saddam Hussein had not been "as successful as he would have liked to have been" because sanctions and containment had been "effective".

228. Asked why the US did not just take Saddam Hussein out, Secretary Powell replied that President Bush would "make a judgement in due course" about how to "deal with the threat that continues to reside in Iraq". The way to keep the international community focused on the problem was to let the inspectors in. The US had not set a new deadline for compliance and President Bush retained all his options. If Saddam Hussein admitted inspectors he would be "complying with what he agreed to as his obligation under UN resolutions".

229. Secretary Powell added:

> "The United States still continues to believe as a separate matter that it would be better to have a different regime in Iraq and as you know, we have supported the efforts of opposition groups to begin organizing themselves for a change of regime in due course …
> "Regime change would be in the best interest of the Iraqi people. It is a goal of the United States. But the United Nations' goal is the inspectors and getting rid of those weapons of mass destruction."

230. In a separate interview on CNN, Secretary Powell stated that there was "no reason to believe" that Iraq had not continued its pursuit of weapons of mass destruction or that it had "abandoned their intent and desire to obtain such systems".[118] He observed that there were different kinds of weapons of mass destruction. The one which was of "the greatest concern" to him was "what might be happening with respect to biological weapons because it is much harder to detect that kind of activity".

231. Secretary Powell emphasised that President Bush had "not given away any of his authority to act in a way he believes is appropriate". The US had a policy, separate from UN policy, that "regime change would be good for the Iraqi people, good for the region". The US was "trying to find ways to make the Iraqi opposition more effective in this regard".

232. Asked if, as Senator Joe Lieberman had suggested, the Iraqi opposition could play the same role that the Northern Alliance had played in Afghanistan, Secretary Powell replied that was "not clear yet". He added that Iraq and Afghanistan were different countries with different situations and different kinds of military forces. The Northern Alliance "was a competent military force but needed the support of American air power". The Iraqi opposition did "not yet rise to that level".

233. It has subsequently been made public that President Bush asked for further advice on the military plans for Iraq in late November.

234. General Franks recorded that he was asked on 27 November to give Secretary Rumsfeld a "Commander's Concept".[119]

235. General Franks confirmed with Secretary Rumsfeld on 4 December that the assumed objective, dependent on the President's ultimate decision, would be to "remove the regime of Saddam Hussein".

236. President Bush wrote in his memoir that he had asked Secretary Rumsfeld to review the existing battle plans for Iraq in November 2001, adding: "We needed to develop the coercive half of coercive diplomacy."[120]

237. Secretary Rumsfeld wrote that when asked about involving the CIA in the planning, President Bush had said that:

> "… he didn't want me to communicate with people outside DoD for the time being, and that he would personally talk to Tenet and others at the right moment."[121]

238. Asked at what point the most senior levels of the US Administration had settled on the forcible removal of Saddam Hussein's regime as their primary objective, Sir Christopher Meyer told the Inquiry:

- Although he hadn't realised at the time, the anthrax scare had "really steamed up the Administration, because they thought the last person who had ever used anthrax aggressively was Saddam Hussein".
- Those who had been arguing that "there was a need to settle accounts with Saddam and do it fast, suddenly got much more traction with the President" before the end of 2001.
- The President himself had been "reinvigorated and found a real purpose for his Presidency … which had not been evident before 9/11 … Everything changed after 9/11."[122]

239. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that he knew from his conversations with Dr Rice that the "top players" in the US seemed to have been touched personally by the attacks and that they were "puzzled and deeply disturbed by the appearance of the anthrax that seemed to have been targeted against key members of the Administration".[123]

240. Mr Jonathan Powell told the Inquiry that after 9/11:

> "… American policy shifted relatively gradually … By the time you get to December [2001], you have speeches being made in the Senate calling for action on Iraq. We started sensing that something was happening."[124]

JIC Assessment, 28 November 2001: 'Iraq after September 11 – The Terrorist Threat'

241. The JIC assessed on 28 November that Iraq had no responsibility for, or foreknowledge of, the attacks against the US on 11 September 2001.

242. Saddam Hussein had ruled out terrorist attacks for the time being; in the medium term there was a credible threat against Western interests and regional states.

243. Practical co-operation between Iraq and Al Qaida was "unlikely"; and there was no "credible evidence of covert transfers of WMD-related technology and expertise to terrorist groups".

244. Iraq was "capable of constructing devices to disperse chemical or biological agent, or radiological material", but there was "no reliable intelligence of any Iraqi intent". If the regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse, WMD terrorism was possible but, in other circumstances, the threat would be "slight".

245. At the request of the FCO the JIC assessed Iraq's support for terrorism on 28 November.[125]

246. The minutes of the JIC record that the Assessment was "significant" and "it would be important to get its judgements and nuances right, given the importance of the policy debate that was going on with and within the US about what might or might not be done next in the campaign against terrorism".[126]

[125] JIC Assessment, 28 November 2001, 'Iraq after September 11 – The Terrorist Threat'.
[126] Minutes, 28 November 2001, JIC meeting.

247. The JIC Key Judgements stated:

- "On the basis of the information available … Iraq had no responsibility for, or foreknowledge of, the attacks in the US on 11 September … Nor is there any evidence, or intelligence, of an Iraqi role in the subsequent anthrax attacks."
- "Saddam has refused to permit any Al Qaida presence in Iraq …"
- "Iraq has long seen terrorism as a potential weapon in its conflict with the US and regional enemies […] Since September 11, however, Saddam is likely to have ruled out such attacks for the time being, for fear of a heavy US response."
- "But in the medium term the threat against Western interests and regional states remains credible. Saddam has not given up terrorism as a policy tool."
- Saddam Hussein "would consider":
    - "the assassination of key oppositionists if he felt threatened, most likely in the Middle East where there would be a greater chance of success and deniability …"
    - terrorist attacks on coalition forces and regional allies in the event of a major US attack which threatened his hold on power; and
    - "WMD terrorism, if his regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse. In other circumstances the threat of WMD terrorism is slight, because of the risk of US retaliation."[127]

248. Iraq had "provided finance, logistics and training to a range of secular terrorists and groups" in the 1970s and 1980s, and had "encouraged and sponsored terrorist groups to mount attacks on coalition targets" during the Gulf Conflict in 1990 to 1991, which had been "largely ineffective". Since then, Iraq had been "cautious in pursuing terrorist attacks abroad, lest it jeopardise the lifting of sanctions".

249. In "recent years", Saddam Hussein had:

> "… expanded his contact with terrorist groups to include Islamic extremists such as Hamas. In his rhetoric, he has referred more to Islam as he … sought to exploit the Palestinian issue in his conflict with the US, Kuwait and Saudi. But ideologically he is poles apart from the Sunni extremist networks linked to UBL; […] he is wary of allowing any presence in Iraq for fear of the radicalising effect on the population."

250. The evidence of contact between Iraq and UBL was "fragmentary and uncorroborated", including that Iraq had been in contact with Al Qaida for exploratory discussions on toxic materials in late 1988:

> "With common enemies … there was clearly scope for collaboration.

---

[127] JIC Assessment, 28 November 2001, 'Iraq after September 11 – The Terrorist Threat'.

"But there is no evidence that these contacts led to practical co-operation; we judge it unlikely because of mutual mistrust … There is no evidence UBL's organisation has ever had a presence in Iraq."

251. Since 11 September, Saddam Hussein had "felt under pressure" and "adopted a low profile":

"The current US focus on the war against terrorism would make a heavy response inevitable if Iraq mounted or sponsored a terrorist attack on Western or regional interests. Iraq would also pay a wider political price, losing the international support it derives from sanctions-related propaganda. We assess that Saddam is likely to have ruled out any terrorist attacks against the US or its allies for the time being."

252. The Assessment stated:

"Although the risks to Iraq have increased, we judge the regime is likely still to see terrorism as a tool of policy. Saddam may be currently constrained, but he hates the US and UK, and Kuwait and Saudi Arabia for their continued support to the West. In the medium term, therefore, the threat to Western and Gulf interests remains credible. Saddam is an opportunist. We judge he would be willing to use terrorism if he thought he could gain advantage or exact revenge … without attracting disproportionate retaliation. Saddam has miscalculated in the past and he could again misread the response his actions would attract."

253. Addressing what would happen if the US attacked Iraq, the Assessment stated:

- Iraq was "likely to consider terrorism as one of its few realistic options in response to a major US attack". It saw "no need to raise the stakes" in response to limited coalition action in the NFZs, and the Desert Fox campaign [in December 1998] was not "sufficiently damaging to justify the risk. But a longer campaign aimed at regime change could alter Saddam's calculations."
- Iraq would claim attacks against US targets were "acts of self-defence".
- It was "also possible that terrorist groups not previously aligned with Iraq would consider conducting terrorist attacks against the Western 'aggressors' …"
- "Overall … unless the Iraqi regime's hold on power was threatened, it would be unlikely to undertake or sponsor such terrorist attacks, for fear of provoking a more severe US response."

254. The Assessment concluded that "Iraqi capability and willingness to conduct WMD terrorism" was "not known with any certainty". The JIC judged Iraq was "capable of constructing devices to disperse chemical or biological agent, or radiological material", but it had "no reliable intelligence of any Iraqi intent. Nor did it have:

"… any credible evidence of covert transfers of WMD-related technology and expertise to terrorist groups, or of any Iraqi role in the anthrax attacks in the US.

> Iraq would have to consider the risk of US retaliation … On balance, we judge the threat of Iraqi WMD terrorism is slight, unless the regime was under serious and imminent threat of collapse."

Development of UK strategy on Iraq

Mr Powell's advice to Mr Blair, late November 2001

255. Mr Jonathan Powell drew the report of 26 November from the British Embassy Washington to Mr Blair's attention, commenting: "This is what I was talking about. We ought to have a brainstorming session."[128]

256. Mr Blair responded: "Get our own strategy ready."[129]

257. Sir Richard Dearlove, the Chief of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), wrote to Sir David Manning on 27 November, alerting him to a likely discussion about "Phase 2" of the "War against Terrorism" between US Principals[130] the following week. He suggested:

> "The end of this week would therefore be a very good moment for us to feed our thinking into the Washington machine at a variety of levels …"[131]

258. Copies of the letter were sent to the Private Offices of Mr Straw and Mr Hoon and to Sir Richard Wilson, Admiral Michael Boyce (Chief of the Defence Staff) and Sir John Kerr (FCO Permanent Under Secretary).

259. On 27 November, Sir David Manning wrote to Mr McKane: "You will now reconvene the group to look at Iraq again as a "Phase 2" issue."[132]

260. In the context of a discussion about Afghanistan on 28 November, Sir David Manning asked Dr Rice about progress in US thinking. His comment, that the UK was "giving a great deal of thought to Phase 2 issues and would want to share our ideas", was welcomed.[133]

261. Mr Powell produced a second note for Mr Blair advocating a strategy for regime change based on a demand for the return of inspectors and the use of military force to support an internal uprising, with public lines explaining why Iraq was a threat.

262. At the end of November, Mr Powell produced a second note for Mr Blair, 'Iraq: Change of Heart or Change of Regime', which elaborated the points in his earlier note.[134]

263. Mr Powell identified the "Objectives" as:

> "Removal of Saddam and replacement by a new, more moderate regime. Ending of WMD programmes and destruction of stocks. Ending of support for terrorism. Peace with neighbours."

264. Mr Powell envisaged a "Plan" comprising diplomatic pressure "followed by [a] military campaign (without large scale coalition ground forces)"; the insertion of inspectors which would not, "by itself, be sufficient to stop the campaign" which would end "only … with the replacement of Saddam".

265. Mr Powell set out three steps:

- Using the power of the example of US success in Afghanistan to increase pressure on Saddam". There were already signs that he was worried and might be "prepared to accept return of inspectors if he thinks [the] prospect[s] of attack are serious". The US should: "After the fall of Kandahar and the capture of UBL", make clear that "Iraq is next (in parallel with action in other countries, e.g. […])."
- The "US, UK and others" to "set up" a UN "demand" for the return of inspectors. If that did not happen, action would be taken. It would be "important not to be specific" about what the action would comprise nor "to set a deadline", and to keep Saddam Hussein guessing. If asked, the reply would be that "regime change would be desirable, but not our formal objective for the moment".
- Put in place, a military plan, and if Saddam failed to meet the demands, "there would be grounds to go ahead with the military plan … [reference to a possible coup]. Supported by air power and a small numbers of Special Forces in support roles. Need to be clear with everyone that this time we are going all the way …" If Saddam Hussein did allow the inspectors in, there would be a "need to find a new demand to justify military action".

266. Mr Powell identified a number of "Conditions", including:

- "[N]one of this will work unless we can isolate Saddam further in the international community".
- The need to secure support from Russia, France, the Middle East and Europe.
- Making progress "in parallel" on the MEPP. That would be: "Absolutely essential … or we will be accused – correctly – of double standards."

---

[134] Note Powell, [undated], 'Iraq: Change of Heart or Change of Regime'.

267. Mr Powell proposed "Public Lines" comprising:

> "Iraq a threat because of WMD capabilities and support of terrorist groups (do not try to link it to Al Qaida – war is on all international terrorism not just AQ and there is no convincing proof of AQ involvement with Iraq).
>
> "Demand return of inspectors so can verify dismantling of WMD facilities. Seek UN resolution.
>
> "If no return of inspectors will consider what further action …
>
> "Our duty to support rising … Cannot allow him to use terrorism against his own people once again. Just like Bosnia or Kosovo international community cannot stand by and watch genocide."

268. Asked about the ideas being considered in late 2001, Mr Powell told the Inquiry:

> "… we didn't really have a serious discussion of proposals at that stage, or we weren't clear, and I jotted down some ideas on a piece of paper which I would rather forget at the moment, about encouraging people in Iraq to resist, Shi'ites, Sunnis and military leaders."[135]

269. Asked whether that was an Afghanistan sort of model, Mr Powell replied:

> "Yes, it was … but it wasn't a very serious piece of work and it didn't go anywhere. The Prime Minister did me the good grace of not commenting on it."

FCO advice, 3 December 2001

270. Throughout the autumn, as Sir David Manning told Dr Rice on 28 November, the UK had been thinking about the next steps in countering international terrorism.

271. A FCO minute written in mid-November explained that a counter-terrorism strategy had been developed following extensive inter-departmental discussion, which identified the objectives needed "to defeat UBL and his networks".[136] It had "evolved from an initial MOD desire to fit the current military action in Afghanistan into a wider strategy". The intention was to draw up "country strategies" to guide efforts in the months ahead.

272. Iraq was identified as one of more than a dozen countries "which would seem to merit particular attention".

273. Following President Bush's remarks to the press on 26 November 2001, the FCO considered the legality of military action against Iraq in November 2001.

---

[135] Public hearing, 18 January 2010, page 30.
[136] Minute Bloomfield to PS [FCO], 13 November 2001, 'Counter-Terrorism Strategy: Phase Two'.

274. Mr John Grainger, an FCO Legal Counsellor in the Middle East Department, wrote a minute on 27 November, which briefly set out the history of the use of force against Iraq and the legal basis for it.[137] He emphasised that there had not been any significant decision by the Security Council since 1998 and that caution should be exercised about relying upon that decision after the expiry of such a long time. Mr Grainger advised that the UK should take a cautious line in relation to the latest US statements.

275. Sir Michael Wood, the FCO Legal Adviser from 1999 to 2006, told the Inquiry that the legality of the use of military force against Iraq had been raised as early as November 2001 "when President Bush made some kind of statement, which made it look as though force might be used. So we set out the position immediately."[138]

276. In response to a request from Mr Blair for advice on the options for dealing with Iraq, the FCO proposed "ratcheting up" the policy of containment, including pressing Iraq to comply with its disarmament obligations and making the "red-lines for military action more specific".

277. The FCO warned that the UK could be confronted with an unwelcome dilemma of supporting unlawful and widely unpopular action or distancing itself from a key US policy.

278. A visit to Washington by Sir David Manning would be an opportunity to find out what the US was thinking and "test the viability of any plans".

279. In relation to Iraq's possession of WMD, the FCO letter did not fully reflect the caveats which the JIC had attached to its Assessments.

280. Mr McDonald wrote to No.10 on 3 December:

> "In advance of David Manning's trip to Washington on Wednesday the Prime Minister has asked for a note on the options for dealing with Iraq."[139]

281. The letter began:

> "US hawks, especially in the Pentagon, are talking up the possibility of military action against Iraq and of trying to topple Saddam Hussein (regime-change). That would confront us with an unwelcome dilemma: support unlawful and widely unpopular action or distance ourselves from a key US policy. Decisions have not yet been taken in Washington: we need to influence the debate."

282. Mr McDonald added that there were:

> "… no anti-terrorist grounds for Stage 2 military action against Iraq …"

---

[138] Public hearing, 26 January 2010, pages 14-15.
[139] Letter McDonald to Tatham, 3 December 2001, 'Iraq: Options'.

283. Addressing Iraq's WMD capability, Mr McDonald wrote:

> "There is real reason for concern about Iraq's WMD programmes, principally CBW and long range missiles. There is evidence of continuing Iraqi attempts to procure nuclear-related materiel. Saddam's history of aggression and use of CW sets Iraq apart from other WMD-armed states. It might be possible to construct a (threadbare) legal case for military action to deal with the threat. But a new SCR would almost certainly be needed. And though bombing can degrade missile and even nuclear capability, it is ineffective against CBW …"

284. An Annex to the letter set out the FCO perspective on Iraq's WMD capabilities and intentions and Iraq's response to its obligations. That stated Iraq was:

- "concealing information about large quantities of chemical and biological munitions, agents and precursors. UNSCOM inspectors were unable to account for [material related to chemical weapons] and very large quantities of growth media acquired, on Iraq's own admission, for the production of biological weapons";
- "concealing up to 20 long-range Al Hussein missiles";
- "actively pursuing chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles. The missile-related facilities damaged by Operation Desert Fox in 1998 have been repaired, research continues and new facilities are being constructed. Other former chemical and biological weapons facilities have been restored: some CW and BW-relevant activity is under way";
- "seeking to rebuild a nuclear weapons programme. Recent intercepted Iraqi procurement efforts have involved material relevant to production of fissile material"; and
- "most importantly, barring entry to UNMOVIC and IAEA Action Team Inspectors. Iraqi officials have made clear as recently as last week that they do not intend to cease this obstruction until sanctions are lifted: in defiance of UNSCRs which repeatedly call for Iraqi compliance to be unconditional."

285. The JIC's assessment of Iraq's WMD at that time is addressed in Section 4.1.

286. On the way ahead, Mr McDonald wrote:

> "A strategy to deal with a WMD threat will require ratcheting up our present policy of containment. We should press Iraq to comply with its disarmament obligations under the SCRs, accept an intrusive and continuing UN inspection regime and accept Kuwaiti sovereignty unequivocally."

287. The strategy "could involve" four elements:

> "… making previously declared red-lines for military action more specific; by defining what we meant by reconstitution of WMD and threats to neighbours.

"We could also make more explicit guarantees for Kurdish autonomy now and in any future Iraq.

"We should encourage and support the Iraqi opposition.

"We could mount a higher profile campaign on the issue of war crimes and consider the options for an international tribunal to try Saddam and his principal lieutenants."

288. Mr McDonald added:

"We could set out a vision of post-Saddam Iraq by deploying a 'Contract with the Iraqi People' on the lines of the attached draft …"

289. The background to the proposal for a "Contract with the Iraqi People" is set out in Section 1.2; the details of the "Contract", and the subsequent development of a vision for Iraq, are addressed in Sections 6.4 and 6.5.

290. The letter reviewed discussions with Iraq's neighbours about curbing illegal oil imports.

291. Mr McDonald concluded:

"Regime change may look an attractive alternative. Removal of Saddam, if achieved swiftly, would be applauded by his neighbours, the GCC and the wider Arab/Islamic world. But previous uprisings in 1991 failed for want of outside support and military intervention for this purpose would be illegal. The US are nevertheless considering their options again. David Manning's visit to Washington this week offers the opportunity to find out what they have in mind, and to test the viability of any plans."

SIS advice

292. In parallel, No.10 had also commissioned urgent advice from SIS.

293. SIS4 produced three papers, addressing how the UK might divert the US from a policy of regime change, a "route map" for pursuing regime change, and an analysis of the potential risks and costs were the US to take military action against Iraq.

294. On 3 December, Sir Richard Dearlove wrote formally to Sir David Manning enclosing three "papers":

- A paper discussed with SIS4 on 30 November which began: "What can be done about Iraq? If the US heads for direct action, have we ideas which could divert them to an alternative course?"
- A second paper, 'Iraq: Further Thoughts', reflecting discussion at "our meeting on 30 November" of a possible way ahead which combined "an objective of regime change in Baghdad with the need to protect important regional interests which would be at grave risk, if a bombing campaign against Iraq was launched in the short term".

- A third paper which offered "some thoughts on the risks and costs of US attacks on Iraq".[140]

295. In the first paper, SIS4 set out the issues that would bear on planning for regime change in Iraq, including:

- The "read across from Afghanistan (cf Richard Perle's ideas)" was "deceptive". The defences of the Iraqi regime were "formidable" and the Tikritis were "not a bunch of Taliban".
- Neighbouring Arab states preferred "the Sunnis" to the Shia "alternative", and feared "Kurdish expansionism".
- Iraqi external opposition groups were "divided, badly penetrated" by Iraqi intelligence and had "little credibility inside Iraq".
- Action against Iraq would undermine the unity of purpose of the war against terror.
- There was "no convincing intelligence (or common sense) case that Iraq supports Sunni extremism".
- There were "significant fragilities" in the countries neighbouring Iraq.
- The implications of a "US installed regime in Iraq" for the UK's regional alliances were "not at all positive": "'Fundamentalism' would be boosted."
- It was "not clear" that destruction of identified WMD facilities "would do more than temporarily arrest Iraq's WMD capabilities".
- There was no identified nuclear target.

296. Setting out a "Strategic View", SIS4 wrote:

- Action against Iraq "climbs a steep gradient of complex regional opposition".
- EU co-ordination would be "problematic".
- Co-ordination by the Security Council had been "difficult" because of Iraqi influence on Russia and, to a lesser extent, China.
- Iraq policy was "inextricably tied up with the problem of Israel".
- Egypt, which was "vital to UK interests in the Middle East" was "vulnerable to Iraqi influence due to the failure of MEPP".
- Maintaining international cohesion against terrorism was "a prior imperative".
- Iraq was "succeeding in eroding sanctions" but isolation was "costing Baghdad heavily". Maintaining regional balances, "especially with Iran", was "a problem for Saddam".

297. SIS4 told the Inquiry he had been asked to produce the paper that afternoon and deliver it to No.10.[141]

[141] Private hearing, Part 1, page 7.

298. SIS4 stated that Sir David Manning had asked for:

> "A quick paper … of key issues that we need to bear in mind to keep our balance and our perspective in considering Iraq as a rapidly expanding threat … A sort of sedative paper …"[142]

299. SIS4 stated that the first paper was trying to bring out the hazards about the experience to date with Iraq if direct action were taken.[143]

300. SIS4 stated that he had been concerned about:

> "… the lack of our response to the re-emergence of Iraq as a serious regional power …
>
> "I was very alarmed at the way that Iraq was eroding the sanctions regime and evading it. It had been successful in seeing us off with propaganda since the end of the first Gulf War …
> "… that power and vitality of Iraq were, in my view, a real threat to the stability of the region."[144]

301. Citing the impact of Iraqi chemical attacks on Iranian troops in the Iran-Iraq War, SIS4 added that "Iraq's potential, its capability in the WMD field, was very dramatic":

> "So the idea of putting an end to this problem was not something I would advocate, but I would see the force of the desire to do it to be decisive."[145]

302. Sir Richard Dearlove could not "recall the exact details" that led to the request for SIS advice, but he recalled "the circumstances", which he described as "a sort of dearth of expertise in the Foreign Office at that sort of level of sophistication, and I'm pretty sure that this initiative comes out of me, David [Manning] and [SIS4] talking amongst each other".[146]

303. Sir Richard described the papers as "catalysts" to stimulate thinking; and emphasised that they had "no status as official papers at all".

304. Sir David Manning was unable to recall the circumstances in which he had requested advice from SIS4 on 30 November, although he postulated that it was a reflection of SIS4's expertise.[147]

305. Sir David pointed out that the discussion of regime change at that stage was about fomenting regime change within Iraq, not about an invasion.

[147] Private hearing, 24 June 2010, pages 9-16.

306. Although the covering letter from Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Office described the second paper as "an expansion" of the first, the paper drew on SIS4's discussion with Sir David Manning about a "possible way ahead".[148]

307. Addressing the question "Why Move?", SIS4 wrote:

> "The removal of Saddam remains a prize because it could give new security to oil supplies; engage a powerful and secular state in the fight against Sunni extremist terror, open political horizons in the GCC [Gulf Co-operation Council] states, remove a threat to Jordan/Israel, undermine the regional logic on WMD. The major challenge would be managing the regional reintegration of Iraq, without damaging important local relationships. Working for regime change could be a dynamic process of alliance building which could effect climatic change in the Arab-Israeli conflict."

308. SIS4 proposed a "new route map" where the key idea was that it would be "possible to speak openly about support for regime change in Iraq without compromising the actual project to support a coup". He suggested a "policy statement: we want regime change in Baghdad and we are ready to provide air support to coup makers". The latter would "need to be Sunnis ready to abide by UN resolutions".

309. SIS4 made a number of other observations, including:

- "To meet US impatience a 12-18 month timeframe should be imposed."
- There had been "a serious problem" with the legality of supporting coup makers.
- The message to key partners should include "assurances" that the approach was "going to be balanced, studied, planned and proportionate – better than bombing now".
- Examination of the interests affected and "means to compensate" them – "especially Turkey, Iran and Syria".
- Consideration of "international participation" in the military "task force".
- Legal examination of Iraqi liabilities and draft arrangements to manage them.
- "Promotion of serious debate within the region on WMD: costs and responsibilities."

310. Setting out "Our Aims for the Region", SIS4 wrote that there were:

> "… two further aims: climatic change in the psychology of regimes in the region, a pre-condition for progress in the Arab-Israel dispute … The problem of WMD is an element in driving for action in Iraq. In turn, this should open prospects for Arab-Israeli talks, and, beyond, regional work to reduce the WMD inventories which threaten Europe as well."

---

[148] Letter PS/C to Manning, 3 December 2001, 'Iraq' attaching Paper, 'Iraq: Further Thoughts'.

311. SIS4 confirmed that the second paper he had produced was:

> "… about managing the paradox of working hard for regime change, communicating in secret, and being able to communicate to the world and to the Iraqi population in the hope maybe of precipitating local Iraqi help, without compromising that core and secret effort."[149]

312. Asked about his view that it would be important not to parachute a regime in from the external opposition, and that: "The new government would need to be broadly based but predominantly Sunni", SIS4 replied:

> "… the people being toppled were Ba'athists, who were culturally Sunni … but being a Ba'athist wasn't co-extensive with being Sunni. There were a lot of Sunnis in Iraq who would have liked Iraq to be run differently.
>
> "I don't think at this time it occurred to me that it was plausible to transfer an adversarial, party political, representational political system to Iraq.
> "… The idea that Iraqi Shias could be fitted out with Republican, Democrat, Lib Dem identities, organisations and run the difficult place which is Iraq, a place which has never had stable political geography, wouldn't have occurred to me in 2001."[150]

313. Asked about the second paper, a "new route map", which stated that the Government Law Officers were going to have to provide assurances of legality, and that there had been a serious problem there, SIS4 replied:

> "… I can't honestly tell you what particular thought was in my mind there. I'm not aware of any discussions of the legality …"[151]

314. The third paper was a companion piece to the second, providing an expanded analysis of the risks and costs of US attacks on Iraq in four categories:

- "Strategic" – including increased distrust of the US and damage to confidence in HMG; serious strain on the coalition against terrorism; and reinforcing the motives and grievances of terrorists.
- "United Nations" – including erosion of UN sanctions and renewed splits in the Security Council.
- "Regional" – including resentment in the Arab street and popular pressure on regional regimes; an increase in radical Islamist extremism; a boost to the Intifada and damage to the MEPP; threats to the stability of key allies; and reduction of support for operation of the No-Fly Zones.
- "Iraq Internal" – including the division of Iraq and the possibility that Saddam Hussein might respond to a perceived existential threat by attacking Israel with any remaining SCUD-type missiles with chemical or biological warheads, "The Samson Scenario"; or mount conventional attacks on Israel or unconventional attacks on Israel or UK/US military assets.[152]

315. SIS4 also stated that the outcomes of a bombing campaign would be "both uncertain and hard to control".

316. Mr Blair told the Inquiry that the first paper he had received was the FCO advice on options.[153] While it "concluded there were no anti-terrorist grounds" for military action against Iraq, that was because "we saw no link between Iraq and Al Qaida". It did not "deal with the point, however, that post September 11th WMD" had taken on "a different significance". Mr Blair also referred to the details of Iraq's capabilities and its concealment activities as "not exactly … reassuring".

317. Addressing the papers provided by SIS4, Mr Blair stated that one had pointed out that getting regime change would be "very, very difficult … so watch out", and another had argued: "On the other hand, leaving him [Saddam] there is also very, very difficult."[154] Those two views remained.

318. Mr Blair added that he thought that one of the papers said "by implication you cannot stop the WMD programme unless you actually remove Saddam".

319. The papers produced by SIS4 did not address whether regime change was a prerequisite for stopping Iraq's WMD programmes. That was the conclusion of the JIC Assessment of 27 February 2002 and the CO Options Paper of 8 March (see Section 3.2).

320. On 5 December, Mr McDonald wrote to Sir Richard Dearlove's Private Office recording that Mr Straw had seen two SIS papers and thought they were "very perceptive" and he hoped that the Prime Minister would read them.[155]

321. Asked whether Mr Straw's comments constituted support for his proposals, SIS4 replied:

"No …

"I don't want to leave the impression in your minds that at this point there was an autonomous UK based drive towards regime change, because I have no memory of that. I have a vivid memory of people being very concerned that all this stuff may be about to happen, and what do we think about it. What do we think of the arguments? … What are the dangers? … But clearly we would need to be in a position to discuss it with the Americans. They were likely to bring it to us. I think there's a distinction there."[156]

322. Mr Straw confirmed that he had seen the second and third papers sent to No.10.[157] Mr Straw wrote that his comments were based on the two papers taken together and that from his perspective SIS4's reference to the need for assurances of legality were:

> "… spelling out quite plainly that 'assurances of legality' were an essential pre-condition to any HMG policy in support of UK military action with the objective of regime change."

323. Mr Straw emphasised that one of the central arguments against regime change was, as the FCO advice of 3 December and SIS4's paper had made clear, "the fact that it was illegal".

Mr Blair's paper for President Bush, 4 December 2001

324. Mr Blair and President Bush discussed future options for Iraq on 3 December 2001.

325. Mr Blair told President Bush that he was not opposed to the removal of Saddam Hussein, but an extremely clever plan would be needed.

326. Mr Blair suggested the visit to Washington by Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove later that week would be an opportunity to share thinking on the next phase.

327. Mr Blair spoke to President Bush by telephone on 3 December.[158]

328. The conversation was primarily about the position in Afghanistan, including the prospects for the Bonn Conference to generate a request for an international security force, possibly under UN auspices, and whether the UK might lead such a force.

329. In a discussion on future options in relation to Iraq, Mr Blair told President Bush that Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove would be in Washington later that week. That would be an opportunity to share thinking on "how the next phase might proceed".

330. In response to a discussion about the potential effects in the Middle East if Saddam Hussein were overthrown, Mr Blair said that:

> "… contrary to press reporting, he was not in a different place on this … it would be excellent to get rid of Saddam. But there needed to be a clever strategy for doing this."

Following further discussion of the possible options, including that a conventional land invasion was out of the question, Mr Blair repeated that he was:

> "… not opposed to action against Saddam. But an extremely clever plan would be required."

331. Mr Blair and President Bush also discussed Israeli actions.

332. The record of the conversation was sent to Mr Straw's Private Office. It was also sent to Mr Hoon's Private Secretary, Adm Boyce, Sir Richard Dearlove, Sir Stephen Lander (Director General of the Security Service), Sir Francis Richards (Director of the Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ)), Sir Christopher Meyer, Mr John Scarlett (Chairman of the JIC), Mr McKane, and to Sir Richard Wilson's Private Secretary.

333. The following day Mr Blair sent President Bush a paper setting out proposals for Phase 2 of the war against terrorism.

334. In relation to Iraq, Mr Blair stated that it was a threat because: it had a WMD capability; was acquiring more; had shown its willingness to use it; could export that capability; and was in breach of UN Security Council resolutions.

335. Mr Blair suggested a strategy for regime change in Iraq that would build over time which would permit military action to be taken "if necessary, without losing international support".

336. Mr Blair sent President Bush a paper 'The War against Terrorism: The Second Phase' on 4 December.[159]

337. The paper comprised an overview of the possible approaches to potential terrorist threats in seven countries[160] and a 'Strategy for Confronting Islamic Extremism' in moderate Muslim states.

338. In relation to Iraq, the key points were:

- Iraq was a threat because: "it has WMD capability; is acquiring more; has shown its willingness to use it; and can export that capability". Iraq was in breach of UN Security Council resolutions 687 (1991), 715 (1991) and 1284 (1999) and Saddam Hussein supported certain Palestinian terrorist groups and used terror tactics against Iraqi dissidents.
- Any link to 11 September and AQ was "at best very tenuous".
- Although "people want to be rid of Saddam", international opinion "outside the US/UK" would "at present" be "reluctant" to support immediate military action.

---

[159] Paper Blair [to Bush], 4 December 2001, 'The War Against Terrorism: The Second Phase'.
[160] Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Philippines, Somalia, Syria and Yemen.

339. Mr Blair suggested that a "strategy for regime change that builds over time" was needed: "until we get to the point where military action could be taken if necessary" without losing international support and "facing a choice between massive intervention and nothing". That might comprise six elements.

340. The first was "Softening up" opinion by:

- drawing attention to Saddam's breach of UN resolutions;
- saying that regime change was "desirable", but "not yet setting it as a military objective";
- signalling willingness to support opposition groups;
- building a regional coalition against Iraq; and
- demanding the return of weapons inspectors "without specifying military action if the demand is not met, we let it be clearly seen that nothing is ruled out. But our time frame is deliberately vague."

341. Mr Blair commented that that would be "presentationally difficult":

> "We need to be very precise to avoid getting drawn into threats we are not yet ready to implement. But we would be unsettling Saddam; possibly forcing concessions out of him … and giving ourselves room for manoeuvre."

In the meantime, the US and UK would "continue to enforce the No-Fly Zones on a more intensive basis".

342. The other elements suggested by Mr Blair were:

- Applying "real pressure on Syria to stop the flow of Iraqi oil by closing the oil pipeline", clamping down on "Saddam's illegal financial transactions", and helping Jordan. Turkey would also need to stop illegal oil imports.
- Bringing "Russia on board, by ensuring their financial interests don't suffer adversely". Withdrawal of Russian support would have a very negative impact on Saddam Hussein.
- Supporting "opposition groups" and setting out an agenda for post-Saddam Iraq (the FCO's 'Contract with the Iraqi People').
- Mounting "covert operations" in support of those "with the ability to topple Saddam".
- "When the rebellion finally occurs we back it militarily." That included air support and support for uprisings. Mr Blair wrote: "What everyone in Iraq and around fears is that we will start this action but not finish it. They need to know, and we need to be clear, that if an uprising occurs, we are willing to act militarily in support."

343. Summarising his position, Mr Blair wrote:

> "So: my strategy is to build this over time until we get to the point where military action could be taken if necessary; but meanwhile bring people towards us, undermine Saddam, without so alarming people about the immediacy of action that we frighten the horses, lose Russia and/or half the EU and nervous Arab states and find ourselves facing a choice between massive intervention and nothing."

344. Addressing Syria and Iran, Mr Blair wrote:

> "If toppling Saddam is a prime objective, it is far easier to do it with Syria and Iran in favour or acquiescing rather than hitting all three at once. I favour giving these two a chance at a different relationship … in return for closing down support for Hizbollah and Hamas and helping us over Iraq. I don't underestimate the problems … but I think it is possible …"

345. Mr Blair also identified the dangers in any action of "unintended consequences" for international support. He added that the outcome of Afghanistan would be important to Phase 2. If Afghanistan was left as a:

> "… better country, having supplied humanitarian aid and having given new hope to the people, we will not just have won militarily but morally; and the coalition will back us to do more elsewhere. In particular, we shall have given regime change a good name, which will help us in the argument over Iraq. So in my view, the political and diplomatic must always be reinforcing the military."

346. Mr Blair drew attention to the need to put the Middle East Peace Process "back on track" or it would "complicate everything".

347. Finally, Mr Blair suggested that the US and UK should be working with Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and other Muslim countries "on a strategy for confronting Islamic fundamentalism and extremism".

348. Sir David Manning delivered the paper to the US.

349. Following discussions in Washington, Sir David reported that the US Administration was "open to Mr Blair's ideas", and that the discussions "had been worth the journey".

350. Sir David also advised that there was a need to "make more of the WMD menace presented by Saddam".

351. Following talks in Washington, at which Sir Richard Dearlove had also been present, Sir David Manning reported that he had taken Dr Rice through Mr Blair's paper, including the "vital need" for progress on the MEPP.[161] The US response had been "encouraging", except on the MEPP.

---

[161] Minute Manning to Prime Minister, 6 December 2001, 'Meeting with Condi Rice: Iraq and Phase 2'.

352. On Iraq, Sir David reported that the US was conducting a full review of the options. The US had been reviewing the possibilities before 9/11, but the attacks had given the process new urgency. He had stated that:

> "… Saddam would only be overthrown if there was a strategy which co-ordinated work on all aspects of the problem. We should be patient. We must prepare very carefully, even if Saddam felt the net tightening. We should do it right rather than do it quickly."

353. In the context of a discussion about what had changed since 1991, including the availability of precision weapons and Saddam's "new WMD capabilities", Sir David wrote:

> "We should make more of the WMD menace presented by Saddam: people were far more sensitive to the dangers after what we had discovered in Afghanistan. And we should take the time and trouble to maintain the support of the coalition that we had worked so hard to build. The moderate Arabs were impressed by our swift and successful conduct of the Afghan campaign … They were also united in loathing Saddam. If we contrived his initial overthrow, with outside support, they might stick with us."

354. Sir David concluded that the discussions "had been worth the journey" and that it seemed the thinking "at the top level of the Administration" was "very close" to Mr Blair's. The Administration was "open to Mr Blair's ideas".

355. Sir David suggested that Mr Blair should talk to President Bush and propose a US/UK group to "take the Iraq issue forward together". At the request of the US, the discussions would need to be "extremely tightly held, involving only No.10/SIS/Cabinet Office".

356. Mr Blair wrote on the minute: "I agree with all this as discussed."[162]

357. After his return to London, Sir David Manning sent a copy of the paper he had taken to Washington to the Private Secretaries to Mr Straw and Mr Hoon, Sir Richard Wilson, Mr Scarlett, Sir Richard Dearlove, Mr Powell and Sir Christopher Meyer.[163]

358. There was no mention in that letter of Sir David's visit to Washington or the substance of the discussions.

359. Sir David's report of the discussions for Mr Blair was not sent to anyone outside No.10.

360. Mr Jonathan Powell told the Inquiry that when Sir David Manning returned from Washington, he had reported that Dr Rice had assured him that the Administration had "no immediate plans for action in Iraq".[164]

361. In a minute on 10 December, the FCO Counter-Terrorism Policy Department (CTPD) stated:

> "We have dropped plans to produce a paper on … Iraq, as our objectives there are better pursued in different ways."[165]

362. In a meeting with Secretary Powell in London on 11 December, Mr Blair repeated his view that "we needed a clever strategy to deal with Saddam"; and identified the important consequences of success in Afghanistan.[166]

363. Mr Blair and President Bush spoke on 11 December but there is no mention of Iraq or Phase 2 of the war on terrorism in the record of the discussion.[167]

364. Asked what he had said to President Bush, Mr Blair replied:

> "… when you get to my conversation with President Bush … I am saying to him 'Look, we are going to have to deal with this issue. We accept that. After September 11, the calculus of risk has changed and changed fundamentally. We cannot allow Saddam Hussein to be in breach of UN resolutions.'
>
> "So I am signalling that I am up for the policy of handling and dealing with this issue and we are going to be with America in doing that.
>
> "We then I think from memory had a discussion about all sorts of different aspects of that and how it might be done … I was in no doubt it would be beneficial for the world to get rid of Saddam Hussein and to get rid of his regime."[168]

365. Mr Blair added:

> "On the other hand, I was saying 'This is going to be difficult precisely because of the things listed in the paper from the SIS officer'. Those were:
>
> - The lack of response to the re-emergence of Iraq as a serious regional power.
> - Alarm at the way that Iraq was eroding the sanctions regime and evading it.
> - Iraq's success in seeing us [the US and UK] off with propaganda since the end of the first Gulf Conflict.

- Iraq's potential to produce WMD at very short notice. Nuclear would be slightly different … but Iraq's potential, its capability was very dramatic."[169]

366. Asked whether Iraq should have been encompassed in Phase 2, Mr Blair replied:

> "Absolutely … I thought we had to deal with all the problems …
> "My view was that this was all part of one issue in the end, and that you had to deal with each and every individual part … that you couldn't … say: '… we will deal with it sequentially …' That was not my view."[170]

367. Asked whether he had agreed with the advice in the FCO letter of 3 December, to ratchet up containment and steering away from the idea of supporting uprisings, let alone military intervention for the purposes of regime change, Mr Blair replied:

> "… they were not quite saying that. What they were saying was, '… there is a policy of containment.'… They go on to say: 'However, it's not actually stopped him doing what he is doing'."[171]

368. Asked if, in the context of the paper he had sent to President Bush, he was actively looking at a strategy that would build up in stages to military action against Iraq to deal with Saddam Hussein, Mr Blair replied:

> "… I could see where this was heading the same as everybody else …
> "… It was very obvious you had to deal with the issue. There were two ways of dealing with it: change of heart or change of regime. That was more or less as it remained throughout."[172]

369. Asked if the initiative had been followed up, Mr Blair referred to "a sort of build-up", including an Assessment from the JIC, leading to his meeting with President Bush in Crawford in April.[173] That had evolved at "quite a fast pace … down a track towards regime change".

370. Mr Blair added that it was "absolutely clear from the outset" after 9/11 that President Bush was going to change the regime if Saddam Hussein did not let the inspectors back into Iraq. The question was whether the US strategy could be "put into a somewhat different track", initially an ultimatum and then through the UN.

371. The development of thinking in preparation for Mr Blair's meeting with President Bush at Crawford in early April 2002 is addressed in Section 3.2.

372. Reporting a discussion with Mr Peter Mandelson on 4 December, who wanted background information on Iraq for use in speaking engagements on Middle East issues, Mr McKane recorded that Mr Mandelson had been "particularly interested in the prospects for effective action to unseat Saddam Hussein".[174] Mr McKane reported that he had "pointed out the legal position, and also the difficulties in finding an effective strategy, whether military or otherwise, to deal effectively with Iraq".

373. In response to a question about other targets for coalition action in Phase 2, Mr McKane reported that he had "sketched out in general terms" the links between Usama Bin Laden and Islamic extremists in other countries.

374. On 5 December, Mr Straw emphasised the need for Iraq to meet the obligations imposed by the UN, including the re-admission of weapons inspectors.

375. On 5 December, in a debate in Parliament on the Middle East, following terrorist attacks in Israel, Mr Dalyell asked whether the Government was "doing everything possible to deter certain Americans from the folly of attacking Iraq".[175] Mr Straw responded:

> "… The key to Iraq coming back into the civilised world is for Iraq to implement the undertakings imposed on it by the … Security Council resolutions, including the re-admission of weapons inspectors. I say strongly … that Iraq continues to pose a very serious threat to Arab states, as well as to the state of Israel, by its continued unlawful development of weapons of mass destruction."

376. Asked if the UK took the same view as President Bush that UN inspectors must return to Iraq, Mr Straw told the Foreign Affairs Committee on 5 December:

> "Yes. Saddam Hussein is the architect of the misfortunes of the Iraqi people … Iraq poses a very severe threat in terms of its development and possible use of weapons of mass destruction, of that there can be no doubt. Therefore restraining the development of those weapons … is essential, and to do that we require proper inspection."[176]

377. Mr Straw added that the UK had "been in the lead in the United Nations on seeking … a more effective replacement, of … resolution 1284". The new sanctions regime might "With luck" be in place in six months. That would allow the export of goods to Iraq for civilian use for humanitarian and other purposes, and "more effectively interdict material which is either for military use for weapons of mass destruction, certain conventional weapons, or of dual use".

378. Asked whether Iraq could be persuaded to permit the return of inspectors "without an intensification of military action", Mr Straw replied:

> "… I would not use the verb persuade. I see some prospect of Iraq coming to accept that this has to happen for the future of the regime as well as the future of the people in that country. I would not put it higher than that but I think there is some evidence to that effect."
>
> "There certainly has to be an intensification of diplomatic pressure … it requires more active engagement, for example by Russia … and a recognition … that what has been an ambiguous approach to Iraq … is not helpful in terms of the stability of the region and the stability of the international community."

379. Asked if he thought the rights under the UN Charter extended "to taking pre-emptive action against a state which the US" believed might attack it, Mr Straw replied that all states had a right to self-defence and he was not going to be "drawn into hypothetical answers to hypothetical questions of the 'what if' variety". If a country received "very good information" that it was about to be attacked it could take action in self defence consistent with Article 51 of the UN Charter, but the exact circumstances would vary.

380. In response to a final question about Iraq's programme of developing a larger ballistic missile capability and that it was "possibly developing chemical, biological, maybe even nuclear weapons" and what might happen next after Afghanistan, Mr Straw replied:

> "… You are right to say that Iraq's building of weapons of mass destruction is a very serious potential threat to the peace and stability of the region and, therefore, to the whole of the international community … [and] to imply that the international community has to take action. There is then a question of what action is best taken in respect of that where care and consideration is required. This is a separate matter to culpability for the atrocities of 11 September … but we are … very concerned, about Iraq's development of these weapons. We believe that international action has to take place and I have talked already about the dramatic steps which have to be taken."

MOD's initial response to international terrorism

In a speech at King's College on 5 December, Mr Hoon set out "preliminary thoughts" on the work commissioned by the MOD following the attacks on 11 September.[177]

Mr Hoon set out five approaches the Armed Forces might take in countering the threat outside the UK:

- preventing the conditions that allowed international terrorist organisations to operate, including peace support operations to prevent instability or to assist in stabilisation of states which did not have the means to exercise control over their own territory;
- deterring attacks including:
  - considering "setting out more clearly and repeatedly our views on holding to account regimes which directly support international terrorist groups, or condone their presence within their borders"; and
  - looking "at how we deter the use of chemical, biological and radiological weapons as well as nuclear weapons and, importantly, dissuade those who facilitate the proliferation of such weapons";
- coercion of regimes and states which harboured or supported international terrorism "with the threat and, ultimately, the use of, military force in the event that diplomatic and other means fail";
- active disruption of activities supporting international terrorist groups; and
- destroying terrorist cells "and, perhaps in the last instance, to act against regimes such as the Taliban" which supported and protected terrorists.

The perspective in the US, December 2001

381. On 6 December, The Washington Post reported the text of a letter sent to President Bush by Senators McCain, Lieberman, Holmes and Lott, amongst others, arguing that "as we work to clean up Afghanistan and destroy Al Qaida, it is imperative that we plan to eliminate the threat from Iraq", suggesting that the US "must directly confront Saddam, sooner rather than later".[178]

382. The letter stated:

> "We cannot be drawn into the ethnic politics of any particular nation, but should find a way to work with all the opposition in a unified framework. The Iraqi National Congress is the only umbrella organisation comprising all elements of the Iraqi opposition. No one group is excluded, no one group is favoured … All indications are that in the interest of our own national security, Saddam Hussein must be removed from power."

[177] Speech, 5 December 2001.
[178] Email Hall to various, 6 December 2001, 'Letter to the President on Iraq'.

383. Mr Kevin Tebbit, the MOD Permanent Under Secretary, visited Washington from 5 to 7 December 2001 where his meetings with a range of contacts included discussions on Afghanistan and the next stage of the war against terrorism.[179]

384. Reporting to Mr Hoon on the visit, Mr Tebbit stated that Washington saw itself as being on a "war footing" and "the focus on international terrorism remains intense".[180] That focus influenced "the US attitude and approach to the rest of the agenda". In his view that meant:

> "UK views are listened to, like nobody else's; all doors are open (but it doesn't mean that we can easily get our way or secure our interests);
> "… if we want our advice to be heeded on general pol/mil [political/military] issues, we need to place it in the context of counter-terrorism post 11 September … everything needs to relate back to the war in some way if we are to catch their ear; and
> "… there is a widespread and bipartisan sense, extending well beyond Administration 'hawks' that Iraq will need to be dealt with sooner rather than later. This rationale is not quite as simplistic as we like to think. They do not suspect Saddam of complicity in 11 September. But they regard it as all too likely that he will make WMD available to terrorist groups without much warning. Our success in dissuading the Administration from military action without proper political and diplomatic preparation (though there was no sense that a military move was imminent) will depend on our ability to engage constructively on the strategy and tactics."

385. The report was also sent to the FCO, Sir Christopher Meyer, and to Sir David Manning.

386. While Mr Tebbit was in Washington, an attempt was made by a senior Republican close to the Pentagon to persuade him that the Iraqi National Congress could be a force to be reckoned with sufficient to cause an Iraqi response and enable the US to take supportive military action. Mr Tebbit commissioned an analysis of that thesis which he expected would "show it to be flawed".[181]

387. Sir Kevin Tebbit told the Inquiry that the desire in the US State Department was to move down the UN track, but the mood in Secretary Rumsfeld's Office was "much tougher".[182] Mr Richard Perle, Chairman of the Defence Advisory Board, whom Sir Kevin regarded as one of the "most influential figures" on Secretary Rumsfeld's thinking, was "very clearly talking of trying to encourage a sort of Northern Alliance of Iraq".[183]

388. Sir Kevin confirmed he considered Mr Perle's thinking to be "flawed" and that the UK had not been challenging it sufficiently strongly.[184]

389. The MOD subsequently concluded that there was "no Northern Alliance equivalent … who could take advantage of precision bombing" in Iraq.[185]

390. On 7 December, Kandahar fell to anti-Taliban forces led by Mr Hamid Karzai, supported by US Marines.[186]

391. Sir Richard Dearlove advised No.10 at the end of December that it would be very much in the Government's interest to work with the US and that the outcome of US thinking would be of "enormous significance" to the national interest.

392. Following the discussion in Washington on 5 December, Sir Richard Dearlove asked SIS4 and SIS7 to hold follow up talks on Iraq.[187] He reported the outcome of the talks to Sir David Manning on 27 December, with details of the discussions between SIS and the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

393. SIS4 had suggested a "middle ground" option should be examined. That would be to create conditions within Iraq which, with air support, could act as a catalyst for a coup which would bring Saddam Hussein down within the next one to two years.

394. Sir Richard advised that the outcome of US thinking was likely to be "an intelligent and co-ordinated push for regime change, but a more aggressive military campaign cannot be ruled out". If it were the former, the US would look for UK support. There had been no discussion about what the US would expect from the UK in the event of a military campaign.

395. Sir Richard suggested that if a US policy decision went "the right way" he believed that it would be:

> "… very much in HMG's interest to work with the Americans. We have a contribution to make and the outcome is of enormous significance for our national interest."

396. As Section 3.2 shows, Mr Straw does not seem to have been informed of SIS discussions with the US until 19 February 2002.

397. While Sir David Manning had confirmed in early December that the US was conducting a full review of all its options, there are no indications that the UK was aware that President Bush had specifically commissioned General Franks to look at military options for removing Saddam Hussein; and that that would include options for a conventional land invasion.

398. General Franks visited Crawford on 28 December 2001 to brief President Bush on Iraq.[188] Other members of the national security team were linked by video to the briefing. General Franks informed President Bush that the plan on the shelf required a six month build up and 400,000 troops; he was looking at whether as a result of lessons from Afghanistan fewer conventional ground forces would be needed. He had "envisioned a fast invasion from Kuwait in the south, Saudi Arabia and Jordan in the west, and Turkey in the north".

399. Secretary Rumsfeld recorded that General Franks' plan called for "an invasion force of 145,000 … which would be increased to 275,000 if and as needed".[189]

400. The report from the US Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, Hard Lessons, stated that the concept of operations briefed to President Bush had been devised in four video conferences between Thanksgiving (22 November 2001) and late December 2001. It focused chiefly on the combat phase and "anticipated a rapid post war handoff to a provisional Iraqi government and a minimal continuing military footprint".[190]

401. President Bush wrote that after the 28 December briefing he had "asked the team to keep working on the plan", while observing that:

> "… we should remain optimistic that diplomacy and international pressure will succeed in disarming the regime … But we cannot allow weapons of mass destruction to fall into the hands of terrorists. I will not allow that to happen."[191]

402. General Franks wrote that he gave a further briefing on the developing plan to President Bush and US Principals on 7 February 2002, in which he identified the "optimum operational timing" as "December-mid-March" [2003].[192]

Developments in January 2002

403. Following an inter-departmental meeting chaired by the Cabinet Office on 14 January 2002, Mr McKane reported to Sir David Manning that the UK continued to push for the introduction of the Goods Review List by 30 May 2002 as authorised by resolution 1382 (2001).[193] The prospects for agreement on implementation of resolution 1284 (i.e. the return of weapons inspectors) were "slim". There was a continued discussion about whether the introduction of the GRL should take place before, or in parallel with, clarification of what Iraq had to do to get sanctions suspended and the regime which would be put in place thereafter.

404. Sir David Manning and Sir Richard Dearlove visited Washington again on 21 January 2002.[194]

405. In relation to discussions on Iraq, Sir David reported that there was an expectation that Saddam Hussein would "make a display of renewed co-operation" in the coming weeks. That would "probably include some kind of offer on inspections". The US would "resist sham inspections" which took the pressure off Saddam Hussein and "did nothing to further our interests". One senior US individual had suggested that it would be easier if Saddam Hussein "remained completely obdurate so that we were not faced with predictable arguments about giving him another chance". That was "just what he wanted".

406. Sir David added that the US Administration's "view remained that we should be pushing ahead for regime change". He had said that Mr Blair:

> "… favoured regime change but wanted a carefully constructed strategy. We must not rush in and fail. It seemed to me very unlikely that we would be in a position to take serious action before Saddam made a move on inspectors. We would have to factor this in."

407. Sir David reported that the timing of a strategy for dealing with Saddam Hussein was vague and there was "no sign that Washington has a clear plan that would allow early action". Any UK contribution would need Mr Blair's endorsement and "might have to be processed through the Attorney". The US and UK would look at options. There were some doubts about whether a strategy for regime change would be viable.

408. Sir David Manning told the Inquiry that the visit took place:
